The condition of things in Stratford has somewhat changed during the past few years, but the quiet and repose of the village are still delightful. Many of its native citizens continue to live in the pleasant homes where they were born; others who were tempted to try and obtain fortunes in New York and other cities were successful, and, like men of sterling sense, have returned here to spend their declining years in peace.

That such a town as Stratford should afford anything in the way of romantic personal histories was hardly to be expected, but the subjoined story is authentic as well as interesting. At the commencement of the present century a young man made his appearance in the village, and spent a few weeks at the tavern which then existed to afford shelter to stage coach travellers. Whence he came and what his business, none could guess. Directly opposite the tavern stood the small cottage and the forge of a blacksmith named Folsom. He had a daughter who was the beauty of the village, and it was her fortune to captivate the heart of the young stranger. He told his love, said that he was from Scotland, that he was travelling incog., but in confidence gave her his real name, claiming that he was heir to a large fortune. She returned his love, and they were married. A few weeks thereafter the stranger told his wife that he must visit New Orleans; he did so, and the gossips of the town made the young wife unhappy by their disagreeable hints and jeers. In a few months the husband returned, but before a week had elapsed he received a large budget of letters, and told his wife that he must at once return to England, and must go alone. He took his departure, and the gossips had another glorious opportunity to make a confiding woman wretched. To all but herself it was a clear case of desertion; the wife became a mother, and for two years lived on in silence and in hope. At the end of that time a letter was received by the Stratford beauty from her husband, directing her to go at once to New York with her child, taking nothing with her but the clothes she wore, and embark in a ship for her home in England. On her arrival in New York she found a ship splendidly furnished with every convenience and luxury for her comfort, and two servants ready to obey every wish that she might express. The ship duly arrived in England, and the Stratford girl became the mistress of a superb mansion, and, as the wife of a baronet, was saluted by the aristocracy as Lady Samuel Sterling. On the death of her husband many years ago, the Stratford boy succeeded to the title and the wealth of his fathers, and in the last edition of the "Peerage and Baronetage," he is spoken of as the issue of "Miss Folsom of Stratford, North America." When the late Professor Silliman visited England some years since, he had the pleasure of meeting Lady Sterling at a dinner party, and was delighted to answer her many questions about her birthplace in Connecticut.

If this paper were designed to be a complete history of Stratford, it would be necessary to print many pages about the early struggles and subsequent success of religion in this region. That is out of the question; but, on account of the personal history of one most interesting divine and author connected with it, a passing notice of the Episcopal Church in Stratford is indispensable. It was the first established in Connecticut, and its founder was one who left the Puritans to become an Episcopalian, and whose name was Samuel Johnson. He was born at Guilford, Connecticut, October 14, 1696, where were also born his father and grandfather, both men of distinction and deacons in the Congregational Church, while his great-grandfather, who came from Yorkshire, England, was one of the first settlers of New Haven. He was educated at the College of Saybrook, which subsequently found a permanent resting place in New Haven, and after the change of location, and while only twenty years of age, he became a tutor in what is now known as Yale College; was honored with the degree of Master of Arts; and was the first man who in 1718 lodged and set up housekeeping in the institution. In 1720 he became a preacher of the Gospel, and was settled at West Haven as a Congregationalist. He soon afterwards became the leader of a party of three or four who pioneered their way into the Episcopal Church, and, resigning his charge, he went to England to obtain orders, received from Oxford and Cambridge the degree of Master of Arts, and in 1723 was settled in Stratford as the first regularly ordained Episcopal clergyman in the colony. At first his flock consisted of only thirty families, and the persecutions which he endured from the Congregationalists were almost unparallelled. Some of them went so far as to put chains across their streets to prevent the horrible Episcopalians from going to church, while others would not sell him vegetables and other country produce for the support of his family. His great ability, however, as well as his high character as a man of intellect and a Christian, overcame all these obstacles, and he was triumphantly successful.

On the arrival in this country of Berkeley (the Dean of Derry and Bishop of Cloyne), in 1729, the rector of Stratford became his intimate friend, corresponded with him for many years, introduced his works to the literati of America, made him so interested in Yale College as to secure a present of one thousand valuable books to that institution, as well as a present of ninety acres of land in Rhode Island for its benefit. After a continuous battle of twenty years in behalf of his Church, the University of Oxford conferred upon our rector the degree of Doctor of Divinity, which honor was followed by many kind letters from the best men in England. In 1754, against his own wishes, but because eminent friends told him it was his duty, he accepted the presidency of the newly established Kings College in New York (now Columbia College), where his services were invaluable until 1763, when he returned to Stratford to spend the remainder of his days in ease and leisure. Here he died on the 6th of January, 1772, and lies buried in the grave-yard of Christ church, where two church buildings were erected under his eye, and were the predecessors of the present tasteful edifice occupying the same site. On the monument which commemorates his death are inscribed, after a Latin inscription, the following lines:

> "If decent dignity and modest mien,
> The cheerful heart and countenance serene;
> If pure religion and unsullied truth,
> His age's solace, and his search in youth;
> If piety in all the paths he trod,
> Still rising vigorous to his Lord and God:
> If charity thro' all the race he ran,
> Still willing well, and doing good to man;
> If LEARNING, free from pedantry and pride;
> If FAITH and VIRTUE, walking side by side;—
> If well to mark his being's aim and end,
> To shine through life a HUSBAND, FATHER, FRIEND,
> If these ambition in thy soul can raise,
> Excite thy reverence, or demand thy praise;—
> Reader, ere yet thou quit this earthly scene,
> Revere his name, and be what he has been.
>
> MYLES COOPER."

For a sketch of the life of Doctor Johnson, and an eloquent estimate of his exalted character as the first scholar of the day in America, the reader is referred to a small volume, published in 1805, by Dr. Thomas B. Chandler, of New Jersey, while the subjoined list of his writings will afford an opportunity of estimating his services as an author, viz.: "Plain Reasons for Conforming to the Church;" "Compendium of Logic and Metaphysics" —printed by Franklin; "Demonstration on the Reasonableness and Duty of Prayer;" "Beauty of Holiness in the Worship of the Church of England;" an English grammar, a Church catechism, a Hebrew grammar, an English and Hebrew grammar, and a variety of pamphlets on theological and literary subjects, published between the years 1732 and 1771.

Another man of note associated with Stratford was William S. Johnson, son of Dr. Samuel. He was born here October 7, 1727, graduated at Yale College in 1744, and was a lawyer of distinction and an eloquent orator. In 1765 and 1785 he was a delegate to the Congress at New York, and in 1776 an agent for the Colony to England, where he formed the acquaintance of many leading men. In 1772 he was judge of the Connecticut Supreme Court and a member of the convention that formed the Federal Constitution. He was also a Senator in Congress from 1789 to 1791; received from Oxford the degree of Doctor of Laws; and from 1792 to 1800 he was president of Columbia College, New York, after which he returned to Stratford, where he died November 14, 1819, and lies buried by the side of his distinguished father.

As allusions have already been made to five generations of the Johnson family of Stratford, it may here be mentioned, for the sake of completeness, that Samuel William Johnson, a lawyer and judge of retired habits, was the son of the senator, and that his son, William Samuel Johnson, is the present representative of the family, who has several brothers to participate with him in bearing the honored name. And this fact brings us (as did the courtesy of that gentleman bring the writer of this chapter) into the Johnson Library of Stratford. This collection numbers between four and five thousand volumes, and seven generations of highly educated men have participated in the labor of bringing them together. It was also enriched by contributions from such men as Bishop Berkeley, Benjamin Franklin, and Samuel Johnson, the great author of England. The several proprietors of this rare and truly precious private library have occasionally given away what we might call a swarm of books, but perhaps the most graceful present of this kind was one of several hundred volumes, printed between the years 1577 and 1791, and presented to Columbia College by the present owner. The collection, as it now stands, is especially rich in theology, the early English classics, the antiquities of England, the Greek and Latin authors, and in its dictionaries, with a rare sprinkling of black letter and Elzevir volumes. Here may also be found several curious editions of the Bible; but perhaps the most curious, interesting, and valuable single volume is the "Icon Basilikê; or, The Works of that Great Monarch and Glorious Martyr, King Charles I., both Civil and Sacred; and Pourtraicture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings." The edition here mentioned was printed at the Hague in 1648, a few days after the death of the king, and hence its especial value. Those acquainted with the work need not be told that the proof is quite conclusive as to its having been the veritable production of the king, though long disputed; that it went through fifty editions in one year; that Hume declares it to have led to the restoration of the royal family; that it was greatly praised even by Milton, the personal friend of Cromwell; that, as the alleged production of the murdered sovereign, it caused an intense interest throughout the world; and that the critics of the time pronounced it the best specimen of English writing then in existence. The man whose taste and learning are chiefly represented by this admirable library was the Rev. Dr. Samuel Johnson. Here it was that, after his return from New York, surrounded by these venerable tomes, he lived the happy and peaceful life of a Christian scholar, and kept up an extensive correspondence with the most learned and eminent men of England and America. And that mass of correspondence, which is still preserved with an elaborate journal kept by Dr. Samuel, may, perhaps, be considered the very cream of the Johnson library. That portion of it bearing upon church history has already been extensively studied by clerical pilgrims from all parts of the land; while that portion which is of a miscellaneous character, addressed to the rector and senator, is quietly awaiting the fate of all unpublished correspondence by men of distinction. From the latter collection, the writer of this article has been permitted to copy three letters by Bishop Berkeley, Benjamin Franklin, and the great Samuel Johnson of England, the reading of which cannot but be interesting, as fresh material bearing upon the characters of the several distinguished writers.

The first of the letters in question, from the Bishop, exhibits the interest which he felt in King's College, New York, as well as the methodical character of his mind:

CLOYNE, August 23, 1749.

REV. SIR:—I am obliged for the account you have sent me of the prosperous estate of learning in your college of New Haven. I approve of the regulations made there, and am particularly pleased to find your sons have made such progress as appears from their elegant address to me in the Latin tongue. It must indeed give me a very sensible satisfaction to hear that my weak endeavors have been of some service to that part of the world. I have two letters of yours at once on my hands to answer, for which business of various kinds must be my apology. As to the first, wherein you enclosed a small pamphlet relating to tar-water, I can only say in behalf of those points in which the ingenious author seems to differ from me, that I advance nothing which is not grounded on experience, as may be seen at large in Mr. Pryor's narrative of the effects of tar-water, printed three or four years ago, and which may be supposed to have reached America.

For the rest, I am glad to find a spirit towards learning prevails in those parts, particularly New York, where you say a college is projected, which has my best wishes. At the same time, I am sorry that the condition of Ireland, containing such numbers of poor uneducated people, for whose sake charity schools are erecting throughout the kingdom, obligeth us to draw charities from England; so far are we from being able to extend our bounty to New York, a country, in proportion, much richer than our own. But as you are pleased to desire my advice upon this undertaking, I send the following hints, to be enlarged and improved by your own judgment.

I would not advise the applying to England for charters or statutes (which might cause great trouble, expense, and delay), but to do the business quietly within yourselves.

I believe it may suffice to begin with a president and two fellows. If they can procure but three fit persons, I doubt not the college, from the smallest beginnings, would grow considerable. I should conceive good hopes were you at the head of it.

Let them by all means supply themselves out of the seminaries in New England. For I am apprehensive none can be got in Old England (who are willing to go) worth sending.

Let the Greek and Latin classics be well taught. Be this the first care as to learning. But the principal care must be good life and morals, to which (as well as to study) early hours and temperate meals will much conduce.

If the terms for degrees are the same as at Oxford or Cambridge, this would give credit to the college and pave the way for admitting their graduates ad eundem in the English universities.

Small premiums in books or distinctions in habit may prove useful encouragements to the students.

I would advise that the building be regular, plain, and cheap, and that each student have a room (about ten feet square) to himself.

I recommended this nascent seminary to an English bishop, to try what might be done there. But, by his answer, it seems the Colony is judged rich enough to educate its own youth.

Colleges, from small beginnings, grow great by subsequent bequests and benefactions. A small matter will suffice to set one a-going. And when this is once well done, there is no doubt it will go on and thrive. The chief concern must be to set out in a good method and introduce from the first a good taste into society. For this end its principal expense should be in making handsome provision for the president and fellows.

I have thrown together these few crude thoughts for you to ruminate upon and digest in your own judgment, and propone from yourself, as you see convenient.

My correspondence with patients that drink tar-water obliges me to be less punctual in corresponding with my friends. But I shall always be glad to hear from you. My sincere good wishes and prayers attend you in all your laudable undertakings.

I am your faithful servant,

G. Cloyne.

The next letter, which has never been published, is from Benjamin Franklin. Like everything he wrote, it is characteristic of the man.

Philadelphia, August 9, 1750.

Rev. Sir:—At my return home I found your favor of June the 28th, with the Bishop of Cloyne's letter enclosed, which I will take care of, and beg leave to keep a little longer.

Mr. Francis, our Attorney-General, who was with me at your house, from the conversation then had with you, and reading some of your pieces, has conceived an esteem for you equal to mine. The character we have given of you to the other trustees, and the sight of your letters relating to the academy, has made them very desirous of engaging you in that design, as a person whose experience and judgment would be of great use in forming rules and establishing good methods in the beginning, and whose name for learning would give it a reputation. We only lament that, in the infant state of our funds, we cannot make you an offer equal to your merit. But as the view of being useful has most weight with generous and benevolent minds, and in this affair you may do great service, not only to the present, but to future generations, I flatter myself sometimes that, if you were here, and saw things as they are, and conversed a little with our people, you might be prevailed with to remove. I would therefore earnestly press you to make us a visit as soon as you conveniently can, and in the meantime let me represent to you some of the circumstances as they appear to me:

1. The trustees of the academy are applying for a charter, which will give an opportunity of improving and modelling our constitution in such a manner as, when we have your advice, shall appear best. I suppose we shall have power to form a regular college. 2. If you would undertake the management of the English education, I am satisfied the trustees would, on your account, make the salary £100 sterling (they have already voted £150 currency, which is not far from it), and pay the charge of your removal. Your son might also be employed as tutor at £60, or perhaps £70, per annum. 3. It has been long observed that our church is not sufficient to accommodate near the number of people who would willingly have seats there. The buildings increase very fast towards the south end of the town, and many of the principal merchants now live there, which, being at considerable distance from the present church, people begin to talk much of building another; and ground has been offered as a gift for that purpose. The trustees of the academy are, three-fourths of them, members of the Church of England, and the rest men of moderate principles. They have reserved in the large building a large hall for occasional preaching, public lectures, orations, etc.—it is 70 feet by 60, furnished with a handsome pulpit, seats, etc. In this Mr. Tennent collected his congregation, who are now building a meeting-house. In the same place, by giving now and then a lecture, you might with equal ease collect a congregation that would in a short time build you a church (if it should be agreeable to you).

In the meantime, I imagine you will receive something considerable yearly arising from marriages and christenings in the best families, not to mention presents that are not unfrequent from a wealthy people to a minister they like; and though the whole may not amount to more than a due support, yet I think it will be a comfortable one. And when you are well settled in a church of your own, your son may be qualified by years of experience to succeed you in the academy; or if you rather choose to continue in the academy, your son might probably be fixed in the church.

These are my private sentiments, which I have communicated only with Mr. Francis, who entirely agrees with me. I acquainted the trustees that I would write to you, but could give them no dependence that you would be prevailed on to remove. They will, however, treat with no other till I have your answer.

You will see by our new paper, which I enclose, that the corporation of this city have voted £200 down and £100 a year out of their revenues to the trustees of the academy. As they are a perpetual body, choosing their own successors, and so not subject to be changed by the caprice of a governor or of the people, and as eighteen of the members (some of them leading) are of the trustees, we look on this donation to be as good as so much real estate, being confident it will be continued as long as it is well applied, and even increased if there should be occasion. We have now near £5,000 subscribed, and expect some considerable sums besides may be procured from the merchants of London trading hither. And as we are in the centre of the colonies, a healthy place, with plenty of provisions, we purpose a good academy here may draw numbers of youth for education from the neighboring colonies and even from the West Indies.

I will shortly print proposals for publishing your pieces by subscription, and disperse them among my friends along the continent. My compliments to Mrs. Johnson and your son, and Mr. and Mrs. Walker, your good neighbors. I am, with great esteem and respect, sir,

Your most humble servant,

B. Franklin.

To Dr. Samuel Johnson, Stratford.

P.S.—There are some other things best treated of when we have the pleasure of seeing you. It begins now to be pleasant travelling; I wish you would conclude to visit us in the next month at furthest. Whether the journey produce the effect we desire, or not, it shall be no expense to you.

The last of the choice letters to which allusion has been made was written by the author of Rasselas to his friend William S. Johnson, the senator. That gentleman received several others from his illustrious namesake (but who was not a relative), all of which have been lost excepting the one now printed for the first time. When written, poor Boswell must have been asleep, as he does not mention it in his microscopic publication. The allusion in the letter to an Arctic sea would have surprised the late Dr. E. K. Kane.

Sir:—Of all those whom the various vicissitudes of life have brought within my notice, there is scarce any man whose acquaintance I have more desired to cultivate than yours. I cannot indeed charge you with neglecting me, yet our mutual inclination could never gratify itself with opportunities; the current of the day always bore us away from one another. And now the Atlantick is between us.

Whether you carried away an impression of me as pleasing as that which you left me of yourself, I know not; if you did, you have not forgotten me, and will be glad that I do not forget you. Merely to be remembered is indeed a barren pleasure, but it is one of the pleasures which is more sensibly felt as human nature is more exalted.

To make you wish that I should have you in my mind, I would be glad to tell you something which you do not know, but all publick affairs are printed; and as you and I had no common friends I can tell you no private history.

The Government, I think, grows stronger; but I am afraid the next general election will be a time of uncommon turbulence, violence, and outrage.

Of literature no great product has appeared or is expected. The attention of the people has for some years been otherwise employed.

I was told two days ago of a design which must excite some curiosity. Two ships are in preparation, which are under the command of Captain Constantine Phipps, to explore the Northern Ocean; not to seek the North-east or the North-west passage, but to sail directly north, as near the Pole as they can go. They hope to find an open ocean, but I suspect it is one mass of perpetual congelation. I do not much wish well to discoveries, for I am always afraid they will end in conquest and robbery.

I have been out of order this winter, but am grown better. Can I ever hope to see you again? or must I be always content to tell you that in another hemisphere I am, sir,

Your most humble servant,

Saml. Johnson.

Johnson's Court, Fleet Street,
London, March 4, 1773.

To Dr. Johnson, in Stratford, Connecticut.

A desultory account of Stratford, like the present, should not omit an allusion to General David Wooster, who was born here in 1711. He graduated at Yale College in 1738, served as the captain of an armed vessel in the Spanish war, as a captain of militia in the expedition against Louisburg in 1745, went to France with a lot of prisoners, and from thence to England, when he received certain honors, served as commandant of a brigade in the French war, espoused the cause of America in 1764, aided in defending New York, had command of our troops in Canada, where he rendered important services, was subsequently made a major-general of the Connecticut militia, and during a skirmish with the British troops at the time of their incursion to Danbury in 1777, received a shot which terminated his life in a few days. He was a brave officer, an ardent patriot, and a man of the highest integrity and virtue.

But a few additional words must be devoted to the Stratford of the present time. A love of religion and of the intellectual and beautiful seems to permeate its entire population; and although its two leading denominations of Christians were wont to battle valiantly for the cause of truth and prejudice in the olden times, the most perfect harmony now exists between them, and both alike deserve honorable mention for what they have accomplished. To church people alone the history of the Congregational Church is quite as interesting as that of the Episcopal, but the latter had the advantage on the score of general interest on account of its distinguished founder. American literature has also been enriched by two citizens of Stratford now living, viz., Rev. J. Mitchell and J. Olney, Esq. "The Reminiscences of Scenes and Characters of College, by a Graduate of Yale," the work of the former, is an exceedingly well written volume, useful in purpose and full of sound wisdom and Christian feeling. And the same compliment may be paid to his other productions, viz., "Notes from Over the Sea," "My Mother; or, Recollections of Maternal Influence," "Days of Boyhood," a tale entitled "Rachell Kell," and "The New England Churches," in which the subject of Congregationalism is well-nigh exhausted. This gentleman was also for many years editor of the Christian Spectator in New Haven, and his books were published anonymously. The School Geographies and Histories of the latter are well known as having acquired an almost unequalled circulation. While the art treasures of the town are not extensive, there are a few pictures here which will be found worth hunting up by men of taste. In the Johnson Library may be found the best portrait extant of Jonathan Edwards, a connection of the family, painted by or copied after Copley; one of Rev. Dr. Johnson, also by Copley; one of Senator Johnson, by Stuart; and a print of Samuel Johnson of England, after Reynolds, which was presented to Senator Johnson by the original, and pronounced by him the best likeness ever executed.

GOLDEN-HAIRED GERTRUDE,

THE CHOICEST OF JUVENILE BOOKS.

BY

THEODORE TILTON,

Editor of The Independent.

Illustrated from original drawings by H. L. Stephens. Printed on heavy tinted paper of finest finish. Nearly ready.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 Park Row, N. Y.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

SPHERICAL ASTRONOMY.

BY F. BRÜNNOW, Ph.D.

Translated by the author from the second German edition. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $6 50.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

192 BROADWAY.

 Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

OUR MARTYR PRESIDENT.

Now Ready, Price $2,

AGENTS WANTED.

STIER'S WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

HEARTHSTONE SERIES.

SCHÖNBERG-COTTA WORKS.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL BOOKS.

A complete library can be made up from our stock, which includes the lists of all the societies of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.

Terms as low as can be had of the publishing houses.

BOOKS FOR SALE BY

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus,	Barnes' Notes,
Lange's Commentary on Matthew,	Bush's "
Knapp's Christian Theology,	Jacobus' "
McKnight on the Epistles,	Edwards' Works,
Home's Introduction,	Woods' "
Alexander's Commentary,	Kitto's "
Hodge's "	Shedd's Christian Doctrine,
Olshausen's "	Schaff's Church History,
Henry's "	Mosheim's " "
Benson's "	Eusebius' " "
Clark's "

Also, a great variety of Theological Works, Sermons, etc. A liberal discount to ministers.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 PARK ROW, New York.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of stamp.

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen,
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.
	3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

MR. EVERT A. DUYCKINCK has now in preparation a new edition of "The Cyclopædia of American Literature." The work has been for some time out of print and in considerable demand, as copies have lately realized at auction an advance on the publishing price. Messrs. C. Scribner & Co. will issue the new edition in the course of the fall. The additional matter required to bring the work down to the present time, that has accrued during the eight or ten years subsequent to the first impression, will be thrown into a supplement, to be obtained, we believe, separately by those who desire to complete their copies. A fine steel portrait of Mr. G. L. Duyckinck, the coadjutor of his brother in the undertaking, lately deceased, is given, and in compliance with the prevailing taste, a few copies will be printed on large paper for purposes of illustration, etc. The real value of digests like this Cyclopædia is almost more apparent abroad, where sources of knowledge are limited, than at home. The information they contain in regard to the literature of a country like the United States, for instance, is eagerly seized on by librarians, bibliographers, biographers, critics, etc., and the author unconsciously becomes a more potential dispenser of fame than many literary workmen of far higher intentions. The power of a book of reference over its habitual readers is very great—many events and characters have never been able to overcome the effect of a passing sneer or flippant mention in works of this kind. It is matter of congratulation that the task of recording the Fasti of the American republic of letters was undertaken by a scholar who feels as a gentleman and writes with liberal views and enlightened tastes.

—A squabble with their publishers seems to be an indispensable part of the discipline that the lady novelists of our day have to pass through, though, thanks to the growing refinement of the age, it is rarely conducted with the rudeness displayed thirty years since, as when Mr. Colburn, on the day of Lady Morgan's leaving him for a new publisher, advertised all her books at half price by way of revenge for the desertion. The difficulties of the present day have almost invariably arisen from one cause. Most of the authoresses whose names now give currency to fictitious literature, as Miss Braddon, Miss Annie Thomas, Miss Edwards, etc., have been industrious but undistinguished writers in periodical publications before they have achieved the success that at last gives them a name and an envied station among their contemporaries. No sooner is this accomplished than the productions of their immature talent, thrown off in a hurry, "à vil prix," for some insignificant magazine, are instantly fished out of their obscurity, luxuriously set forth in leaded type, advertised far and wide as "the new work of the talented authoress of etc., etc." The provocation is doubtless great in such a case, and it must be said the injured parties have been by no means backward in proclaiming their wrongs to a listening world. The latest instance of the kind is a public remonstrance from Miss Edwards, who finds a collection of reprinted stories from "Household Words," that she wished to call with severe humility "Waste Paper," announced as "Miss Carew: a new novel by the author of Barbara's Husband." In this case, the blame is thrown on an irresponsible clerk, and an apology suffices to restore good feeling all around.

—With the great revival that is in progress of the study of American history in all its departments, the French seem suddenly to have woke up to a sense of the important part they once played in the discovery and development of the continent of North America. Though they were doomed to give place to more fortunate if not more adventurous successors, it is in their language that the earliest records of the history of Canada, Western New York, and the North-western Territory generally must be sought; and seemingly late in the day, it is pleasant to find that literary men and publishers are hastening to reproduce, either from rare editions or MSS., the fugitive tracts, pamphlets, etc., that narrate the first steps of the progress that culminates in the creation of a mighty state. The excellent market that the United States offers for works of the kind is probably a stimulus, and a legitimate one, for their production. M. Edwin Tross, of Paris, has done good service in this line as a publisher. In November next he will complete the republication in four volumes of Father Sagard's "Grand Voyage du Pays des Hurons, situé en l'Amerique vers la Mer douce (Lake Ontario) es dernier confins de la Nouvelle France." This includes the good Father's Dictionary of the Huron Language, which—ever since Lord Monboddo in the last century discerned its philological value—has been almost unfindable. M. Tross has also reproduced the original narrative of Jacques Cartier's voyage of discovery "aux Isles de Canada, Hochelaga, Saguenay, et autres," in 1535 and 1536, from the excessively rare edition of 1545. He has now, in addition, in press a volume of inedited documents relating to a still earlier voyage by Cartier in 1534, lately discovered, and now edited from the originals by Alfred Ramè. In this connexion we may mention that proposals have been issued by Mr. J. G. Shea, our first scholar in Franco-American history, for a translation of the great work of Father Charlevoix, "History and Description of New France." The only portion ever published in English is the personal narrative, forming less than a third of the work. The remainder, digested from the journals of the missionaries and many sources now no longer extant, has never appeared, except in its original form. The translation will make five volumes octavo, printed in superior style, and, enriched as it is with the annotations of the editor, may be regarded as a complete thesaurus of our early history.

—At a late meeting of the Ethnological Society of London, the inexhaustible antiquarian theme for discussion—Stonehenge—was made the subject of a paper by a distinguished Swedish savant, Professor Nilsson. Having enjoyed the advantage of an acquaintance with the primeval monuments of Scandinavia, he was enabled to take a wider and more enlarged view of the origin of this unique structure and its relation to other prehistoric remains than is usually adopted by English antiquarians. The paper itself, and the debate that followed, give a résumé of the latest theories on the subject, and show conclusively that only negative results have been reached. The popular hypothesis that would connect Stonehenge with the Druids and their rites is almost entirely discarded, and though some still call it a solar temple and look to the Phœnicians for its origin, with our knowledge of ancient remains the probabilities daily increase that the monument is sepulchral in its purpose, as in all barbarous and semi-civilized nations the most stupendous works have been erected for the dead, and the energies of the living have found their most earnest expression in this service.

—It is to be hoped that Messrs. Ticknor & Fields will soon give us an edition of a new book of Eastern life, "Letters from Egypt," by Lady Duff Gordon. A better companion for Lord Dufferin's capital "Letters from High Latitudes" could not be found. The book is a charming and thoroughly womanly one. Human beings, and not dead antiquities, "the neglected races that come in contact with civilization, only to feel its resistless force and its haughty indifference or contempt," were the objects that engaged the active sympathies of the author of these letters, written (as we learn from the prefatory notice by her mother) under the influence of dangerous disease, in the dreariness of solitude and isolation from all the objects of the dearest affections. Who shall wonder that, approached in this spirit of large humanity, the "soul of goodness" gushed out among the poor Fellaheen responsively to the expansive charity (in its widest sense) of the "Sitt Inkeleezeeyeh," the English lady, requiting her with grateful affection and boundless confidence. The English reviews have been unanimous in their praises of this volume, but they seem not to have recognized in the author one to whom talent should be a hereditary possession, as the daughter of John Austin, the jurist, and Mrs. Sarah Austin, one of the most accomplished women of the day. Lady Duff Gordon is, we believe, an only child. There is what Thackeray might call a fine Amontillado flavor about her married name, derived from her husband's father, the first baronet, who was Consul-General at Cadiz, and head of a mercantile house that for years made the "Duff Gordon" brand synonymous with the choicest Sherries.

—If the English as a nation retain their former characteristics of inordinate self-satisfaction and conceit, it is not for want of having their faults pointed out to them. The purport of Mr. Ruskin's late volume, "Sesame and Lilies," has been summed up as, "First, the villany and degradation of English people in general; and secondly, the selfishness and frivolity of the English women in particular. His abundant rhetoric runs riot on this theme, and without reprinting the whole volume it is difficult to give an idea of its abounding richness of vituperation. A late painful accident in Switzerland is recalled by a paragraph on the travelling English:

"You have despised nature; that is to say, all deep and sacred sensation of natural scenery. . . . . There is not a quiet valley in England that you have not filled with bellowing fires; there is no particle left of English land that you have not trampled coal-ashes into, nor any foreign city in which the spread of your presence is not marked among its fair old streets and happy gardens by a consuming white leprosy of new hotels and perfumers' shops. The Alps themselves, that your own poets used to love so reverently, you look upon as soaped poles in a bear garden, which you set yourselves to climb and slide down again with 'shrieks of delight.' When you are past shrieking, having no human articulate voice to say you are glad with, you fill the quietude of the valleys with gunpowder blasts, and rush home red with cutaneous eruption of conceit, and voluble with convulsive hiccough of self-satisfaction."

—Victor Hugo is about leaving, it is said, his abode in the Channel Islands to take up his residence in Belgium. His new work, now just ready to put into the hands of the publisher, will be an enduring memorial of his ten or twelve years' domiciliation within sight of the shores of his beloved France—"Les Travailleurs de la Mer." The "Sea Workers" is called in the English papers a novel, but it is said to be more correctly estimated as a view, pictorial, psychological, etc., of the coast life of the Channel Islands, the sole remains of the ancient Duchy of Normandy that continue in the possession of the English crown. Mr. Carleton, the publisher of "Les Misérables," has completed his arrangements for the early issue of "Les Travailleurs" in an English dress. It is worthy of remark, as showing the wide difference of taste existing between the two countries, that the success of "Les Misérables" in England was very slight; only one edition of the translation was printed after a considerable time, and that was anything but a success. Here the sale must have considerably exceeded one hundred thousand copies, and the work proved literally a fortune to its proprietors. Among Mr. Carleton's other novelties, forthcoming in the fall, is a new book by Mrs. Mowatt Ritchie; a "History of the Humbugs of the World," by P. T. Barnum ("he best can paint them who has felt them most"); and a comic pictorial record of a visit to Cuba, in the style of "Brown, Jones & Robinson's Tour," from the pencil of the publisher, himself an amateur artist, whose efforts, hitherto confined to private circles, need not fear comparison with professional rivalry.

—Since it seems Prof. Child's projected edition of Chaucer is not likely to be proceeded with, and the similar style of critical edition, founded on an exhaustive collation of the various MSS. texts, announced by Dr. Earle, Anglo-Saxon professor at Oxford, cannot see the light for a long time, if indeed it is even yet seriously undertaken, it is fortunate for the rapidly increasing number of students in Old English literature that an edition of Chaucer's poetical works may be looked for speedily in Messrs. Bell & Daldy's reissue of "The Aldine Poets." It has been undertaken by Mr. Richard Morris, well known for his able treatises on Early English Dialects and his masterly edition of Hampole's "Pricke of Conscience," "Sir Gawayn," etc. The text will not be an eclectic one, but the best MS. of each poem will be followed, with collations from a few other good MSS. when possible. The glossary will no doubt receive a due share of the editor's attention. Scarcely anything has been done in this department for the special illustration of Chaucer since the days of Tyrwhit, whose work has, of course, no pretensions to represent the progress made in philological studies during the seventy-five years subsequent to its date.

—The recent formation in England, under the highest auspices, of a "Palestine Expedition Fund," is meeting with fair encouragement. The sum already raised and placed at the disposal of the committee is £2,000. It is remarkable that while all our great triumphs over the past have been trophies won by the spade—as witness the resuscitation of Nineveh, Memphis, the Halicarnassean Mausoleum, Pompeii, ancient Etruria, etc.—excavation has never been attempted in Palestine, so far as we have any record, while unquestionably the whole soil is teeming with memorials of the different strata of populations that have succeeded each other in its occupancy. The operations of the society will commence with excavating in Jerusalem, and Captain Wilson, whose remarkable discoveries under the wall of the Temple enclosure have been lately described, and who has lately returned from the East, is engaged on a report of the propriety and feasibility of explorations of this nature. Meanwhile disputes become so hot on the various subjects of controversy, especially the identification of sacred sites, that it will be well if some decisive method of settling the doubtful points is attainable. Mr. Ferguson, who saw at a glance of Mr. Arundel's drawings that the capitals of the columns in the Mosque of Omar could not be Saracenic, but were unquestionably debased Roman, and jumped to the conclusion that the so-called Mosque was Constantine's basilica built over the Holy Sepulchre, does not consider himself sufficiently answered when he is told that ancient remains have always been worked up into more recent buildings, and still persists, in lectures, books, magazines, etc., to advocate his views. His pertinacity has even obtained him command of the important channel of Smith's "Bible Dictionary," in which his hypothesis is set forth as if it was the only one, though not a single writer or traveller besides its author has ever adopted it. An immense number of collateral questions on this and other Biblical topics are now the source of lively discussion, and can only be set at rest by a scientific exploration of the Holy Land, such as we now hope to see performed.

—The remains, or salvage stock, of Mr. George Offor's Biblical library, the destruction of which by fire was mentioned in a late number of our journal, have been sold at a low price to Mr. Stevens, the American book agent. So that, if the restorers and bookbinders can reproduce any of the rescued fragments in a merchantable condition (and wonders have been wrought in this way by skill and taste) American libraries may yet be enriched with some of these unique gems. Ever since the value of books has been recognized, and the critical study of the Scriptures has assumed the proportions of a science, collections of the various forms in which the sacred writings have appeared have always engaged the time and attention of the curious. The grand ducal library of Wirtemberg, at Stuttgard, has generally been considered to be the most copious existing in this department. Eighty years ago it was stated to possess over nine thousand different editions of the Bible. The best known modern collectors in England have been the Duke of Sussex, whose library was more extensive than choice or select, and was dispersed after his death; Mr. Lea Wilson, a London merchant, who pursued the study of the various English versions with far greater accuracy than had ever before been attempted, and wrote the best account of them in a valuable catalogue that now sells for about ten guineas—his library came into the hands of Mr. Pickering, and was divided among his customers; Rev. Christopher Anderson, author of "Annals of the English Bible," who had amassed a curious collection, with small means, by entire devotion to one subject: it was sold by auction at his death; Mr. George Offor, beforementioned; and Mr. Francis Fry, of Coatham Tower, near Bristol. Mr. Fry's collection is the only one of those above-named that remains entire. He is known by several beautiful publications connected with Biblical pursuits—one of them a verbatim and literatim fac-simile of William Tyndale's first English Testament, a volume of several hundred pages, and perhaps the largest and most beautiful fac-simile ever published. American collectors are fortunate in coming after these pioneers of the study. The library of Mr. James Lenox, in particular, can show numerous spoils from each of the above-mentioned sources, and certainly exceeds any one of them in value and extent. Like all other pursuits, the more it is studied, the more inexhaustible appear the varieties of Biblical bibliography. The constantly recurring notices of a "very old Bible" that run through the country papers in a dull season, show how natural and deeply rooted are feelings of curiosity on the subject.

—Competitive examinations are now the gates through which all the civil and military employés of the English Government must pass, and the general prevalence of the system must shortly change the long accepted current plans of education. Already it has a literature of its own—books constructed, as its enemies aver, for the purpose of "cramming" the memory of the candidate with the greatest number of facts at the least possible expenditure of time and intellect. A report by Dr. Dasent (the well known Scandinavian scholar) on the examination of candidates for admission to the Royal Academy, Woolwich, gives some insight into the working of the system. The applicants were between the ages of 16 and 19, belonging to the upper classes of society, and of superior average intelligence—the greatest number of marks for proficiency being given for Greek and mathematics. Yet in modern history, the transactions of the last thirty or forty years, which every one is supposed to be familiar with, the ignorance displayed was astounding. Dr. Dasent says: "One of my questions asked for information respecting the Princess Charlotte, Prince Leopold, Lord Liverpool, and Daniel O'Connell." The Princess Charlotte was usually supposed to be the wife of George IV., and Prince Leopold was every one but himself; as to Daniel O'Connell, to most of the candidates, and even to those of his own country, he was a thoroughly mythical personage—he was generally confounded with Mr. Smith O'Brien, and made to die in exile after having risen against the Government and being captured in a cabbage garden. To some he was a great Orangeman in the time of William III.; one youth boldly identified him with St. Patrick, and declared he had expelled snakes from Ireland! Such is fame to the rising generation. A curious ethnological fact is said to have been the result of competition. It is well known that in many branches of the service, and particularly in India, Scotchmen have long had a monopoly of Government offices, through family connexions, etc. At competitive examinations the happy constitutional audacity of the Irish character, which dashes right or wrong at an answer, is said to carry the day against Scotch caution, fearful of committing itself, and the proportion of successful candidates of the two nations is gradually changing in favor of the former.

ST. PHILIP'S.*

THE evangelic admonition against putting old wine into new bottles seems to have almost entirely faded from the minds of the popular writers of the present day. Were this the whole extent of the transgression, we could swallow the draught with tolerable equanimity. But when we open the new bottle with the fresh label warranting the contents to be a superior article of the favorite brand, we find only a hurriedly concocted mixture, compounded of the lees left in the old bottles with much water and the acrid results of their earliest attempts at wine-making. There are but very few authors, who have come into notoriety within the last ten years, whose literary career is not a striking example of the rhetorical figure called anti-climax; few who have not taken advantage of the cordial reception of one well-matured work to thrust down the public throat some of the immature essays on which they had before practised their pen. There is hardly any position, we know, so beset with temptations as that of a successful author. Vanity is continually urging him to new efforts to retain the attractive honors of a place in the public mouth; the proverbial itch of composition has become a settled malady, and will not let him sleep; enterprising publishers, whose patronage ensures large sales and commendatory notices from two-thirds of the public journals, assail him with dazzling offers for "something from his gifted pen." But if the conscientious earnestness of the artist will not enable him to resist these enticements, at least common sense ought to tell him that an author's reputation, like a good many other things, will not bear too much handling.

* "St. Philip's. By the Author of Rutledge." New York. Carleton. 1865.

To the provoking class of books which are produced in this way belongs St. Philip's. It is a work hastily manufactured for the summer market, to be sold by the aid of the author's reputation and the publisher's influence, and must be disappointing to all who have read the former works from the same pen, and who had hoped on taking this one that they might find in it the unequal excellences of its predecessors here harmoniously combined and their suggestive promises fulfilled. In its characters, scenes, and plot it is principally a weak repetition of "Rutledge." The nameless heroine of that work, the wilful and perverse young brunette, in the author's third work christened Frank, here does service again under the name of Madeline. In Dr. Catherwood we recognize our old friend Mr. Rutledge, and the Victor of Rutledge has been mercilessly severed in twain, and as the fashionable adventurer and forward rival is called Colonel Steele, while as the murderer to be concealed by the heroine, and by his death to remove all the impediments to the course of true love, he is named Julian.

The characters have, indeed, had their outlines made more definite, and are kept in more stable equilibrium than in "Rutledge," but possess little power or range, and are commonplace in kind. Even if the author had to compose in so great haste, and had so exhausted her stock of characters that she could give us nothing new for hero or heroine, it seems to us that at least she might have had the discretion to choose for production characters with which we are all less familiar. We would respectfully suggest not only to the author of "Rutledge," but to the authors of the present day in general, that a heroine who was not sweet seventeen, all unsophisticated in the ways of the world, yet painfully mature intellectually, and a hero not twice said heroine's age, deep, grave, imperturbable, with his past history invested with a tantalizing mystery, would have, if nothing else, the spice that is afforded by variety. The old doctrine of the Pythagoreans, that the souls of men migrate from body to body, assuming a new name and fleshly habiliment as soon as their career in one is finished, though long discarded by the rest of mankind, seems yet in these latter days to have been adopted by the novel writers. In almost every new story that we take up we recognize several old acquaintances whom we have seen "wooed and married and a'" long ago, now brought out from the waters of the literary Lethe perfectly rejuvenated, and in the thinnest of disguises, little more than a new surname often, commencing their devious courses again, utterly untutored by all their past experience. Pythagoras himself, it is said, on beholding the ancient armor of Euphorbus, recognized them as his own old weapons, and recalled the deeds he had done in front of Troy five hundred years before. So, we fancy, the hero of "St. Philip's," reading the novels of the last twenty years, from "Jane Eyre" downwards, might be able to identify himself under some score of aliases, and count up a whole harem of young maidens, heiresses and orphans, blondes and brunettes, whose hearts and hands he had successively charmed away into his own keeping; and we are very sure that he must by this time have become intensely tired of the monotony of continually making his entrée on the scene as "a solitary horseman riding slow and thoughtfully along by the light of the moon" (vide p. 22), and must think that whatever romantic charm that mode of introduction may have had at first, has now disappeared.

The scenes and incidents of St. Philip's are pretty much the same as in the author's former works—a party, a fête champêtre, runaway horses, a rescue, and so forth. Several of these retain the old vigor of description, and are the best parts of the book. The conversation, however, is almost entirely destitute of the spirit and somewhat elaborate point which characterized it in the author's previous books, and generally preserves a safe tameness and matter-of-fact character, varied chiefly by two or three passages of the silliest chatter about dress, admirers, and intended conquests that we have ever had the misfortune to read or hear, and by two or three attempts at heart-rending pathos resulting only in bathos.

The plot of St. Philip's shows the same marks of haste as the rest of the book. It is loose and ill-jointed, and to get along with it at all the author is driven to most amusing chronological shifts. However common-place St. Philip's may be in other respects, in its chronology it certainly possesses distinction. It is a curious refutation of the favorite argument of a certain school of historical critics, that the author of any fictitious work, having entire control over the events which he himself creates, would be sure to avoid or rectify all palpable contradictions in dates or numbers, and that such contradictions, paradoxical as it may seem, are really evidences of the authenticity and uncorrupted character of the narrative. On page 43, the heroine is stated to have received an invitation to a certain party on a fine July day when the orchard trees were full of fine fruit. Six weeks pass away, yet still it is only a July day, the third Sunday after Trinity. (Vide pp. 82 and 88.) On page 109, the party is stated to have taken place on the 18th of June. Suppose that in the former statement July was a misprint for June, and that the apples were unusually early, yet (as may be seen by consulting a book not particularly rare, and with which an author so intensely High Church as the author of "Rutledge" and "The Sutherlands" ought to be familiar, viz., the Prayer Book of the Episcopal Church) the latest day on which Trinity Sunday can fall is the 20th of June; the third Sunday after Trinity cannot then be later than the 11th of July, while six weeks after the 18th of June brings us to the 30th of July, and six weeks before the 11th of July carries us back into May.

The child Julian's age fares still worse. It is knocked backwards and forwards like a shuttlecock, to suit the exigencies of the story. On page 9 it is stated that his mother was only married ten years before, and two years after that period he is only eleven; but on page 143, in the course of the same summer, Dr. Catherwood, who turns out in the sequel to be his father, declares that he is fourteen, though he fails to explain how he suddenly became three years older in the course of as many months. Eleven pages further on, the same authority puts his age back to twelve; but after the lapse of only three years he is found to have attained the age of seventeen. On page 41 the heroine is six years older than Julian; but when Julian has reached seventeen the heroine is only a little over twenty (p. 252). We have, indeed, known several young ladies in actual life who by their own statements about their age ceased to grow any older after they had reached the age of twenty; but we were always somewhat suspicious of the reality of the phenomenon; but when an authoress makes her heroine, whom she holds up to admiration as a shining example of truth and simplicity, also cease to increase in years at the same identical period of life, we confess that our scepticism commences to give way.

Thus far we have given only the defective side of the book. Its style, though somewhat bare and stiff, is with slight exceptions simple and direct. Its dissertative passages are excellent, and its moral tone thoroughly pure and healthy. It will not compare unfavorably with many of the books annually turned out to fill up the spare hours of travellers and watering-place idlers without exciting an uncomfortable amount of either feeling, thought, or interest. But it is very much below the level of the author's former works, and the custom, of which this book is a very plain example, of writers using their literary reputation not as a spur to higher achievements, but as the means of extracting money and attention from the public, publishing whatever mental patchwork they may choose to baste together, is becoming so common as richly to deserve reprobation.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

A View at the Foundations. By Woodbury M. Fernald. (William V. Spencer, Boston.)—The remainder of the title is more explicit of the aim of this treatise: "First causes of character, as operative before birth, from hereditary and spiritual sources." We have here a most important subject discussed in a pure and deeply earnest spirit, and in language carefully chosen and unobjectionable. It is no drawback that the author writes from a religious motive; he would be unfit for his task unless he did; but he has lessened the popular attractiveness of his book—we mean among the virtuous and right-minded—and, we think, weakened his argument also, by a metaphysico-theological investigation of the nature of the soul. It requires a special training and a peculiar cast of intellect to comprehend or even to study with satisfaction the doctrines of Swedenborg, whose stock-words frequently have to be left in their original Latin because no single English word or moderate paraphrase can express the ideas which they embody. The physical argument, on the other hand, is sufficient. The anatomist, the physiologist, the phrenologist, concur in depicting the miseries which arise from the abuse of the parental functions and relations. When jails and idiot and insane asylums show us the wreck of the dwelling of the soul, it is needless to enquire the nature of the immortal inmate before concluding that it suffers a corresponding ruin. What Mr. Fernald has written, however, deserves well to be read and pondered by those to whom he has dedicated it—"all the married, but particularly those who contemplate entering that holy union."

Photographic History. The War for the Union. (E. & H. T. Anthony & Co., New York.)—These specimens of photography, designed for the stereoscope, are among the clearest and best that we have seen. A dozen that lie before us bring up vividly some of the most prominent scenes in the drama of the late rebellion. Here are alike the instruments of ruin and the ruin itself—views from the cradle and views from the grave of secession. The sea-face of Fort Sumter, a battered cathedral in Charleston, the desolate walls of fire-ravaged Richmond, stand out with lamentable distinctness. Here is a Union battery preparing for action; in these three pictures are the bodies of fallen rebels as they lay when Petersburg was taken by storm. A shell, dropping into the water of the Dutch Gap canal, has raised a mist which is preserved for us on paper long after it has evaporated from the living air. From Lookout Mountain we survey the Chattanooga Valley. St. John's church, Richmond, is where Patrick Henry said: "If this be treason, make the most of it." But he was thinking of that rebellion to tyrants which is obedience to God.

The American Annual Cyclopædia and Register of Important Events of the Year 1864. Embracing Political, Civil, Military, and Social Affairs, Public Documents, Biography, Statistics, Commerce, Finance, Literature, Science, Agriculture, and Mechanical Industry. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)—It is difficult to criticize a publication of this kind, for the reason that there is not, and in the nature of things cannot be, any invariable standard by which to measure its success. Nobody who has not put himself in the position of the editor can say what ought or what ought not to have been recorded, due consideration being had to the capacity of the volume to be produced. Faults of detail, errors and inaccuracies of greater or less proportions, are doubtless discoverable, but one may spare himself the trouble of looking for them: they were inevitable. We can afford to be grateful that, with all the omissions that may be remarked, so much of what is valuable has been collected within moderate compass, and that there is a general accuracy which may be trusted implicitly. The utility of this excellent register is too apparent for praise. A few of the titles will indicate its scope: Army operations; Confederate and United States Congresses; geographical explorations and discoveries; commerce; literature and literary progress; patents, etc., etc. Every State appears in alphabetical order. The obituary includes the distinguished dead of all nations. The engravings, chiefly portraits, without being remarkable, add something to the worth of the "Cyclopædia."

The White Mountain Guide Book. Fifth edition. (Edson C. Eastman, Concord, N. H.; D. Appleton & Co., New York.)—Mr. Eastman's manual has established its superiority over every rival, and is as likely to reach a fifteenth as a fifth edition. A railroad and a topographical map are given to aid the traveller from a distance and the explorer on the spot.

Mitchell's New School Atlas. Mitchell's New School Geography. By S. Augustus Mitchell. (E. H. Butler & Co., Philadelphia.)—These books we take to be at least as good as any of their kind now in use in our public schools. The original editions were for a long time favorite with the teachers of the East, and may be yet, for aught we know. We notice that, except for an allusion to the census of 1860, there is nothing in the geography by which one could learn that slavery ever existed in the United States. Indeed, in describing the population of each State, the people of color are ignored altogether. Mr. Mitchell may have meant to know only Americans henceforth. A pronouncing vocabulary in the atlas is a new and valuable feature.

A Book of Golden Deeds of All Times and All Lands. Gathered and narrated by the author of the "Heir of Redclyffe." (Sever & Francis, Cambridge.)—The "Golden Treasury Series" is still further enriched by this elegant compilation, made, as the preface informs us, for youth and for the intelligent but uninstructed classes of the people. It is written in pure and easy English, and is well adapted for reading aloud in the family. The title is not too comprehensive. The stories of Alcestis and Antigone in the past to which no date can be exactly assigned introduce the golden deeds which are to terminate in Australia in 1864. Classic, mediæval, and modern anecdotes are arranged chronologically, and are borrowed from the four quarters of the globe. The conception and execution of this book are in every way creditable to editor and publisher.

The Words of the Lord Jesus. By Rudolf Stier, D.D. Vol. I. (N. Tibbals, New York).—This exegesis of the sayings of Jesus is a reprint from the English translation of the original German, made some ten years ago. It is a very elaborate, analytical work, of great popularity among the author's countrymen, and sufficiently so in its present guise to warrant its introduction into this country. It has been revised by two very competent American editors. The volume before us contains "our Lord's first words, and the gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke specially." Its place is alike in the household and the study.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Affixes in their Origin and Application, exhibiting the Etymologic Structure of English Words. By S. S. Haldeman, A.M.—A System of Modern Geography. By S. Augustus Mitchell.—Mitchell's Modern Atlas. E. H. Butler & Co., Philadelphia.

The White Mountain Guide Book. Fifth edition. Edson C. Eastman, Concord, N. H. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Diary of a Soldier and Prisoner of War in the Rebel Prisons. Written by Eugene Forbes. Murphy & Bechtel, Trenton, N. J.

The Safeguards of Personal Liberty. An Address by Hon. Wm. D. Kelley. Philadelphia.

The Trapper's Guide. By S. Newhouse. Oneida Community, Wallingford, Conn.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,

46 Pine Street, New York,

BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.

JOSEPH W. WILDEY, Secretary.

E. W. CLARK & CO.,

BANKERS AND BROKERS,

35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS, COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,

108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000
Surplus, over - - - - - - - - - - - 400,000

This Company insures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND INLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

If Premiums are Paid in Gold, Losses will be Paid in Gold.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
EDWARD A. STANSBURY, 2d Vice-President.
JOHN C. GOODRIDGE, Secretary.

BILLS ON LONDON

At Sixty Days' Sight and at Three Days' Sight, for sale by

WARD, CAMPBELL & CO.,

56 Wall Street, New York.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,

56 WALL STREET.

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world

VERMILYE & CO.,

BANKERS,

44 Wall Street, N. Y.,

GOVERNMENT LOAN AGENTS,

KEEP ON HAND, FOR

IMMEDIATE DELIVERY,

THE ISSUES OF

7.30 TREASURY NOTES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS.

We BUY and SELL all classes of GOVERNMENT SECURITIES at market rates.

ORDERS from BANKS and BANKERS executed on favorable terms, and with dispatch.

Also, receive DEPOSITS, and ALLOW INTEREST on current balances.

VERMILYE & CO.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL - - - - - - - - - - -	$1,000,000 00
ASSETS - - - - - - - - - - - -	1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.

PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY,

OFFICE, 111 BROADWAY.

ASSETS, January 1, 1865, - - - - $1,140,628 89

DIVIDEND, Thirty-seven and One-half per cent.

This Company insures against MARINE and INLAND NAVIGATION risks on Cargo and Freight.

No Time Risks, or risks upon Hulls of Vessels, are taken.

The Profits of the Company, ascertained, from January 10, 1855, to January 1, 1864, for which certificates were issued, amount to.....	$1,437,700 00
Additional profits from January 1, 1864, to January 1, 1865.....	324,385 73
Total Profits for ten years.....	$1,762,085 73
The Certificates previous to 1862 have been redeemed by cash.....	$1,065,960 00

NEW YORK, Feb. 10, 1865.

ALFRED EDWARDS, Pres.
WM. LECONEY, Vice-Pres.

THOMAS HALE, Secretary.

THE

MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY,

COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.

JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.

CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $803,137.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary. B. C. MORRIS, President.

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

OF NEW YORK.

Assets, July 1, 1865, over - - - - - -	$13,000,000
Cash Income, 1864, nearly - - - - - -	3,000,000

FREDERICK S. WINSTON, PRESIDENT.

Offices, 144 and 146 Broadway, cor. Liberty St.

Endowment Policies, Ten-year Policies, and Life Policies are issued by this Company on the most favorable terms.

ALL THE POLICIES OF THIS COMPANY PARTICIPATE IN THE SURPLUS, THE WHOLE OF WHICH IS DIVIDED ANNUALLY IN THE MOST EQUITABLE MANNER AMONG THE POLICY-HOLDERS.

Dividends of return premiums will be paid in CASH, or may be used if preferred in the form of additional insurance.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

FREDERICK S. WINSTON,	HENRY E. DAVIES,	ALEX. W. BRADFORD,
JOHN V. L. PRUYN,	OLIVER H. PALMER,	DAVID HOADLEY,
WILLIAM MOORE,	SAM'L E. SPROULLS,	HENRY A. SMYTHE,
ROBERT [redacted]. McCURDY,	SAM'L M. CORNELL,	WILLIAM V. BRADY,
ISAAC GREEN PEARSON,	LUCIUS ROBINSON,	W. E. DODGE,
MARTIN BATES, JR.,	W. SMITH BROWN,	GEORGE S. COE,
WILLIAM BETTS,	RICHARD PATRICK,	WM. K. STRONG,
JOHN P. YELVERTON,	WILLIAM H. POPHAM,	WM. M. VERMILYE,
JOHN WADSWORTH,	WILLIAM A. HAINES,	JOHN E. DEVELIN,
ALFRED EDWARDS,	EZRA WHEELER,	WELLINGTON CLAPP,
NATHANIEL HAYDEN,	SEYMOUR L. HUSTED,	M. M. FREEMAN,
JOHN M. STUART,	SAMUEL D. BABCOCK,	ALONZO CHILD.

Secretaries, { ISAAC ABBATT, THEO. W. MORRIS. Actuary, SHEPPARD HOMANS. Cashier, FRED. M. WINSTON.

Medical Examiners, { MINTURN POST, M.D., ISAAC L. KIP, M.D.

Counsel, { WILLIAM BETTS, LL.D., Hon. LUCIUS ROBINSON. Attorney, RICHARD A. McCURDY.

Applications and communications from persons in the undermentioned States to be through General Agents in their respective districts.

F. RATCHFORD STARR, General Agent at Philadelphia, for the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Delaware.

HALE REMINGTON, General Agent at Fall River, for the New England States.

H. B. MERRELL, General Agent at Detroit, Michigan, for the States of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota.

L. SPENCER GOBLE, General Agent at Newark, for the State of New Jersey.

J. A. RHODES, General Agent for New York and vicinity, office, 5 Wall Street.

H. S. HOMANS, General Agent at San Francisco, for California and Oregon.

AETNA INSURANCE COMPANY, OF HARTFORD,

INCORPORATED 1819. CHARTER PERPETUAL.

Paid up Capital, - -	$2,250,000 00
Assets, July 1, 1865, - -	3,850,351 78
Losses Paid in 45 Years, -	$17,485,894 71

T. A. ALEXANDER, Pres't. L. J. HENDEE, Sec'y.
JONA. GOODWIN, Jr., A. Sec'y.

Insurance against loss and damage by Fire, and of Inland Navigation.

NEW YORK AGENCY, 62 WALL STREET.
JAS. A. ALEXANDER, AGENT.

F. W. WORTH. LOOMIS L. WHITE. H. B. KEEN

WORTH, WHITE & KEEN,

BANKERS,

47 WALL STREET,

(Offices formerly occupied by Messrs. W. C. Pickersgill & Co.)

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Orders executed in Gold, Railway Stocks, and Bonds, at the Stock Exchange.

Four per Cent. Interest allowed on all deposits.

FIRST CLASS FIRE INSURANCE

ON THE PARTICIPATION PLAN.

MARKET FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

37 WALL STREET, CORNER OF JAUNCEY COURT.

CONDITION OF THE COMPANY.

ABSTRACT OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF DEC. 31, 1864.

TOTAL ASSETS		$414,729 18
Viz.—Bonds and Mortgages	$134,672 00
Temporary Loans	92,630 00
Real Estate	10,000 00
100 Shares Mer. Ex. Bank	5,000 00
Government Sec., value	144,514 00
Cash on hand	18,042 34
Interest due	3,085 58
Premiums due	6,785 26
PRESENT LIABILITIES		$15,995 92
NET SURPLUS		198,733 26

This Company will continue, as heretofore, to insure respectable parties against DISASTER BY FIRE

At fair and remunerating rates; extending, according to the terms on its Policies, the advantage of the

PARTICIPATION PLAN OF THE COMPANY,

pursued by it for several years past, with such great success and popularity, and profit to its customers: whereby

(75) SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT. (75)

of the Profits, instead of being withdrawn from the Company in Dividends to Stockholders, is invested as a "SCRIP FUND," and held for greater protection of its Policyholders; and Scrip, bearing interest, is issued to Customers therefor: thus, IN THIS COMPANY, those who furnish the business, AND PAY THE PREMIUMS, derive the largest share of advantages; and when the accumulations of the SCRIP FUND shall exceed

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,

the excess will be applied to PAY OFF the Scrip IN CASH in the order of its issue.

☞ The liberal and prompt adjustment of Claims for Loss, WHEN FAIR AND SQUARE, is a specialty with this Company.

NOTE.—This Company does not insure on the hazards of RIVER, LAKE, or INLAND NAVIGATION; confining itself strictly to a legitimate FIRE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

ASHER TAYLOR, President.

H. P. FREEMAN, Secretary.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY A.M.

THE business of importation during the week has been very active, and that of exportation has more than doubled on the previous week's return of domestic produce shipped abroad. The declared value of the latter is $3,850,000. The receipts of cotton, which were over 15,000 bales last week, closely approach 18,000 bales this week. The amount of gold paid into the Treasury for customs during the week is nearly two and a half millions. It is believed that the Secretary of the Treasury has disposed of a million and a half of this sum in the open market at 143½ to 144½ per cent., since when the price of gold has fallen to 141 to 140½ per cent. The Secretary will pay out next week $10,950,000 for interest in currency on the first series of $300,000,000 of the 7.30 loan. This sum is taken out of his customs revenue, which is collected exclusively in gold, at a cost of not over $7,500,000, thus reducing the actual gold charge on the 7.30 currency loan to 5 per cent. per annum.

The gold speculation through the week has been sustained with more difficulty than on the previous report, and on Thursday the market gave way two per cent.—down to 142 per cent.—and yesterday one and a half per cent. additional. The abundance of gold among the brokers is the alleged cause of this weakness, but the presumption is fair that the recent combination to put up the price to 150 per cent. has failed because it had no support in the shape of an export demand, and very little from the large daily demand to pay customs, because of the sales from the Treasury Office. These sales have been conducted with great circumspection, and without the direct agency of the gold brokers, but they have not the less answered the double purpose of supplying the Government with ten millions of interest money, and of checking the upward speculation in gold, which had evidently been based on the calculation that the Government would continue to accumulate gold through its large July and August customs revenue, until the supply in the open market could be fairly "cornered" upon the importing merchants, and controlled by the "cornerers" in the gold exchange.

The price of money is firm at 7 per cent. to the brokers and 7 to 9 per cent. on mercantile paper. There is no great difficulty experienced by borrowers at these rates.

Exchange on London has stiffened up to 108¾ to 109 per cent. for gold, and was in fair request yesterday for this day's steamers. The Government 5-20 bonds continue to be transmitted abroad, although the London quotations by the last steamers more closely approximate the New York market than during the previous fortnight. Here the demand has kept up the price to about 106 per cent.

Some uneasiness about the management of the city banks is created by the development of a large fraud on the Phœnix Bank, involving over a quarter of a million of dollars. The unfavorable phase of the affair is, that one of the tellers and at least one of the clerks of the bank had for nearly two years been engaged in this robbery, although the chief deficit has probably occurred since the petroleum speculation, now happily drawing to its end. The outside adventurers, who foisted most of the "Oil Regions"—so called without reference to whether the lands capitalized at enormous figures were likely to yield oil or not—on Wall and William Streets, appear to have found their most credulous victims among the bank, insurance, and brokers' offices down town. They were not only able to get the use of the names of presidents, cashiers, secretaries, etc., as directors or promoters of their schemes, but, by the force of such examples, to crowd their worthless scrip on tellers, clerks, etc., who were really unable to indulge in, much less lose by, the speculation. It is scarcely fair to assume, however, that the loss of the Phœnix Bank implies similar wrong-doing in many other moneyed corporations, but the developments of carelessness or neglect or incompetency in this instance are calculated to impair confidence in the stability of large bank dividends and the reality of large bank "surpluses."

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The market has ruled very steady through the week. The price of old U. S. 5-20s comes 2 per cent. lower from London, but as previous difference, gold and exchange being counted, was from 5 to 6 per cent., the price here has not given way. The bonds are not over-abundant in New York, and the other Atlantic cities are being drawn upon for a fresh supply. More than half the coupon bonds ($395,000,000) of the original issue is now believed to be owned abroad; but this may be an extreme estimate. The registered certificates of the same issue, $119,000,000, are all owned at home. The sales of coupons here are at 106 to 106⅛ per cent.; the second issue, 104½ to 104¾ per cent. The 6 per cents of 1881 are 106¾ to 107 per cent.; the 10-40s, 97 to 97¼ per cent., the same as last Saturday.

The 7.30 per cents are ⅛ to ¼ per cent. weaker than last week, 99 per cent. and interest. The indebtedness certificates are steady at 97½ to 97⅝.

STATE SECURITIES.

Tennessees have improved to 72 to 72½ per cent. Missouris continue dull. There is not much doing in other descriptions.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The New York Central has a small loan for the Albany Bridge, about $300,000, in 7 per cent. convertible bonds, at 102⅛ to 103 per cent. The Morris and Essex Company have a 7 per cent. mortgage on the market at par. The other bonds are steady in price, but not active.

Erie shares have been selling this week ex dividend. The fluctuations have been from 84 to 89, and back to 86 to 86¼ per cent. New York Central has declined from 93 to 92⅛; Reading from 107 to 106½: Michigan Southern, 66¼ to 65⅝; Pittsburg, 71 to 70¾; North-west advanced from 28 to 30, and then fell off to 28⅝; North-west Preferred, 63¼ to 64½ to 62⅝; Fort Wayne, 97⅜ to 97½; Rock Island, 108¾, same as last Saturday. The railway shares generally dull at close of week.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

Atlantic Mail has suddenly declined to 145 per cent. Canton, Cumberland, Mariposa, and Quicksilver are steady, but without much speculative movement. Brunswick Land Company has been up to $13, but is now $11.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Gold is 141½; bills on London 108⅝ to 108⅞ for gold.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South.. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

Henry W. Longfellow,
James Russell Lowell,
John G. Whittier,
Samuel Eliot (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford),
Professor Torrey (Harvard),
Dr. Francis Lieber,
Professor Goldwin Smith (Oxford),
Professor Child (Harvard),
Henry James,
Charles E. Norton,
Judge Bond (Baltimore),
Edmund Quincy,
Professor W. D. Whitney (Yale),
Professor D. C. Gilman (Yale),
Judge Daly,
Professor Dwight (Columbia College),
Professor Tayler Lewis (Schenectady),
Judge Wayland,
Frederick Law Olmsted,
Rev. Dr. McClintock,
Rev. Dr. Jos. P. Thompson,
Rev. Phillips Brooks,
Rev. Dr. Bellows,
C. J. Stillé,
Henry T. Tuckerman,
Bayard Taylor,
C. A. Bristed,
C. L. Brace,
William Lloyd Garrison,
Sydney George Fisher,
Theodore Tilton,
James Parton,
Gail Hamilton.

Terms:—Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, Publisher,
130 Nassau street, N. Y.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

GRAND, Celebrated Gold Medal SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,
AND
CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, Chicago, Ill.
J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,

1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of GIFFARD'S INJECTOR, For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!

Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees IN EVERY STYLE, MANUFACTURED BY
ROBERT PATON,
24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

Great Improvements in Sewing Machines.

EMPIRE SHUTTLE MACHINE!

Salesrooms, 536 Broadway, N. Y.,
250 Washington Street, Boston.

This Machine is constructed on entirely new principles of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements, having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION COMBINED.

It has a straight needle perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither RIP nor RAVEL, and is alike on both sides, performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nansook Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE!

Agents Wanted where none are established, to whom a liberal discount will be given.
T. J. McARTHUR & CO.,
Manufacturers and Proprietors,
536 Broadway, N. Y.

EDDY'S
KEROSENE COOKING AND HEATING
Stoves and Ranges.

These Cooking Stoves will Bake, Boil, Stew, and Roast with the greatest economy and facility, and without heating the room in which they are used. They are perfectly simple, operating like an ordinary Kerosene Lamp with a chimney, and are the only Kerosene Stoves that burn without smoke or odor.

"We have been prfectly astonished to see what a labor-saving, dirt-saving, and heat-saving institution is Eddy's Patent Kerosene Stove. Taking the cost of running it, and the result attained, it is the best patent in the market."—Worcester Daily Spy.

Our Heating and Cooking Stoves are very convenient and economical, especially where a fire is required but a few hours at a time.

Orders for Stoves may be sent through American Advertising Agency, 389 Broadway, New York.
LESLEY & ELLIOT, Manufacturers,
494 Broadway, N. Y.
Send for Illustrated Circular.

THE HOWE SEWING MACHINE CO.
ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,
629 BROADWAY.

Hudson River Institute

Affords the very best advantages for a Classical, Scientific, Commercial, and Musical education. French Conversation and Lewis's Gymnastics for Ladies, and Military Drill for Gentlemen daily, without extra charge. A new Gymnasium, costing $6,000. Eighteen Instructors. Term opens September 11.

Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Principal.
Claverack, Col. Co., N. Y.

T. G. SELLEW,

MANUFACTURER OF DESKS AND OFFICE FURNITURE,

107 Fulton St., near Nassau St., N. Y.

LIBRARY AND SCHOOL FURNITURE MADE TO ORDER.

WHEELER & WILSON'S
LOCK-STITCH SEWING MACHINES,
625 BROADWAY.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

GARDEN & CEMETERY ADORNMENTS.

FOUNTAINS, VASES, ETC., ETC.

SUMMER HOUSES,

ARBORS, CHAIRS, SETTEES, ETC.

Wire Trellises and Arches

FOR VINES, FLOWERS, ETC.

IRON FURNITURE,

Bedsteads of every description

For Dwellings, Public Institutions, Hospitals, Prisons, etc.

Patent Spring Beds, Mattresses, etc.

STABLE FIXTURES,

Hay Racks, Mangers, Stall Divisions, etc.

IRON RAILING,

For enclosing Cemetery Plots, Offices, Dwellings, Public Squares, etc.

Having purchased the business of the New York Wire Railing Company, HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM late Agents, we are now the exclusive Owners and Manufacturers of

Patent Wire Railing & Farm Fencing, Window Guards, etc.,

And we offer to the public the largest variety of ORNAMENTAL IRON GOODS to be found in the United States.

Particular attention given to Export trade.

CHASE & CO.,

Warerooms 524 Broadway,

OPPOSITE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, NEW YORK.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,

Importers and Dealers in

TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;

Manufacturers of

COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,

19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

DECKER BROTHERS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PIANO-FORTES.

FACTORY AND WAREROOMS,

91 BLEECKER STREET,

(MARBLE BUILDING,)

One block west from Broadway,

NEW YORK.

MARVIN'S

PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.

Superior to any others in the following particulars:
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by

MARVIN & CO. 265 Broadway.

Send for a descriptive Circular.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

DEMULCENT SOAP,

FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,

FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.

MANUFACTURED ONLY BY

J. C. HULL'S SON,

32 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Benedict's Time,

171 BROADWAY, COR. CORTLANDT ST., NEW YORK.

TO SOLDIERS.

AMERICAN (WALTHAM) WATCHES.

Let every soldier, before he returns home, provide himself with an AMERICAN WATCH; no better use can be made of money than to invest it in one of these durable and accurate time-pieces. It is a kind of property that constantly returns good interest, and its money value is so well-known that a pocket full of silver dollars wouldn't be as useful.

For sale and warranted by
BENEDICT BROTHERS, Jewelers,
Keepers of the City Time, and Agents for the sale of the American (Waltham) Watches,
171 Broadway, cor. Cortlandt St.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,

STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,

45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS,

AND

BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

STATIONERY.

TO STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS, AND NOTION DEALERS.—The undersigned, being the oldest envelope manufacturers in this country, and having the amplest facilities, are always ready to supply, by the thousand or by the million, envelopes of every variety of size, pattern, and color, at the lowest prices.

Samples furnished when called for.

WM. P. LYON & WHITTEMORE,

527 Pearl St., New York.

W. H. Schieffelin & Co.,

SUCCESSORS TO

SCHIEFFELIN BROTHERS & CO.,

Importers and Jobbers of

DRUGS,

Indigo, Corks, Sponges,

FANCY GOODS, PERFUMERY, ETC., ETC.,

170 and 172 William Street, N. Y.

CARTER, KIRTLAND & CO.,

Manufacturers and Jobbers of

CLOTHING,

340 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK,

OFFER TO FIRST-CLASS BUYERS A LARGE AND VERY COMPLETE STOCK OF

FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING

OF ALL GRADES,

EMBRACING FINE, MEDIUM, AND LOW-PRICED GOODS.

Having made extensive purchases at a time when all were sellers and very few were buyers, we are in a position to supply our customers upon the most favorable and advantageous terms.

Jobbers, Merchant Tailors, and Dealers generally will find it to their advantage to call and examine our stock before purchasing.

Particular attention paid to the execution of orders.

SAM'L CARTER, WM. H. KIRTLAND,
JOHN ROSE, CHAS. B. PEET,
JOHN H. WERTS, Special.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.

New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761,

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.

HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

FINKLE & LYON'S

IMPROVED

LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

Economical Housekeepers Use

PYLE'S SALERATUS. | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.

Articles designed for all who want the best goods, ful. weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

Archer & Pancoast,

9, 11, 13, 15, AND 17 MERCER STREET, NEW YORK,

Manufacturers of Gas and Coal Oil Fixtures, Chandeliers, Pendants, Brackets, Lamps, etc., etc., for home trade or exportation, as also the Patent Convex and other Lanterns for burning coal oil without a chimney.

Dealers are respectfully invited to examine our goods. Warerooms and Manufactory, 9, 11, 13, 15, and 17 Mercer Street, New York.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.

ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.

"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.

"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.

"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.

"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.

Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.

WM. B. BRADBURY,

425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 8. THURSDAY, AUGUST 24, 1865. $3 PER ANNUM.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 225

General Cox and the Negroes 229
English Opinion on Davis's Guilt 230
The Swindling Epidemic 230
Friends in Disguise 231
Competitive Examinations for Admission to the Military and Naval Schools 231

Song of a Slater: Poetry 233

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Suffrage and the Constitution ... 233
The Progress of Emancipation in Russia 235
Feeling of the South Carolinians 237

The South as It Is 239
England 240
Poisoning as a Science 242
American Institute of Instruction. ... 243

LITERATURE:
Literary Notes 245
De Tocqueville in the United States. 247
Miss Cobbe on Religious Duty 249
The Sanitary Condition of New York 250
The Story of the Great March 250

SCIENCE:
Discoveries and Inventions 251

FINANCIAL REVIEW 253

Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

FRIDAY brought relief to the public suspense concerning the Atlantic Cable. Two of the convoys of the Great Eastern arrived at Newfoundland with full particulars of the disaster which had previously been heralded in a very confused manner. The cable had in truth parted on the 2d, in nearly two thousand fathoms of water, owing, as it seems, to its being injured while hauling in for repairs. Mr. Field's diary tells how that day and nine others were spent in dragging for the lost chain; how, as is supposed, it was thrice grappled and partly raised, and how the rope broke disappointingly each time; and how the experiment was abandoned and the great ship headed for home, only when the supply of grappling materials had been exhausted. Several buoys were anchored to mark the position of the cable as thus ascertained, and so long as they were observed they appeared to ride out very rough seas. More than a thousand miles of the coil remain on board, sufficient to complete the laying, if the portion submerged can ever be picked up. We regret to notice a too general disposition to wish the enterprise ill from the start, to exult in its defeat, and to sneer at the incompetency of the Englishmen who have had it in charge—from the makers of the cable to the humblest subordinate engaged in putting it down. The record shows uncommon devotion and perseverance, not even now exhausted, and the nation which won honor by laying the Indian cable in the Persian Gulf, under immense disadvantages, has lost none by its exertions, though unsuccessful, in a much more delicate and difficult undertaking.

GOVERNOR MARVIN'S address to the people of Florida on the subject of reconstruction resembles in substance that of the other Provisional Governors. Speaking of slavery as having ceased to exist without the possibility of revival, he adds that "the freedom intended (for the negro) is the full, ample, and complete freedom of the citizen of the United States." In this is included security from molestation, but "not necessarily the privilege of voting." The question of freedmen's suffrage is an open one. Unlike Governor Peirpont, Judge Marvin thinks that it may be a very proper subject for discussion by the Constitutional Convention, and is to be decided in the light of sound policy. Whenever Florida possesses a republican form of government, and "a constitution that guarantees and secures liberty to all the inhabitants alike, without distinction of color," there will be no obstacle to her re-admission into the Union. In that day, we fancy, "full, ample, and complete freedom" and the "privilege of voting" will be found to have been joined together.

THE Fifteenth of August means in France the Emperor's birthday and the fête which celebrates it, when a grand review of eighty or a hundred thousand troops gives éclat to the day, and the illumination at night of the obelisk and fountains in the Place de la Concorde reminds the Parisian that the empire is peace. In Illinois, this date inaugurates the hunting-season, when the law permits the prairie chicken to be slaughtered by wholesale, and the men of quills and desks who have a passion for sport with never so uncertain and rusty a weapon, abandon the counting-rooms of Chicago for an excursion to the haunts of abundant and delicious game. Few need return empty-handed, although the great body of lawful hunters have been preceded by skulkers, who yearly do their best to cheat their contemporaries and posterity of an unfailing supply of meat for the larder.

M. AUGUSTE LAUGEL will hereafter contribute a fortnightly letter to THE NATION on French affairs.

THE National Teachers' Association opened its annual session in the Court House at Harrisburg, on Wednesday, the 16th, and adjourned on the following Friday. It was preceded on Tuesday evening by a meeting of the National Normal School Association at the Capitol, where a plan was submitted by Professor Hart, of Connecticut, for the establishment of a National Educational Bureau at Washington. In the discussion which followed, an amendment was offered and unanimously adopted, that a committee of seven from as many States should memorialize Congress to appropriate land or funds for the establishment of normal schools in every State. Particular reference was had to the wants of the freedmen. The gathering on Wednesday was eminently large and respectable, the railroads having reduced their rates to accommodate the excursionists from all parts of the country. Many notables were present, and some made speeches—Governors Curtin and Bradford (of Maryland), for example. The latter said that, so long as we could have universal education, he should not be solicitous to impose restrictions on universal suffrage. Professor Greene, of Rhode Island, presided, and read an animated address. One portion, which was deservedly greeted with "long-continued and vociferous applause," is worth reproducing:

"Education must be diffused throughout the South. Black and white, 'poor white' and rich white, must be educated. Not to educate them is to prepare for another civil war. To keep up perpetual jealousies, hatreds, and abuses, as has been the case for the last thirty years, is only to cherish the cancer that has been gnawing at the vitals of our republic. Shall it be done any longer? Gentlemen of this association, let us buckle on the armor, and meet the new exigency of our times. Before the war no Northern teacher dared to discuss the whole truth at the South. In morals there must be one code for the North and another for the South. There could be no free discussion in all our political contests. Southern men could come before a Northern audience and speak their sentiments freely, even vilify with impunity our ways and institutions, but the instant a Northern man attempted at the South to utter sentiments at all condemnatory of Southern institutions or Southern life, he was forced to leave the country. Is it to be so now? Can we not as educators go boldly into the Southern States and teach the truth? If not, I pray God that martial law may prevail in every Southern State till Northern men may discuss educational, political, social, moral, and religious topics in every part of the South as freely as in Faneuil Hall!"

Letters were read from General Doubleday, Professor Wayland, President Hill, of Harvard College, and General Howard. The last-named hoped he might get from the Association some well-digested plan for freedmen's schools. Papers were read on "The Mechanism of School Teaching," on the establishment and maintenance of Normal Schools, on "The Phonetic Method of Teaching Reading," and "The Best Method of Teaching the Classics." Professor Hart's resolutions for a memorial to Congress on the subject of an Educational Bureau were adopted with some amendments. The committee appointed at the last session to consider the Oswego system of "object teaching" reported at length approvingly. Thursday was devoted to a pilgrimage to Gettysburg. On Saturday, after the adjournment, a visit was made to the coal mines at Mauch Chunck.

Two of the public institutions of this vicinity have attracted attention from certain charges brought against them of cruel treatment of their inmates. In the House of Refuge, on Randall's Island, a bright boy who had been guilty, before entering, of robbing his employer, died under circumstances which pointed to flogging as the cause. An examination of the case was had and the fact of flogging, perhaps excessive, elicited, but the doctor denied any connection between the punishment and the death of the lad. The head-keeper of the King's County Penitentiary, a Mr. McNeeley, was accused by an assistant of employing prisoners and keepers for his private benefit; of keeping cattle and swine at the expense of the county; of permitting and ordering male and female prisoners to be whipped; of allowing prisoners to get intoxicated; of providing prisoners and keepers with unwholesome food, etc. The board of supervisors directed the standing penitentiary committee, augmented by Supervisor Clark, to investigate these charges. The majority reported them not proved. Mr. Clark alone was convinced that they were mainly true, and that enough had been admitted by McNeeley to show that he was unfit to hold his position longer, to wit: that he had made wagons and furniture, manufactured manure, raised swine, sent keepers and prisoners to work on his own property outside the prison, and whipped prisoners with a cowhide. The matter of improper food was not so clearly established. Nevertheless, McNeeley was re-elected keeper for three years, by a vote of fifteen to eight.

Only twenty-five hundred of the colored children of the District of Columbia, or less than a fourth of the estimated number, are educated at the schools established by the charitable societies of the North, and at the few private schools whose tuition is paid for. It seems it is not enough that the authorities at Washington have avoided the charge of educating this class of youth, which was imposed upon them by a law of Congress. The chivalry who reside in the vicinity of Fourteenth Street and Massachusetts Avenue object to the colored schools which General Howard has established there, and have asked for their removal on the ground of their causing a depreciation of real estate. If we are not mistaken, some of the largest and shrewdest real estate owners at the Capital are colored men, whose children are studiously neglected by the corporation which levies taxes on their property. We wait to hear a protest from them. One of the complainants is Judge Wylie, who has an unenviable notoriety in connection with the trial of Miss Harris before the criminal court over which he presides. He gains nothing by this extra-judicial manifestation, but the public get a still clearer idea of his character.

Political conventions are in session on every hand. The Mississippi State Convention assembled at Jackson on the 14th. Gov. Sharkey examined into the loyalty and qualifications of the members, and administered the amnesty oath when necessary. The rest of the day was consumed in organizing. On the 15th, the president was directed to appoint a committee of fifteen, who should, upon enquiry, report such alterations and amendments of the Constitution as might be proper and expedient to restore the State to the Union, and protect its citizens from invasion and domestic rebellion. Two of this committee were specially to consider what action ought to be taken in regard to the act of secession of Jan. 9, 1861, and the executive, legislative, and judicial measures that grew out of and succeeded it. On the 16th, little was done. On the 17th, the constitutional committee reported in favor of a change in the constitution so as to prohibit slavery for ever, and to rid the instrument of all those portions which relate to slavery; also an ordinance providing for the election of Congressmen, members of the Legislature, Governor, and other State officers, on the first Monday in October, and empowering all judicial and ministerial officers now in office to hold their places till their term expires. The committee of two reported an ordinance ratifying all the acts of the State officers made during the war but not in aid of it, and not inconsistent with the constitutions of the United States and the State of Mississippi. Both reports were adopted. Two other ordinances were passed to a first reading: one in the spirit of that last mentioned, and a second which prohibits the Legislature from passing any law imposing any civil disability or punishment or forfeiture of estate upon any citizens engaged in the late war with the United States, or for the political opinions occasioned thereby. A memorial to the President was adopted, praying him not to garrison the State with negro troops. The Maine Democratic Convention met in Portland on the 15th. The chairman said if Democratic principles had prevailed, there would have been no war (and might have added, there would have been no peace). The duty of the Democracy is now to frustrate the design of the Republican party to destroy State sovereignty, by forcing its policy on the South at the point of the bayonet. The President has withstood this purpose, and the Democracy owe him a debt of gratitude. One of the resolutions afterwards passed acknowledges this debt, and pledges support of Mr. Johnson in his present course. Another declares that each State alone can constitutionally regulate the suffrage of its electors. A third would make the sums advanced by towns, cities, and the State a legitimate charge upon the Federal Government. The Hon. James Howard, of Portland, was nominated for Governor, by acclamation. The Pennsylvania Union State Convention, at Harrisburg on the 17th, was disturbed by a remarkable resolution, introduced by General Lemuel Todd, which assumed that the convention, out of gratitude to the soldiers, would nominate none but those who had "proved their loyalty and patriotism by service in the field against the enemies of the Republic." This was vigorously combated by Thaddeus Stevens, and was at last referred to the committee on resolutions. When reported back it was in the shape of a general recommendation to have especial regard for "our citizen soldiers" in nominations for office. General Todd was dissatisfied still, but the result must have mollified him. General John F. Hartranft was nominated for Auditor-General, and Colonel Jacob M. Campbell for Surveyor-General. The resolutions express the conviction that the President's experiment of reconstruction has already shown that the people lately in rebellion cannot yet be safely entrusted again with political rights, and that the conquered States require to be held in subjection until the inalienable rights of man are secured within their borders. Confiscation to pay the expenses of the war is strongly urged, an increased protective policy insisted on. The Monroe Doctrine is alluded to rather than affirmed. Secretary Stanton and Governor Curtin are highly praised for their public services; and, finally, the Democratic party is arraigned for its behavior during the rebellion. The Minnesota Democratic Convention met at St. Paul on the 16th. They resolved to sustain the reconstruction policy of President Johnson, to maintain the Monroe Doctrine, to oppose a protective tariff, and to denounce the suspension of the habeas corpus. The "radical" Democracy of Ohio held a convention at Columbus on the 17th. They reiterated the doctrine of State sovereignty, and denied everything else—the right to draft, to suspend the habeas corpus, to hold military commissions, to have a public debt, national banks and a national currency, to emancipate slaves, to confer the suffrage upon negroes, etc. Even General Cox and his colonization scheme, which have been well received at the South, were denounced, apparently because having once begun to say "no," there was no stopping. The New York State Democratic Convention will be held at Albany on the 6th of September. The North Carolina election will take place on the 21st of September, and the one hundred and twenty delegates chosen will meet at Raleigh on the 2d of October. A Constitutional Convention at Denver voted almost unanimously, on the 14th, that it was expedient to form a State out of Colorado.

The Democratic party evidently had two ways of returning, or trying to return, to office and power. They might either assail and unseat the Administration, or else persuade the Executive to "Tylerize." In default of any reasonably hopeful ground of attack, they seem in their conventions thus far to have adopted the latter plan. They are profuse in their praise of Mr. Johnson's policy, and resolve on every occasion to stand by him in his adherence to the Constitution and regard for the rights of States. What will they say to Secretary Harlan's speech on Thursday last, when serenaded in Washington? He scouted the idea that the President would be untrue to those who elected him, and asked: "What act of his differs from those of his predecessor in any material point of view?" He concluded that no complaint can be lodged against the one which would not apply with equal force to the other. Are the Democracy unconsciously burning incense to a "tyrant" and "usurper?"

The Nashville convention of the colored citizens of Tennessee assembled on the 10th and closed its sessions on the 14th. In the deliberations a prominent part was taken by the ministers, who made the most elaborate arguments in favor of suffrage. Two of the members were pointed out as having voted for Gen. Jackson for President. Gen. Fisk delivered an address full of sympathy. He explained his intentions as a commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, and urged his hearers to cultivate land on shares. He said that his circular had found favor even with Gen. Gideon J. Pillow, who had promised to co-operate in its objects. The ballot would naturally follow the Bible and the bayonet. The convention adopted resolutions making each county delegation a committee to look after the interests of the colored people throughout the State, and report grievances to Gen. Fisk; also providing for the preparation of statistics of the colored population—their number, occupation, property and taxes, places of worship, scholars old and young, etc. The birthday of President Lincoln and the 1st of January were set apart as days of jubilee to be celebrated in all time. Addresses to the white and colored people of Tennessee and a protest to Congress were read and referred to the State Committee.

We publish this week a very able letter, signed "T. F.," on the relation of the States to the general Government as regards the franchise. Without concurring in all respects with the writer, we are free to say that he furnishes a powerful defence of the doctrine in which, in our opinion, the true solution of the difficulty with regard to the definition of what constitutes a republican form of government is to be found. He places the power of deciding what is, and what is not, a republican form of government in the hands of Congress, and makes it a legitimate and inevitable deduction from the duty which the Constitution prescribes of guaranteeing such form of government to the several States. And in exercising this power, Congress would not be bound, as the Supreme Court must be, by legal rules of construction, but by political considerations solely. Its enquiry would be, not what the framers of the Constitution meant by the phrase, but what the experience of three generations had shown to be necessary for the safety and success of the Government.

A bust of Mr. Lincoln was set up with impressive ceremonies in the African M. E. Church, at Raleigh, on the 3d inst. Above it was inscribed the closing paragraph of his last inaugural. In Edgecomb County, North Carolina, a large planter and former slave-owner, Dr. Garratt, is arranging with the Freedmen's Bureau for the employment of two hundred hands for a year and a half. He is willing to take whole families on liberal terms, giving wages even to the children who may be useful. His proposals are highly approved. The occurrence of many violent and brutal acts in western South Carolina, on the part of planters towards their employés, has drawn from Gen. Van Wyck a severe rebuke of his subordinate who permitted contracts to contain authority for inflicting corporal punishment on the laborer, and a warning against a repetition of the outrages referred to. He exposes also the purpose of many to embarrass the working of free labor, that it may contrast unfavorably with the compulsory system now abolished. Slavery and the lash, he reminds them, have passed away together. An instrument of torture, said to have been invented since the demise of the system, has appeared in Florida. A woman near Tallahassee punished her female servant by placing sticks between her fingers and tying them tightly together, with the most excruciating effect. She was complained of to the provost-marshal. Gen. Slocum has sent out instructions from his headquarters at Vicksburg to the officers of his department, to ensure their co-operation with the Freedmen's Bureau in regard to the issuing of rations, the disposal of lands, and the protection of the colored people in the spirit of the emancipation proclamation. He stigmatizes "the professed friend of the negro, who is constantly dwelling upon the wrongs that have been inflicted upon him by his former master, and constantly representing to him that the Government has not yet granted to him all the privileges to which he is entitled," as "the worst enemy of his race." The colored people of Lexington, Kentucky, have appealed successfully to Gen. Palmer against the city ordinances which obstructed their liberty of assembling for religious worship.

The scandal and monetary trepidation occasioned in this city by the defalcation in the Phœnix Bank were assuredly not relieved by the two grand swindling operations which followed hard upon that exposure. Mr. P. R. Mumford, a gold broker, having made use of trust funds for his speculative purposes, lost them all, and then undertook to recover them by an ingenious but immoral procedure. To redeem them from the hands of those who had loaned him their value upon them, he obtained something like $100,000 in gold from various brokers, to whom he gave his checks in return. The banks where these were soon presented declined in each instance to receive them, from a lack of any deposit to Mumford's credit. Meanwhile, the fraudulent financier replaced and locked up the funds entrusted to him, and then gave out that he had failed. His victims have also failed—to become reconciled to their loss, and he has been arrested. Much more extensive was the proceeding of Mr. Edward Ketchum, a member of the house of Messrs. Morris Ketchum, Son & Co., one of the wealthiest stock exchange and private banking-houses in the city. Unfortunate speculations in stocks were the probable cause of his forging the signatures of several brokers and the certifications of the bank itself on the gold checks of the New York Bank, besides abstracting the securities of his firm, in consequence of which they have been obliged to suspend under a burden of three or four millions of indebtedness. The property of the guilty party has been attached, but no trace of his whereabouts has been discovered. In this connection we may note the arrest of Townsend, the clerk who robbed the Townsend Savings Bank, of New Haven, of $100,000, on the 22d of May. He was caught by two Philadelphia detectives in Liverpool on the 29th of last month.

One of the city dailies, which might have displayed less ignorance or less credulity, echoed the other morning the stale charge of the Copperheads that the Abolitionists had taken very good care not to serve in the war which they had provoked. It alleged as "an indisputable fact" that "one looks almost in vain upon the list of officers, and upon the muster-rolls of the rank and file, for any of the names that used to figure in the Abolition gatherings." A correspondent, himself a prominent abolitionist of former times and father of a Union officer, immediately published a list of thirty-one distinguished men whose sons, grandsons, or sons-in-law upheld, upon the field of battle, the anti-slavery principles of their sires. The eyesight of the Times was bad when it overlooked James G. Birney, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, the Tappans, William Jay, Francis G. Shaw, Gerrit Smith, Henry Ward Beecher, Frederick Douglass, Henry Wilson, and others as well known.

M. J. A. Saxton writes a valuable letter to Professor F. J. Child, of Harvard College, which has been given to the public. From it we extract a few items: In the Department of the South, including Charleston, the Sea Islands, and Savannah, there are upwards of a hundred schools for the freed people, with a list of 12,467 pupils, and an average attendance of 9,842. There are some fifteen schools on the Islands which are maintained under the official supervision of the United States Tax Commissioners, by the rents of the forfeited lands reserved for this purpose. There are nineteen public schools in Charleston, day and evening, but not one of the five or six thousand whites of that city who have taken the oath of allegiance has offered his assistance in teaching the adults, or to aid the elevation of the negro in any way. The colored people have started debating societies in Charleston and Beaufort; they have a "Savannah Educational Association," a savings bank at Beaufort, with deposits amounting to nearly $100,000, invested in United States bonds, a Union League in Charleston with a numerous fellowship, and a female society for charitable objects. The freedmen there are also making an effort to establish a newspaper through a joint stock company. General Sherman's famous order has been so far carried out by Gen. Saxton, that on the 1st of June 40,000 of the 100,000 freed people to be provided for had been colonized, and received their allotments upon the islands of South Carolina and Georgia, and the coasts assigned to them.

It must be a somewhat melancholy sight for the people of Nantucket to see, one after another, the finest houses upon the island shipped bodily to towns upon the main. Yet this is now the most conspicuous commerce of the place, which once was a bustling emporium for the ships of all nations. The decline, as everybody knows, is due to the revolution in the whale fishery.

The present population of Chicago is reckoned at something over 200,000, which is double what the city had in 1860. The directory shows 11,000 more names than last year. There are barely sufficient tenement houses to accommodate this rapid growth. By 1867 it is expected that two great undertakings will have been accomplished—the tunnel under Lake Michigan for a supply of pure water, and the lowering of the Illinois and Michigan Canal below the level of the lake, in order that the Chicago River may connect the two, and so be cleared of its impurities, which have long annoyed and endangered the city. Last year the fire-alarm telegraphic system was put in operation. Building, manufactures, and commerce have all flourished in spite of the war. Periodical literature is abundant: there are six dailies, two of which are in German.

We have a tolerable conception of the ravages inflicted upon the South by the civil warfare now ended, but not so lively, we confess, as that of a French journalist, who says:

"An idea may be formed of the desolation caused by the late disastrous war in America, on learning that wild beasts, unknown in Virginia for upwards of a century, have made their appearance there in great numbers, and that the battle-fields especially are infested with enormous bears which have issued from the depths of the mountains."

The King of Portugal, on closing the Cortes, pronounced for the final abolition of slavery in the Portuguese possessions. Unfortunately for Brazil, she cannot be counted in this category. She has apparently a well-intentioned emperor, but a very obstinate slaveholding aristocracy, which will be strengthened by whatever American rebels escape to her with something better than Confederate currency in their pockets.

The normal schools of France are to be charged hereafter with keeping frequent and accurate meteorological records; and the recent terrible tornadoes which have devastated the continent and France particularly, are to be mapped down in their length and breadth, according to the observations made in the districts traversed by them. The Duc de Persigny is said to have initiated this latter practice.

The Swedish pastor, Lindback, who was condemned to death for poisoning three invalid paupers belonging to his parish (to free them from misery, as he declared), made, like Dr. Pritchard, his confession. He explained how the contemplation of suffering and wretchedness led him to hasten the death which would bring relief. He had observed that very few die of years, but the great majority from some external cause which God either provides or at least does not hinder. Many, in the flower of their age, destroy themselves involuntarily by a bad use of their intelligence. Many perish under the treatment of the most skilful physicians—some being thrust back from a near recovery. Science, as well as ignorance, plays a leading part in the causes productive of death. A merciful God, he thought, who was aware of all this, would not judge him harshly for abridging the pains of his fellow-creatures.

Some of the English statistics for the past year are of interest. The cost of the police amounted in round numbers to £1,700,000, or £43,000 in excess of 1863. In England and Wales there were 100,067 cases of drunkenness or drunken behavior, against 94,745 in 1863. In England alone 51,058 offences, great and small, were committed, 28,704 persons were arrested, and 18,226 appeared before the courts. Coroners' verdicts were passed upon 1,337 suicides: 978 men, 359 women. The average for the six years 1858–63 establishes a proportion of 67 suicides to a million of inhabitants. Eleven men were married subsequently to a divorce, and 9 women. Half of these instances occurred in London. The exact age of nearly two-thirds of the couples married was ascertained. More than three-fourths, men as well as women, were under thirty. 228 girls were only sixteen, and 30 still younger. 177 men and 42 women took a fresh start in life after their seventieth year. One old man of ninety-two chose a wife of eighty-one.

A French actress in the theatre at Grenelle was winning considerable applause in the "Supplice d'une Femme," when she discovered a fellow-player casting sheep's-eyes at a lady in a neighboring box. Transfixed with jealousy, she resolved to commit suicide openly on the stage. The ruling passion being strong even in death, she desired to produce the greatest dramatic effect possible, and, having taken a powerful dose of laudanum, calculated the time when it would operate, and arranged to have a bouquet thrown at her in articulo mortis. The party charged with this business was alone punctual. The poison followed the flowers at a long interval. The applause had ceased, the false swain had disappeared unrepentant behind the scenes, and only an anti-climax was possible when the crisis at last overtook the heroine. Nor was she allowed the consolation of dying. Means were promptly and successfully taken to rescue her.

Abd-el-Kader was recently on his way to the Tuileries. He rode in a carriage with four horses, and wore conspicuously the cross of the legion of honor. There met him on the Rue de Rivoli the General Lamoricière, who in 1847 had conquered the emir. Each recognized the other with emotion, but passed without greeting. The victor was on foot in plain citizen's clothes.

Fears of a clerical reaction have been excited in Italy by the negotiations of Vegezzi with the Pope. The result is seen in the formation of societies of free thinkers, similar to those which exist in Belgium. Such have appeared at Milan and Sienna, and even at Florence. Their main object is to rid civil society completely of religious jurisdiction. They are so unreasonable as to desire that a man may die without the aid of a priest, "a thing now absolutely impossible," we are told, "because almost all the cemeteries in Italy belong to religious societies." A practical measure to meet this hard necessity has already been projected—the purchase of a burying-ground, which shall dispense with the consecration of the Church. On the other hand, a tenderness of conscience is noted in the clerical party. There are those among the friends of the temporal Papacy and the enemies of Italian unity who have scruples about voting for deputies to the parliament at Florence. Is not this, they ask, to recognize the legitimacy of that body, and, by the same act, the doctrine of the united Italy which it represents? The Pope, on being consulted, is much embarrassed. Pressed for a decision, he substitutes prudence and good sense for omniscience and infallibility, and leaves the whole matter to the individual conscience.

The election returns in France are claimed as favorable by the friends and opponents of the Government alike. It is insisted that the majorities cannot be interpreted superficially, but that beneath them are abundant proofs of liberal aspirations. The anxiety of the Constitutionnel to have the figures flattering to the Emperor has been likened to the obsequiousness of the chemist who said to a sovereign: "Sire, the gases will now have the honor of combining before you."

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

GENERAL COX AND THE NEGROES.

THERE is no question on which our political doctors disagree more widely than this: "What is to be done with the negro?" From the very beginning of the agitation of the slavery question, this interrogatory was regarded as final and conclusive of the whole matter. The postulate being assumed that nothing could be done with the negro but what was doing with him, it followed that any attempt to do anything else was absurd and impossible. The suppression of the rebellion, however, and that of slavery with it, has forced the fact upon all thinking minds—and on many minds that do not think—that something else must be done with him, and everybody seems to be ready with an infallible scheme. The latest that we have noticed is contained in a letter from Gen. J. D. Cox, the Republican candidate for Governor of Ohio, to some enquiring friends in Oberlin, anxious for the political orthodoxy of their candidate. The distinguished services of Gen. Cox during the war, and the confidence of the Republicans of Ohio in him, evinced by this nomination, should secure to the opinions he has thus expressed a full consideration and a respectful treatment.

Gen. Cox assumes that there is a radical and ineradicable hostility between the white and black races at the South which will make political unity impossible; that a struggle for supremacy must follow any attempt to compel such unity, which must end in the subjection or extirpation of the weaker party. The remedy he suggests is the separation of the whites and blacks by assigning to the latter a territory formed out of contiguous portions of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, and organizing thereupon a black dependency of a territorial character, under the protection and nurture of the United States, the government to be wholly in their own hands, with such assistance only at the start as may be necessary or convenient. He does not propose a coercive collection of all the colored population in this promised land, but thinks that the attractions it would hold out to them would secure their voluntary migration to it. Gen. Cox admits that there are difficulties attending the carrying his scheme into effect, in which proposition, at least, we cordially agree with him. Only we hold the difficulties to be nothing less than impossibilities, and his remedy no better than the disease, were it possible to apply it.

General Cox appeals to history to show the difficulty with which different nationalities have amalgamated in the old world. The Norman and the Saxon, the Gaul and the Frank, were centuries in amalgamating, and thence he infers that political unity cannot exist between races of more distinctly marked separation. But he does not allow for the immensely greater rapidity with which opinions and customs and habits change in these latter days. The printing-press, the steamship, and the railway have given to a decade now changes which a century could not compass five hundred years ago. And his admission that the fusion of races "from the eastern shore of Germany to the western coast of Ireland" is already so complete on this continent, that there are few Yankees "in whose veins is not mixed the blood of several," appears to us fatal to his argument. History does not repeat herself, as is often rhetorically flourished in our ears. The race ever accommodates itself to new conditions, and forgets the old ones on which it has turned its back. If nations from every clime and of every tongue can agree to live together in political unity at the North, why may we not hope that common sense and common interest may make political unity posssible at the South, between races that have been for generations in contact with each other? Such theories as these, however unintentionally, have a grave tendency to aggravate the very difficulties their authors most deprecate.

Why cannot the whites and blacks live together in amity and political equality after emancipation? There is not the least objection to the neighborhood of the negro, nor to his contact, as long as he is a slave. It is the element of freedom that vitiates his nature and makes him an intolerable nuisance. Gen. Cox could hardly look into the faces of the colored people in the northernmost slave States without seeing written upon them the proofs that there is no insuperable antipathy between the white and the black race. Is it inconceivable that in no very long time the former may find it possible to live on fair terms of political equality with the latter, as different classes and nationalities do with us, when that equality is firmly established? We do not agree with Gen. Cox that "reflecting men in the Southern States" will fall in with his plan. Such know too well the politico-economical necessity of black labor under which they lie. Reflecting men of no nation ever consent to part with the labor on which the prosperity of every community rests. The late slaveholding class yet cling to the idea that slavery in some form will be accorded to them, and the outcry and agitation against the extension of political rights to the negroes will be kept up as long as they see a possibility of that beatific consummation. But when the nation has definitively freed every slave, and put his own protection into his own hands by giving him the ballot and the bayonet, and the safeguard of the national arm while necessary besides, we do not believe human nature South will be found materially different from human nature North. It will make the best of its new condition, which it will soon find to have bettered the old beyond its fears and beyond its hopes.

Another main difficulty Gen. Cox would have to encounter would be the unwillingness of the blacks themselves to escape into his new city of refuge. If there be a quality of the negro's nature stronger than another, it is his love of his native home. He has had few reasons enough to love it, yet nothing but the infernal furies of slavery could drive him to break the ties that bound him to it. For fifty years or more the whole legislative policy of the slave States has been directed to compel the free negroes to forsake the neighborhood of the slaves, whom they infected by the sight of their freedom. The cruelty of the laws and the villanies to which the public sentiment of the South subjected this unhappy class have never been equalled in the case of any oppressed race not actually enslaved. And, on the other hand, the Colonization Society tempted them with lands and political equality in Africa, and Hayti invited them to enter in and possess with her that fairest of the sea-girt isles. But neither cruelties nor bribes could separate them from the soil they loved, though it had been but an unjust stepmother to them. And should they consent to congregate themselves in the Utopia which Gen. Cox would provide for them, what safeguard would they have from the irruptions and depredations of their enemies, who would hem them about? The Creeks, and Cherokees, and Seminoles could give them better warning as to that. A standing army of the United States would be needed for their defence against their hostile neighbors. It is better to face the difficulty manfully now, in full faith in the supremacy of the democratic principle for the regulation of societies, than to endeavor to evade it by schemes like these, even were they practicable.

There is but one key to the problem, "What is to be done with the negro?" And that is, Justice. The nation has restored him to his liberty, and is bound in honor and in self-interest to see that it is secured to him. We believe that it has not learnt the lessons of the last few years so ill as to intend leaving him in the power of his old oppressors. It may permit experiments to be tried, and the former ruling class to be proved incompetent to govern now, out of their own mouths and by their own actions. But it does not mean to deliver either itself or its black allies bound into their hands. A republican form of government and none other will be guaranteed to each of the pardoned States;—a republican form of government, in which the governing power will be lodged in the hands of the majority, on equal terms, without regard to race or color. The rebels did not find us the cowards they thought to find us when they rose in arms; they will not find us the fools they hope to find us now that our foot is on their necks. The only indemnity for the past that we demand is security for the future, and that we can only have through absolute political justice to the negro. That justice he will have, though an armed occupation of the rebel country be necessary during the existing generation. And General Cox may be assured, should he live to serve his country in civil life as long as he served her well in the field, that he will see the impossible done—whites and blacks living together in political, industrial unity, and enjoying the prosperity and happiness which spring only from impartial liberty.

ENGLISH OPINION ON DAVIS'S GUILT.

Our London correspondent, who was in the darkest days one of the ablest and most effective supporters of the cause of the United States Government, has, in his letter this week, produced an argument against the infliction of capital punishment on Jefferson Davis which deserves attention, as embodying the opinions of that portion of the English public which has never sympathized with the Confederacy. The gist of it is, that the judgment formed of the nature of Davis's offence by this generation may be reversed by the next; that there is a real moral difference between crimes committed by a man in his public capacity, as the head of a government or army, and those committed by him as a private individual; and that capital punishment is barbarous.

The last of these will, of course, apply to any case as well as Davis's, so we need not discuss it here. The production of the other two, however, shows how completely even friendly English critics, who have observed the late contest from a distance, have failed to catch the real point on which the American public has relied for its moral justification in carrying it on. To ask Americans to place Davis in the same category as Napoleon, is to ask them to surrender not only their whole case against Davis, but the fundamental doctrines of their political system. Napoleon derived his claims to immunity at the hands both of the Bourbons and the allies, not simply from the fact that he had been the recognized head of a belligerent power, but that the revolution to which he owed his elevation was morally justifiable; that the rule of the Bourbon dynasty was rightfully overthrown; and that their restoration, by the aid of foreign bayonets, was an immoral act, and gave them no valid claim to the allegiance of Napoleon or any other Frenchman. Louis XVIII. had, perhaps, a legal right to slay him, but he had no moral right to do so, and it is from the moral point of view that posterity looks at these things.

The same thing may be said of the proposal to shoot Washington. The reason why everybody now acknowledges that to have executed him would have been a crime, is not simply their admiration of his personal character, but their belief that his cause was a righteous one.

It may be said, of course, that people's estimate of the goodness or badness of causes changes from generation to generation, just as their estimate of the goodness or badness of men. But there are certain features about this Southern rebellion which, in the opinion of the American public, are distinctive, and mark it off from any other recorded in history, by certain broad lines. It was a revolt, in the first place, against the only government on earth which has been established after full and fair discussion by the free will and consent of the governed. It was, moreover, the only revolt on record which was not caused by solid palpable grievances, capable of being, or actually enumerated on paper; and, last of all, it was the only revolt ever set on foot avowedly to avoid a remote and only probable risk of interference with the institution of slavery.

Now, granting that the distinction which the long divorce between morality and politics in the Old World has created between political and private crimes be one of which it is right that European governments should take notice, because men there are bred under it, it does not follow that Americans should allow it to be set up in justification of crimes against their peace; because, apart from the institution of slavery, it is a distinction which has never been recognized in American politics. As between white men, at least—and Davis is a white man—the political institutions of this country have never been based, as those of nearly every other country are, on mere force or tradition. Everything has been done that can be done to give opinion full play, and to embody in the laws the highest moral sentiment of the whole community. Therefore, even supposing Davis had not revolted in support of slavery, and even supposing the crime of treason was not, as it is, defined by the Constitution and made punishable by statute, his revolting against a Government like this, without any other excuse than a desire to change or to assert a naked right, was, we insist upon it, a worse crime than revolt against any other government in the world could be, and, if anything can deserve hanging, would deserve it.

The argument drawn from the chance of opinions changing as to the nature of his crime in the next generation, derives all its force from the theory that his offence was, as treason generally is in Europe, merely a conventional offence created by statute. On conventional matters, of course, opinions do change from age to age and year to year; but if Americans believe anything earnestly and fervently, it is that they have, under their system of government, elevated it from the rank of an offence against a particular form of government, or a particular order of things, into the rank of a crime against society; that they have provided a political machinery which renders an appeal to armed force for the decision of political differences an offence so dark that no lapse of time, nothing short of a total revolution in our fundamental ideas of morality, can suffice to change its complexion in men's eyes.

Nothing could illustrate better than our correspondent's plea the confusion which has been wrought in the Old World in men's notions of right and wrong by centuries of war and revolution, in which little else than the interests of families or of individuals was at stake, and in which, if principle was ever visible, it was only dimly seen and at rare intervals.

THE SWINDLING EPIDEMIC.

The Evening Post and some other journals are disposed to ascribe the plague of forgeries and swindlings which has showed itself in the last few weeks to the influence of the paper currency in fostering the spirit of speculation. There is no doubt that the inflation of the currency, and its sensitiveness to the influence of military events, has during the past four years given an unusual impetus to speculation. But to ascribe the exploits of Ketchum, Jenkins, Mumford & Co. to it is, in our opinion, to be guilty of very slashing and reckless generalization. The spirit of speculation is nothing new in Wall Street. It was there before the war, and so was the eager desire to get rich suddenly, to procure fine clothes, fast horses, and fine houses. There is probably no "Street" in the world in which this spirit has been for many years more rampant; but its presence is due not to the nature of the currency, but the condition of the country. There is no more eagerness, in our opinion, to get rich quickly here than in France or England, but the means of getting rich quickly are within the reach of a great number, and it is this, and not the peculiar nature of the currency, which creates speculation.

The material resources of the United States are enormous, and it is only within the last twenty years that the development of them has fairly begun. Such mineral wealth of all kinds is nowhere else to be found; railroads have nowhere else the importance they possess here, and when a population as energetic as ours flings itself on such a harvest, the gains of many are naturally very great, the disappointment of those who do not gain naturally very great also. Moreover, the class which has the shrewdness and intelligence to speculate here is very large, larger than in any other country. Nearly every boy in America has a knowledge of business and of investments, and the mode of making them, such as only few men in Europe ever acquire; and the shares in most enterprises are sold so low that nearly everybody who has a little money to spare, and everybody has some, has the means of getting hold of them. The result is that the "commercial spirit," as social philosophers now call it—or, in other words, the spirit of the age—is more widely diffused here than elsewhere, and not during the war alone, but at all times.

Moreover, we venture to assert that, judged, as they ought to be judged, not so much by the number of times they fall as by the number and nature of the temptations they resist—for this is the real test of virtue—Wall Street men are the honestest men of their class in the world. We doubt if there is any community in which swindling is so easy as in this. For instance, nowhere else are checks so generally used as they are here in making payments of money. On the continent of Europe they are entirely unknown; in England they are chiefly used in the transfer of large sums. Here almost every sum over ten dollars is paid in this way. Now the field this opens up to the forger and the swindler is immense, and yet how few avail themselves of it; how rarely we hear of a forged check, or of a check drawn without assets to meet it. We venture to assert, moreover, that a man of respectable appearance might travel through the United States and find less difficulty in paying his expenses in his own checks on any neighboring bank, than he would in getting a twenty pound or even a ten pound Bank of England note cashed in any part of England where he was a stranger. And the small amount of scrutiny bestowed on signatures in Wall Street, as illustrated by Ketchum's success in passing off such clumsy forgeries as his were, shows the general prevalence of a confidence between men which could not exist if it were often abused. This very carelessness in the mode of doing business, which we have heard so much denounced during the last few days, is itself a proof that honesty and good faith are the rule; knavery of very rare occurrence.

We do not, for our part, look for any speedy change in these matters. We shall, we hope, never see men as distrustful here as they are in the Old World, until the country becomes as well filled, its resources as nearly exhausted, its capital as plentiful, and the means of increasing it as scarce as they are in England or Holland; and that period is, thank heaven, still remote enough to leave us the hope that our morality will, when it comes time, be so well rooted that it will not be affected by our material condition.

We do not intend, by any means, to set up as defenders of Wall Street practices or of the Wall Street spirit. We think the genius of the place is in many respects an odious demon; but this practice of ascribing the great social phenomena of the day, of which the speculating spirit is one, to one cause, such as the paper currency, is the quackery of social science. Of course, if the abundance of greenbacks leads men to rob the banks and disgrace their families, all we have to do is to come back to specie payments to restore the reign of virtue, just as the pill-venders treat all diseases as local affections and have a medicine for each that goes "right to the spot." For our part, we despair of putting down rascality by giving the rascals good advice. The true way to cure the evils of society is to improve the whole circle of social influence. The morality of Wall Street, the theatre, and the press, and all other institutions, will be found to bear a pretty constant ratio to the morality of the community at large, and the means which are found to be most efficacious in improving the latter will be found to operate beneficially on the former also.

FRIENDS IN DISGUISE.

It is astonishing how mistaken men can be because they are so stupid as to judge of other men by their deeds. The impression is very general—we may say that it is all but universal—throughout the North that Mr. A. H. Stephens was an enemy of the Union, in that he exerted all his powers, which even his enemies admit to be great, in compassing its destruction. He "went with his State" when that State went out of the Union, and because he held that his first duty was to his State, not to the nation. He accepted the second office in "the new nation," the vice-presidency, and, had anything happened that should have brought about the shelving or the burying of Mr. J. Davis, he would have become "President of the Confederate States of America," and would have been compelled to wage the deadliest kind of deadly warfare against the United States—unless he had decided that it was his duty to care no more for a Confederate oath than he had cared for a Union oath. He announced to the world that the Southern Confederacy had discovered the true secret of social life, and that it lay in founding society on slavery. He went further, in offensive expression, than any other man of equal talents on the Southern side, for there was something peculiarly grating in the declaration, from such a man, that we were all wrong in supposing that men who labored for a livelihood were fit for civilized existence. No wonder that we all thought Mr. Stephens a rebel of the impurest water.

But it seems that we were all mistaken, all wrong, and that this gentleman, instead of being an enemy of the Union, was a Federal of the Federalists—a Federalist of the old stock, indeed. This interesting fact—and it is uncommonly interesting, if it be a fact—we learn from a paragraph in the Journal of Commerce, giving a brief account of a visit that was lately made to Mr. Stephens by a gentleman recently returned from Boston. "Mr. Stephens," says our contemporary, "is said to have appeared patiently submissive, expressing himself as having never been an enemy to the Government, but as having accepted public office in the Confederacy with hopes of contributing more speedily to a settlement of the national difficulties." So that we are keeping our best friend shut up in Fort Warren, all the while supposing that we have an enemy there! We are dull fellows, according to Mr. Stephens, and "can't see" the difference between friend or foe, or we should let him out of prison, and give him a pension, as a man who had been injured in the war for the Union.

Then there is another friend of the Union whom we have ungratefully locked up in Fort Pulaski: Mr. Trenholm, to wit, who was Confederate Secretary of the Treasury. Can't a stupid people see that in compelling us to create a national debt, Mr. Trenholm was simply forcing us to receive a national blessing, according to the wise declaration of Mr. Jay Cooke, whose success entitles all that he says to be received as gospel truth? Why, if it had n't been for the action of such gentlemen as Messieurs Stephens and Trenholm, we might not have owed a dollar at this time; and one shudders to think what must have been the consequences of so awful a deprivation as that. Then there is Mr. Davis himself. If Mr. Stephens was our warm friend, Mr. Davis must have been our friend at red heat. He sacrificed himself, and slavery, and his family, only that the world might be taught how powerful a nation is the American Republic. The harder he hit us and the more fervent were his curses at our expense, the greater is the proof of his love for us. How deep-seated must be his astonishment because of his imprisonment! how dull he must pronounce us! It would not be strange if he were to come to the conclusion that he was not wise in going through so much for the benefit of a race so incapable of comprehending the truth. And if he should be tried, convicted, and hanged, we should go down the stream of history as the most ungrateful of all ungrateful peoples.

Seriously, is it not asking a little too much of the people of this country that they should believe that a man like Mr. Stephens accepted rebel office only that he might have the power to put an end to the rebellion? The very dignity of rebellion requires that we should be slow to believe that the rebel leaders were as contemptible as we know them to have been wicked. It is possible to feel respect for men who were rebels on principle, though their principle was bad; but how contemptible must be the men who rebelled only that they might be of service to the loyal portion of the country! Having been accustomed to look upon Mr. Stephens as one of the first men of the South, we are not prepared to see him assume the part of the rebellion's Jerry Sneak. He appears better as knave than as fool; and though no wise man would wish to be compelled to elect between the two characters, we know Mr. Stephens sufficiently well to be aware that he would not himself give the preference to folly's cap and bells over the knave's badge.

COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS FOR ADMISSION TO THE MILITARY AND NAVAL SCHOOLS.

In the summer of 1858, a party of teachers, delegates appointed by the National Association which had assembled in Washington to deliberate upon educational affairs, visited Mr. Thompson, Secretary of the Interior, and besought his influence in favor of establishing uniform test examinations for the admission of students to the Government Military and Naval Schools.

Mr. Thompson himself had graduated at West Point, but he had obtained admission to that school in a way very different from the one proposed. He declined favoring the project, and gave as a reason for so doing that many worthy persons never could have secured West Point privileges had such tests previously existed, and himself especially would have been for ever excluded. The reason was, in a certain sense, conclusive to the minds of the members of the delegation. This is the chief reason given by politicians who oppose the measure. They have another which bears more strongly on their own minds, but which it is not good for them to use openly.

The calamitous years just passed—perhaps, we are almost ready to say, blessed years, in that they have prepared the way for a peaceful future, consecrated to freedom—seem to have affected but little the progress of general education. And so far as our subject has been concerned, the events of the war have added greatly to its importance, and tended to press it upon the attention of the public. It is needless to dwell upon the fact, widely appreciated, that educated officers of ability might have saved the country the loss of much treasure, and much sorrow and shame.

The existing prejudice against the national academies grows out of the relation in which they have been made to stand to the community at large. Practically, the people have gained but little more benefit from them than they might have gained from private institutions of a like character. Demagogues have used the privileges of these institutions for private ends, dispensing them as patronage to party favorites, and thus the public has been cut off from benefits originally designed to fall among influential and obscure, rich and poor citizens alike. It surely was not intended that Congressmen should appoint young men to the academies regardless of their acquirements and abilities. And yet this is done, and will continue to be done, until these nominations are virtually taken out of the hands of partisans. If candidates for admission had been subjected to thorough examinations, such men as Jacob Thompson would certainly never have entered; and it could not have been said, as it now can truthfully, that many who graduated, and all who failed to graduate, were totally unfit to be educated for the public service at the public expense.

The nominations for appointment to the academies are, in most cases, made regardless of any standard of merit. This procedure is a serious cause of complaint on the part of all who desire to be appointed but are unnoticed in the selection, and hence a feeling of dissatisfaction extends over the whole country. Frequently, the young men chosen are the unruly sons of wealthy and influential partisans, who expect West Point discipline to curb the follies of their offspring and bring them out with sound minds and respectable characters. Trained professors and thorough methods of instruction and discipline can accomplish wonders for weak minds and wayward dispositions, but even West Point is only so far successful as to impart to a majority of its students an air of culture. By this nothing derogatory to methods of instruction or professors is meant. Both our naval and military schools are probably equal in organization to any of the like character; but surely there is a weakness somewhere, when the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy for 1864 feels justified in saying that, after one more year's instruction than is obtained in the "French Naval School, at Brest, the entrance examination there would exclude most of the graduates of our academy." The evil consists in the manner of selecting the human material to be wrought upon; and, unless a change is made in this particular, all the ability that can be gathered together, all the appliances the War Department can furnish, will not suffice to check the well founded and growing distrust which is fast seizing hold upon the public mind.

Of those sent to the academies, very few graduate, and not many who do graduate render their country such service as may be considered an adequate return, either in quality or quantity, for the cost of their education. There are hundreds of young men educated in private schools of the country at their own expense, where they have gone from motives of honorable ambition, being unable to gain admission to the Government schools for want of patronage to aid them—nay, there are many self-educated—who are better qualified than the majority of academy graduates to fill the best positions in the gift of the Government. Yet however well qualified one may be, he very naturally stands but little chance of obtaining certain positions against a West Pointer having no ability. The feeling of dissatisfaction which this breeds can only be removed by opening the doors of admission to the academies, through competitive examinations, to the whole country. When this is done, General Barnard may, with some degree of propriety, reply to applications for positions on the engineer corps, "that none but West Point graduates have been given such positions, and probably none others will ever receive them." By this time it ought to be known to the Government that many of its academy pupils are unfit to profit by the public money. The enormous cost of graduating one cannot be more than compensated by faithful service for twice as many years as it requires to complete the course. And yet how many render no service after graduating, how many are a burden upon the department to which they are attached, and—worse than all—how many fail to graduate because of incompetence! $15,000 is not too high an estimate for the cost of each graduate. This makes the annual expense per pupil nearly $4,000. Were every one to graduate and enter the service, the Government would be no more than repaid for its money spent.

The crisis through which we have recently passed created demands for every man possessing a military education. The academies have furnished many valuable officers to the army and navy, but not nearly so many as might have been supplied to the country had all who entered them been intellectually qualified to improve the thorough and full course of training provided for them. The number that are stopped through incompetence before the completion of the course is every year very great. There is no reason why the Government should be at so great an expense for nothing. Doubtless it will be difficult for Congressmen to give up this little bit of patronage, but the sooner it is done the better, both for representatives and the country.

A step in the right direction has already been taken by several members of Congress. Mr. Sickles, of New York, selected his nominee to West Point from a class of candidates who were tested by examination. The successful one out of twenty competitors was a member of the New York Free Academy, in which his standing in scholarship was about the middle of his class. He graduated from West Point in 1863 at the head of his class. It is believed that Gen. Garfield, of Ohio, also selected by examination. Some few others, "with a conscientious sense of the responsibility resting upon them, have given their patronage to the result of general competition." This language is quoted from a speech by Senator Anthony, delivered May 18, 1864, in the Senate in the debate upon the bill making appropriation for the Military Academy, when he spoke upon the following amendment:

"And be it further enacted, That hereafter in all appointments of cadets to the Military Academy at West Point, the selections for such appointments in the several districts shall be made from the candidates according to their respective merits and qualifications, to be determined under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War shall from time to time prescribe."

It is difficult to understand why this amendment did not pass. Certainly not for lack of cogent reasons in its favor. It was urged by a warm friend of the academy, who earnestly deprecated the popular prejudice, and vindicated his fidelity to the institution by allusions to its "scores of graduates, who rushed to the head of our new levies, organizing and leading them to glorious victory." He did not pretend to say that any course of military instruction could make a military genius, but he would not, therefore, discard military education.

"The academy has never had a fair chance; the country has not had a fair chance; the boys (of the country) have not had a fair chance. This is what I want them all to have. I desire that the academy shall begin, as it goes on, upon the competition principle." "Under the present system the academy wastes full half of its strength upon boys who never ought to be admitted, and whose natural incapacity prevents them profiting by the training they receive there. Under the system proposed, the academy would exert its influence upon thousands of the brightest and most aspiring boys all over the country, stimulating them to the pursuit of such studies and to the formation of such habits as, if they fail to carry them to West Point, will help to conduct them to usefulness and honor in whatever path of life they may choose."

The adoption of the plan would bring incalculable benefits to the country at large. Besides affording a means of thorough culture to the best working talent of the nation, and thereby placing at the service of the nation its best and noblest powers, it would, at the same time, stimulate the cause of general education. Schools and colleges, teachers and professors, would take great pride in fitting boys for the national academies. As the appliances and methods of instruction improved, the standards of excellence and the tests of admission would advance; and out of this progress there would grow throughout the land an enlivening and ennobling spirit of intellectual industry. It would open a practical route of communication between the common school and the state, and lead to a more systematic and pointed inculcation of the principles of government and the elements of patriotism as a part of public education.

A British Commission, in a report on the French system of military education, says that "admission to the military schools of France can only be gained through a public competitive examination . . . . . A powerful influence has thus been exercised upon the character of education in France."

The Royal Military Academy of Great Britain was formerly filled by patronage, but is now thrown open to general competition. "The results," as stated in debate in Parliament, are "that sons of merchants, attorneys, clergymen, mechanics, and noblemen were among the successful competitors."

Says Mr. Edward Chadwick, in a report before the National Social Science Association at Cambridge in 1862:

"During the five years of the open-competition principle there has not been one dismissed for incapacity. Moreover, the general standard of capacity has advanced. Another result, the opposite to that which was confidently predicted by the opponents to the principle, has been that the average physical power or bodily strength, instead of being diminished, is advanced beyond the average of its predecessors. . . . . A stimulus of the most healthy and powerful kind, worth more than millions of pecuniary endowment, has been given to all the great schools of the country, including the universities of England, Scotland, and Ireland."

Austria, Prussia, and Italy have adopted the competitive plan for admission to their military establishments. In Austria staff officers are chosen upon this principle.

In conclusion, let us say that this matter is approved by the professors in both the Military and Naval Academies; that it has been strongly urged by Boards of Visitors in 1863, 1864, and 1865; that it is cordially approved by the Secretary of War; and that, finally, and not least in importance, it is called for by the public. The argument against it drawn from the fact that West Point, under the present régime, has produced men like Grant and Sherman, is one of those old stock arguments by which nearly every abuse has been or might be defended. Wellington received little or no school education. Soult and Ney rose from the ranks. Cromwell never saw a regiment till he was in middle life. Garibaldi had probably never opened a book on military science when he defended Rome. But would it do to infer from these cases that a regular professional training is of no use to a soldier?

A SONG OF A SLATER.

Upon the church roof perched so high,
The white clouds are my company;
Far down below their shadows fly
Across the flowing grain;
And through the belfry, in and out,
A cheery wind is making rout;
It blows the pigeons all about,
And flutters them amain.

Down there, beyond the plum-tree row,
There is a garden-wall I know,
Where vines with purple grapes aglow
Encase a garden door.
See, from that nook of leafy shade
Into the sunlight slips a maid;
I hold my breath, as half afraid
Of seeing her no more.

But on she glides, her sunny head
Now gleams above a flower bed;
Now, veiled in dappled dimness shed
Through lacing branches, glows;
Now at the porch, she will not stay!
One moment turns her face this way,
One moment brightens all the day,
Then into darkness goes.

And there beyond, my own home lies;
My little brothers' voices rise
Among the trees; and mother's eyes
I know are turned this way:
A hundred happy homes lie round,
And in them all my friends are found;
What more is in this garden ground
I have no heart to say.

Correspondence.

THE SUFFRAGE AND THE CONSTITUTION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

"I hope . . . . that a [State] constitution containing or permitting a difference of civil or political rights founded on difference of color or race, will be rejected. . . . I am perfectly aware that the constitution of the State may be changed at any time. This difficulty is not, so far I can see, to be overcome."—T. P. (Cambridge), in Boston Daily Advertiser, June 1, 1865.

"I conclude, therefore, on this subject of negro voting, that in all States which can claim their full rights under the Constitution, it is a question for the State; and that in revolted States it is a question of policy and military government, to be decided by the national authorities, until the State is fully restored unto its former condition."—Senator Sherman, ibid, June 17, 1865.

It is obvious from the above extracts, especially in connection with the residue of the articles from which they were taken, that these two distinguished jurisconsults fully agree in three important points of constitutional law, particularly interesting at the present moment: 1st, That wisdom and policy, as well as justice, require that no citizen shall be denied the elective franchise on account of color or race. 2d, That the rebel States may now be held, under military law or otherwise, till they adopt constitutions founded on that principle. 3d, That when they or any other people are actually admitted to full State rights, the regulation of the matter belongs, by the Constitution of the United States, to the States themselves.

The first two propositions, it is to be hoped, would now receive the approbation of all loyal men. These distinguished writers, however, do not state the ground on which they agree that the rebel States may be rightfully coerced in this respect. They both appear to recognize the fact that the people of the rebel States have, by their rebellion, destroyed their own State governments, and renounced all their other political rights as component parts of the nation under the Constitution of the United States; and, among the rest, the right or power of resuscitating themselves, in any form as civil States within the Union, without the assent and assistance of the general Government. For holding them in this position, one of them seems to rely on the military power, under which the other also says "they certainly can be held." The military power may undoubtedly prevent their assembling in convention, or forming and adopting a constitution of any sort. The civil power also might do the same by rendering illegal all acts tending to such a result. But if, notwithstanding measures of either sort, a constitution should be actually adopted and presented to Congress, its acceptance by Congress would cure all preliminary irregularities, and the State would be restored to the Union, as a new State so accepted would be admitted, with full State rights. It is this ultimate power of acceptance or rejection that is specially invoked. If the Government have expressly or impliedly authorized or invited a people to form a State constitution preparatory to admission to the Union, or if a people have done the same, unauthorized and uninvited, Congress, having the power, may reject it arbitrarily and wrongfully, as they may abuse any other power, against reason and without right.

But this is not the power to which they would appeal. They refer to a lawful power, judiciously exercised, for adequate reasons and justifiable cause. What is that cause? Undoubtedly such a cause might exist in the irregular and unauthorized manner in which the instrument had been formed and presented, independent of any radical objections, in principle, to the instrument itself. But this would not necessarily cover the case. They consider the "permitting a difference of civil or political rights founded on a difference of color or race" an adequate objection to its acceptance. Undoubtedly it is. But on what ground? The Constitution requires many duties of the States as political bodies, many of their governments, and of the different departments and officers of their government as such, as well as the republican character of the governments themselves. The constitution of a "State in this Union" must provide the means for the performance of all these duties, or it cannot be held to be such as the United States Constitution requires for a State. It must have the officers, the departments of the government, and the corporation of whom those duties are required, or it cannot perform the duties of a "State in this Union," or be admitted or retained as such. A State constitution deficient in any one of these particulars ought to, of course, and must be rejected.

But what part of the Constitution is inconsistent with the discrimination of color in the distribution of political rights? All natural rights may be enjoyed by every man, because all moral duties may be performed by all moral beings. But all political duties cannot, and, of course, political rights may be limited accordingly. The elective franchise, for instance, is a part of the national sovereignty, and the public safety requires that it should be lodged where it will be most likely to be used for the public good rather than for the public detriment. This cannot be done by a particular examination and judgment in regard to every individual, but must of necessity be done by general rules, which exclude some who might safely and advantageously be included, and include others who as manifestly ought to be excluded. Among minors, male and female, and among adult females, who, for general reasons, are universally excluded in all governments, there are many much better qualified for the exercise of the elective franchise than many male adults who are allowed the right. If you draw the line anywhere else as on the difference of color, you encounter the same difficulty, and perhaps others. But what clause or what principle of the Constitution is violated by making color, any more than age or sex, the line of discrimination? They are all natural distinctions, and no individual energy can obliterate or avoid them. Artificial distinctions are different. The barriers created by defect of education, property, profession, or calling of any sort, may be leaped and overcome. But the natural distinctions cannot. Two of them are permanent and unalterable; the other only temporary—though made by nature, it must in due course cease by nature. The others cease not at all. Now, the right to the elective franchise is a no more perfect right than any other political right. The right to elect and to be elected stand on the same ground, and may be regulated, conferred, or withheld by similar authority and for similar reasons.

This brings us to the question where this authority is deposited, under our system, so far as respects the elective franchise, and how and for what reasons it should be exercised. This question is answered by our authors in the third proposition above stated, that the authority belongs to the individual States, and of course may be exercised when, how, and for what reason they please, so far as respects any right of interference by the United States. If this is so, they may regulate it by constitution or by law as they please, and the same revoke, repeal, alter, amend, or abolish, and regulate anew the next day, as they please. This these gentlemen are understood to hold; not in general terms merely, but in direct reference to this particular subject. If a rebel State should make a constitution to-day denying the right of any limitation of the suffrage on account of color or race, and should thereupon be re-admitted to full State rights under the constitution, they may to-morrow, if they please, make another limiting it exclusively on color or race, and there is no remedy. It follows, of course, that they may not only exclude the black race, but any other race; and limit the right to any one race, or family, or even individual, if they please. It is perfectly obvious that on this theory of States rights, the duty of the United States to guarantee to each State a republican government cannot be fulfilled. It is also obvious that the first two propositions above stated become entirely worthless. The answer to the questions, whether the elective franchise ought to be limited on color; and whether the rebel States may be held out of the Union, or where they have placed themselves, until they present a constitution negativing such limitation, is not worth the ink with which it may be written. We deny the whole doctrine, totis viribus.

The question is, Does the regulation, to wit, the limitation or extension, of the right of suffrage among the citizens belong exclusively to the individual States, by the Constitution of the United States? In the first place, the Constitution confers no rights or powers on the States or their governments, by direct grant, in relation to suffrage or anything else. This was discovered by the Virginia Legislature as long ago as February, 1820. In their elaborate resolutions of that date, on the Missouri restrictions, they assert emphatically, and truly, that no "rights are conferred by the Federal Constitution on the State governments." It confers none by implication, except those necessarily involved in the performance of the duties it enjoins on them and their officers. Any exclusive power over the elective franchise is not among these. It confers no power on the States or their governments by reservation even, except a part of those "not delegated to the United States." But it restricts them by numerous express and implied prohibitions. Besides all this, they are further indefinitely restrained by the supremacy of all laws made or enacted under the authority of the Constitution. When all these are duly considered in detail, as well those in posse as those in esse, it will be easy to comprehend the mass of power belonging exclusively to the States. But the Constitution recognizes the existence of the States as bodies politic, and component parts of the nation, but not as independent nations, and guarantees them republican governments, suited to their subordinate position in the Union. This places them on the ground of individuals, in some respects, as lawful agents—governmental agents, within the limits of paramount law. Our fathers had been educated to this. Their Colonial governments, though parts of the empire, were still governments, bodies politic, local corporations, authorized to make laws, ordinances, etc., but always "so as such laws, ordinances, and constitutions, so made, be not contrary and repugnant unto . . . . the laws of this our realm of England.' So our present local governments are controlled by the Constitution and laws of the United States. The prohibitions, whether express or implied, are peremptory, and cannot be passed. But the most extensive and important restrictions, as well on States as individuals, arise from the absolute supremacy of the laws of the United States.

Those have been heretofore very sparingly applied, for two reasons: 1st, When the present government was instituted for the nation, it found the existing government of the United States disorganized and deranged, and all its concerns in dilapidation, while the local governments were organized and in full operation; so that the general and external interests of the country required all, and more than all, their attention, and the internal and local interests of the people demanded little or none at their hands; 2d, It was the policy of the slaveholders, who controlled the administration of the Government then and ever afterwards, till by rebellion they shook it off entirely, to keep it as far as possible from any influence over their domestic institutions and interests, which they could easier manage to their own satisfaction through their own local governments. But their bad management of those institutions and interests has proved so disastrous to themselves and so expensive of the blood and treasure of the nation, that it may be hoped that the general Government will not feel warranted, in future, to neglect or withdraw themselves from the regulation of any interest which concerns the safety, welfare, or liberty of the people. When the general Government shall actually undertake and enter upon the full performance of the duty for which it was created by "the people of the United States," viz., "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty" to all the people, the local governments will find the subjects of their exclusive jurisdiction very much curtailed, though their usefulness may be very much increased. Duties neglected, overlooked, or deferred by the general Government have been assumed by the States, because corporations, like individuals, may do, according to law, whatever infringes no law or is prohibited by no law; and this is the principal source of all local legislation. In regard to this particular subject of the right of suffrage, Congress has never taken the first step towards defining or limiting it; and if the State legislatures had not, the whole subject might have remained unregulated to this day.

The only clauses of the Constitution having direct reference to the subject are the 2d and 4th sections of the first article, and the guarantee clause already alluded to. The first is in these words: "The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature." This settles two points only—that other qualifications than mere citizenship, being of "the people," membership of the nation, may be required; and that electors of representatives to Congress must have all the qualifications of electors of State representatives. Two other points germane to the subject it leaves both unsettled and untouched, to wit: by whom those qualifications shall be fixed, and whether any and what additional qualifications may be required for electors of members of Congress. That those last points are not concluded by the clause, as it stands, is evident from the fact that it would have been perfectly consistent with all it contains if it had continued—"these qualifications, and any others that may be thought suitable, may be prescribed by Congress." Such an addition would contradict nothing standing before it, but would have been entirely compatible with it, and, although it is not actually embodied in this clause, it may, without the least inconsistency, be found in or result from provisions in subsequent parts of the Constitution. No grant of an independent or exclusive power over the subject is here made to the State governments. The language imports no such thing; and even if it was susceptible of any such construction, its utter incompatibility with other provisions would prove such construction erroneous.*

The first part of the 4th section is in these words: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof." If the section ended here, and this was the only clause in the Constitution relating to the suffrage, there can be no doubt but it would give the entire subject to the States. The time, place, and manner of an election, in default of any other provisions, would include every circumstance in regard to it necessary for carrying it into complete execution and giving it its perfect effect. There are, among others, the subject on which the suffrage is to be taken, the mass of people from whom the voters are to be selected, the principle of the selection governing the number and qualifications of electors, their previous registration, the frequency of elections, the permanence and functions of the elected, the check-list and mode of voting by ballot or viva voce, the sorting, counting, declaring, recording, and returning the result, the appointment of the officers and their authority under whose supervision all this is to be done, together with the means of punishing frauds and securing the purity of the election; all these items are included in the manner of an election, and if not specially provided for elsewhere in the Constitution, necessarily fall under this general provision. Two of them are otherwise regulated. The subjects to be acted on are fixed. The body of people from whom the electors are to be taken is fixed. But we have seen that neither the principle of selection nor the number or proportion of those to be selected is fixed by the 2d section, nor is the power of fixing them there assigned to either government. This, then, with all other items of "time, place, and manner," whether mentioned above or not, fall directly within the purview of this 4th section.

* This clause, as originally reported by the "Committee of Detail" in the first draft of the Constitution, was in these words: "The qualifications of electors shall be the same, from time to time, as those of the electors, in the several States, of the most numerous branch of their own legislatures." In the course of the discussion of the clause, Mr. Governeur Morris said: "Another objection against the clause, as it stands, is, that it makes the qualifications of the National Legislature depend on the will of the States, which is thought not proper." The "Committee of Revision" reported the clause in the form in which it now stands. It is a significant fact, in reference to the precise effect of this change of phraseology, that the revised draft was made by Mr. Morris himself.—See Madison Papers in loco.

And if the section had ended as above, it would have been seen clearly, and nobody would have disputed, that the whole power over them was expressly assigned to the State governments. But the 4th section does not end there. It proceeds as follows: "But the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations," etc. They may alter them if not made right, or they may make them ab initio if not made at all by the State legislatures. This places the whole subject in the hands of Congress for their ultimate control, in the same broad and express form as it does primarily in the hands of the State legislatures. This was done, as stated by the authors of the "Federalist," on the avowed principle "that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation." If the construction of the 2d section should be that the qualifications of electors of State and United States representatives should be the same, then the 4th section, by giving the last expressly to Congress in the last resort, necessarily gives both. This is probably the true meaning. If the construction of the 2d section should be different, and require only that electors of representatives to Congress should have all the qualifications of electors of State representatives, without restriction as to others, then the provisions of the 4th section would not directly apply to the regulation of the qualifications of electors of State representatives. But as Congress has expressly the power, in the last resort, to regulate all the qualifications of electors of members of Congress, and as no power is given to the State legislatures in reference to electors of State representatives, it would follow that such regulation as Congress should make in regard to their own case would control also the State electors. And in that case, other provisions of the Constitution would come strongly in aid of the power thus given to Congress over the whole subject. The next section gives to each House the right to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." This is in the nature of a judicial rather than a legislative power. Each House may not make laws prescribing the times, places, and manner of elections, returns, qualifications, etc., but they may "judge" of their conformity to law, in particular cases as they arise; and experience has shown that they may sometimes, for party purposes or otherwise, judge contrary to law.

In addition to this, and more directly applicable to the duty of the general Government to regulate the elective franchise, in respect to the number and qualifications of the electors to State offices, is the clause of guarantee, art. 4, § 4: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." Every independent political community must select its own depositories of its sovereignty. It is as much impossible for every member of a nation to be a voter as it is for him to be the king. The nation has the same right to say the whole sovereignty shall be deposited with one man, and who that man shall be, as it has to say it shall be deposited with a few or many, and who the few or many shall be. The right to do either arises from absolute necessity, and involves the principle of election. An election may be made by general laws, or by an examination and judgment on every man's claim. In a monarchy or oligarchy it is usually made by general rules adopted beforehand. In a republic it is physically impossible it should be made otherwise. These rules should not only recognize the nature and objects of the trust, in relation to the general welfare, but should also be just in respect to individuals, founded on the equal rights of man as recognized in the principles of our Revolution, the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of the United States. A man justly conscious of his own superior qualifications to be President of the United States, has just the same right to be President that a female or minor thus qualified has to be an elector. They both depend upon an election in the form and under the rules of law. The present question is, Who, under our Constitution, shall prescribe the law by which the voter, a holder of a part or the whole of the sovereignty, shall be elected or designated? And it is perfectly obvious that whoever does this, in reference to an individual State, decides whether that State shall be a republic, an oligarchy, or a monarchy. As the Constitution expressly imposes this duty on the general Government, it necessarily includes the other also. By making the general Government responsible for the republicanism of every State, it confers all the power necessary for that purpose. It confers on the States no power inconsistent with this; and the people of the States cannot do so, because they have already disposed of the power by giving it to the United States. The argument lies in a nut-shell. If the Government decline or disclaim the right of control over the elective franchise in the States, they abdicate and repudiate their constitutional duty to fulfil the guarantee by putting it beyond their power to perform it. The elementary writers on the science of government represent the disposition and regulation of that portion of sovereignty exercised by the suffrage as the principal ingredient in constituting a republic—absolutely essential to be provided for in the fundamental law. By whom, and on what subjects, it may be used in a republic, are as necessary to be prescribed and known as it is in a monarchy to designate who is the prince. The same doctrine is held by distinguished American statesmen. It enters into the very nature of republicanism, its essential elements, its component characteristics. There may be others, to be sure, but this is one, indispensably necessary to the identity of the compound idea; any one of which being wanting destroys the republicanism of the government. What these are beyond the suffrage it is not now necessary to enquire. But whatever they are, they must all be found in the constitution, the fundamental law of a State, or it is not a republican government within the national guaranty. The Government, which is responsible for the fulfilment of that guaranty, must decide what those essential component ingredients are, and either prescribe them beforehand that they may be complied with in the first instance, point them out afterwards that they may be supplied in the revisions, or repeal and nullify, by general law, whatever is incompatible with them, otherwise the guaranty may remain a dead letter. This responsible power is in Congress, because they have all the legislative power of the Government, and because also they have all the special power of admitting States. They must of necessity decide what constitutes a republican government, accept no constitution that does not, and disfranchise any State that destroys such a government when formed, or they do not fulfil the constitutional guaranty. The same right of control over the elective franchise in the States is deducible from the general powers of the Government as contained in the introductory or enacting clause of the Constitution, and as afterwards abridged and epitomized in the beginning of the 8th section, in distributing to Congress that portion of those powers which devolves upon them. But this article is already too much extended to admit of the development of that part of the subject in this place. T. F.

THE PROGRESS OF EMANCIPATION IN RUSSIA.

[We have the grateful privilege of laying before our readers a letter from a veteran philanthropist—perhaps, if we except Lord Brougham, the earliest living advocate of emancipation. Monsieur Tourgueneff belongs by birth to the Russian nobility. He participated in the closing campaigns of the final coalition against Napoleon I., and afterwards held a high office in the state department of his native country, and was the intimate and respected adviser of Alexander I. When that well-meaning but feeble-willed monarch died in 1825, there was an émeute in favor of a constitutional government which was promptly and bloodily suppressed by Nicholas. M. Tourgueneff, who was at that time abroad for his health, was most unjustly implicated in this attempt, and capitally condemned. From that time till 1857, as he states below, he lived an exile, for some time in England, but chiefly in France, his real cause of offence being not his political views which were indeed liberal, but his conspicuous zeal in behalf of his unfortunate countrymen who languished in serfdom. In 1847 he published a work entitled "Russia and the Russians," in three volumes, in which he both gave a sketch of his own life and efforts in behalf of emancipation, and discussed at length the plan which, in his mature judgment, would be most successful for that desirable end. He there expressed his conviction that the deliverer of the serfs could be no other than the autocrat himself, and events have approved his sagacity. A few weeks ago we wrote to congratulate him on the accomplishment of his heart's desire, and to express the hope that he might favor THE NATION, and through it the people of the United States, with his observations of the workings of emancipation in Russia. The following is his response. It is doubly valuable from its direct and indirect bearing upon the two great questions that concern the freedmen of America—land and suffrage.—ED. NATION.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

You are quite right when you mention the immense satisfaction I felt in seeing, by the emancipation of the serfs in Russia, the wishes of my whole life fulfilled. After thirty-three years of absence it was given to me to see my native land again. It was in 1857, the memorable moment when the Emperor Alexander first raised the question of emancipation, and declared it was time for it to be accomplished. As might have been expected, the idea of emancipation met with great opposition from different sides. Yet, I must say, the opposition was directed not so much against the personal emancipation of the serfs as against the appropriation to them, when liberated, of the land they held. The proprietors, assembled in different committees which were established all over the empire to discuss the matter, ended even by giving up their right of possession in the person of the serf, and, mentioning only their right to the land occupied by the peasants, claimed pecuniary indemnities if that land were delivered to them. The honorable gentlemen whom the Emperor entrusted with this important task, forming a committee ad hoc, declared from the first as a principle that the emancipated peasants must have land, about in the same quantity as they had hitherto occupied, on condition of a pecuniary indemnity to be paid to the proprietors. That principle prevailed, thanks to the Emperor's firmness.

During the discussion of that question in Russia, I published several writings on the matter.* My chief purpose and warmest desire being to secure to the peasants as soon as possible their personal freedom and complete liberty of labor, I proposed a method of emancipation claiming the entire property of their homes—that is to say, cottages and orchards, and a small quantity of arable land, and that without the slightest indemnity from them to their masters, which was to be left to Government. A sum of about two hundred millions of dollars, according to my calculation, would have been sufficient for it.

Meanwhile, I inherited a small landed property,† inhabited by about four hundred persons of both sexes. I hastened to Russia, and put in practice my method. I abandoned one-third of the land, including their houses, to the peasants, and let them the two remaining thirds for a certain sum of money. In my agreement with them it was settled that, if the emancipation which the Government was preparing (1859) turned out more advantageous to them, they were to accept it in preference to mine. It is needless to add, that when the official emancipation was proclaimed, the peasants and myself found it more advantageous, and adopted it. If I were to compare the two methods, I should say that mine tended chiefly to the liberty of the peasants' person and labor, and that of the Government to give them a quantity of land sufficient for their subsistence. The great inconvenience of this last method is, that it obliges the peasants to pay a heavy rent to redeem their land, and that during forty-nine years! Nevertheless, their passion to possess land is so strong that they cheerfully submit to such hard conditions. The redeeming rent (rente de rachat) must be paid by the peasants either in money, according to an estimation fixed by law, or by work done for the proprietor, i. e., by corvées. This last mode of payment, sanctioned by law only for a short period, disappears more and more every day, so that the majority of the peasants even now do not work for the proprietors, but pay their rent in money. I can say more: about two millions of peasants are now entirely liberated with regard to the proprietors, thanks to an immediate payment of the redeeming rent. In such cases their annual rent (redevance) is capitalized, and the Government gives the proprietor an obligation for the amount of the capital, which bears five per cent. interest, and will be redeemed in the course of forty-nine years by annual drawings (tirages). The peasants then pay their redeeming rent to Government, and thus become free and independent proprietors. Since some time both peasants and proprietors seem to find this proceeding the most profitable, and agreements of this kind become more and more frequent every day.

I can hardly say how happy I was when I saw, last year, for the first time, my dear, beloved, and deeply respected Russian peasants free at last and proprietors of the land they had till then cultivated as serfs! What a change! The same creatures, serfs yesterday, are now men, conscious of their human dignity: their aspect, their language, are those of free men. In the meanwhile, in getting rid of their serfdom, they have preserved their usual good sense, wisdom, and bonhomie: no impertinence, no arrogance whatever, can be detected in them; they are full of self-respect, yet polite. I saw them discussing with the authorities some business of theirs: they maintained their new rights, and, when wrong, never hesitated to acknowledge it. You may have seen in my book,* sir, that I always had a high opinion of the Russian peasants' moral qualities. Well, all I saw last year was beyond my expectation!

Your reformers can tell you that, in loving dearly the slaves, one can hardly help feeling a very different sentiment towards their owners. To be fair, I must say that I am perfectly reconciled with the Russian proprietors. Although many of them were not delighted with emancipation, now it is accomplished there is no vestige of animosity between the two classes, nobles and peasants: a happy reconciliation has taken place. It is true in this again example came from the peasants; the great merit of the nobles is in having at last acknowledged their moral worth.

You will excuse me, sir, if I go on praising the Russian peasants; but quite lately their behavior, in circumstances very important for themselves and the country in general, was so striking and noble that it deserves the attention of every serious and benevolent man. The facts are these. You perhaps have read in the newspapers that the Russian Government issued a law on the municipal organization of the country. It is founded upon just and wise principles; it is very like what was formerly tried in France by the celebrated Turgot, or what exists now in Belgium, and is by far more liberal than the present French municipal system.

Every district and every chef-lieu has every year an assembly of deputies who name a permanent committee for three years. This committee is charged with the municipal administration, under the control of the assembly. Every one is called by law to the election of deputies. Well, it happened in many places that the peasants were the more numerous and could, therefore, dispose of all the places in the administrative committee. They were so informed. "No," was their answer; "we want one or two members of the committee taken from amongst ourselves: they will watch over our interests. As for defending them, as for action, the nobles we name will do it better than we, for they are more learned than we are." In one of the assemblies the nobles, moved by the tact and moderation of the peasants, insisted, and almost forced a peasant to become president of the administrative committee of the district. When the salary of the members of the committee had to be decided, the peasants generally considered it too high for them, and, letting the nobles and the merchants have it, got it diminished by one-half for themselves. We must not forget that the men who behave in this way towards their former lords and masters were serfs yesterday, and that they are for the first time called to discuss not only their own affairs—which they were used to, thanks to the ancient organization of the Russian commune—but the general affairs of a whole district also. Do not think, however, that their modesty reaches total abnegation. In one district the nobles, full of the prejudices which are now so absurd, showed some displeasure in finding themselves side by side with peasants, acting the same part as they, voting with them, and so on. There the peasants knew how to maintain their rights and independence, and voted for men of their own class.

All the district assemblies, after having voted the formation of the administrative committee, name the deputies for the larger assembly in the chief town in the province, which, of its turn, chooses among its own members the members for the provincial administrative committee. The central committee seems to interest the peasants less than those of the districts, and this too is owing to their modesty and moderation. In the course of time they will learn that they, as well as the nobles, can play a part in the general committees.

Another field is offered by the new law to the activity of the peasants in the local or municipal tribunals. The law unites several rural communes in one canton (volost). Each canton, each commune, chooses an ancient, assisted by a conseil. In every canton is a tribunal to judge the peasants' affairs. Ancients and judges are elected by peasants; noblemen are not submitted to these tribunals, but it has happened that some of them preferred having their difficulties with peasants settled by municipal judges rather than by the usual tribunals. This jurisdiction, established merely for peasants, has great importance, owing chiefly to the privilege of deciding

* "L'organisation des biens des Apanages, en vue de l'émancipation des paysans seigneuriaux." [Aug., 1857.] "Résumé des dispositions basées sur le rescrit impérial du 20 novembre, 1857." [Mar., 1858.] "Pora! (Il est temps!)" [Oct., 1857—July, 1858.] "La question de l'émancipation et la question de l'administration des paysans." [Oct., 1858.] "Un dernier mot sur l'émancipation des serfs en Russie." [1860.] Besides numerous articles.—ED. NATION.

† The commune of Starodoub.—ED. NATION.

* "The class of Russian serfs has always been, above and before all, the object of my affections—affections the more lively as I have never seen any one render these men the justice which is their due. . . . Yes, I love these good Russian serfs, and, even to the sacred beard which still distinguishes them, everything in them is for me an object of respect." [La Russie et les Russes, 1847.]—ED. NATION.

not only according to general law but also according to local customs. Opportunities have not been wanting for the good sense of the peasants to show itself in these municipal tribunals and councils, and the success of the institution is clear to every one.

After expatiating at such length on the Russian emancipation, allow me, sir, to say a few words about another emancipation also accomplished by the Russian Government. I am the more desirous because it seems to be little known in Europe and to be appreciated in a very insufficient and erroneous manner. I mean the emancipation in the Kingdom of Poland. The Polish peasants in the grand duchy of Warsaw were, it is true, proclaimed personally free by a decree of Napoleon I., and the introduction of the French code civil; but, in fact, they remained in the same condition as before, on account of the law which united in the hands of the proprietor the judicial and executive power, with the right of corporal punishment. The peasants were always unhappy in Poland: the Polish aristocracy, whom history adorns with such brilliant qualities, could never be praised for the Christian virtue of brotherly love, if they ever considered the peasants as brethren. Their indifference for the fate of the peasants contributed most to the decline and fall of that unfortunate nation. A paper published in the "Quarterly Review" (April, 1863) exposes the state of Poland in that respect in a very striking manner. I have explained with some detail the emancipation of the Polish peasants in a paper, written in Russian, which I intend publishing. The third and last chapter speaks of the Kingdom of Poland, and is translated in French. That translation, as yet unprinted, I can send you if you like, and you may put it to whatever purpose you choose.

I have felt, as you may well imagine, the most sincere interest in all that has been going on in America during these latter years. I lamented, from the depths of my soul, the death of your President, who, by the strength of his honesty, the firmness of his noble mind, placed his name in history next to the greatest man of modern times, your immortal Washington! I lamented his death the more because his latest speeches and manifestations made us hope that the glorious triumph of the North Americans would put an end to all the evils suffered by every one in your country. The promoters of the criminal and immoral insurrection have undoubtedly deserved the highest punishment, but they have undergone it already, they suffer it still. In fact, what punishment can be more cruel than to witness the whole world applauding the triumph of the North, the triumph of right and liberty, and the total ruin of the cause those miserable men have been fighting for? Compared with such a failure, all ordinary punishment seems a trifle, a deliverance, rather.

As to the negroes, who must just now particularly preoccupy those who have spent their lives in defending the unhappy creatures, I see with intense pleasure that many distinguished men in America are trying to secure for them the right of suffrage. As I write, I have on my table the Anti-Slavery Standard of July 1, and I find there in Gov. Holden's discourse the following words: "No people has ever yet bounded at once into the full enjoyment of the right of self-government." It seems to me that the poor negroes, in receiving the right of suffrage, would not, by that alone, enjoy at once self-government; and I think that, putting aside both right and expediency, the general welfare requires the removal (as far as it is possible) of all the barriers that unfortunately exist between the two races. If you deprive the blacks of the right of suffrage, you continue to keep them aside, separated from the community, and, in spite of personal liberty, they will always be considered by the whites and by themselves as pariahs; and that feeling has certainly its inconveniences—even its dangers. One must not chaffer with man for the rights of man. The rights that law, in whatever country, gives men must be the same for every one. The words of the Hon. Governor find, in my opinion, a striking refutation in what took place and is still taking place in Russia and Poland. The peasants there did not "bound at once" from the state of serfs to that of freemen, but enjoy, nevertheless, as real a self-government as the political state of the countries allows. Evidently our peasants were in a condition far superior to that of the negroes, but it is just on account of their inferiority that the most efficacious means must be employed to change their state, and nothing can be better than the right of suffrage, elevating them at once to the same level with the whites. Prejudices alone would then remain to be deplored and fought against; the law would be free from all reproach, the legislator would have done all he could possibly do.

Under the impression of what is going on in my own country, I cannot help wishing that the Americans would give the freedmen some land, not, of course, in sending them to settle far away as colons, but in allowing them to settle wherever they can have some land of their own. Then only will they feel and appreciate the advantages of a free and independent life. Then only will they try to increase their welfare, and that would certainly give hands to the great proprietors for cultivating their cotton. The freedman, once he has understood the advantages of working on his small bit of land, will not be satisfied with it alone: he will go and look for other work, in order to make his life more and more easy and happy.

Accept, sir, my best compliments and kind regard.

N. TOURGUENEFF.

VERT-BOIS, July 14, 1865.

FEELING OF THE SOUTH CAROLINIANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Having recently returned from South Carolina, it occurs to me to give you an outline of a conversation that I held with a gentleman to whom I was introduced one day. I do not feel at liberty to mention his name, but will say that he is a person of great wealth and high position, one of the best specimens of the South Carolina aristocracy, and that he is universally esteemed by whites and blacks. I will call him Mr. O.

We were led to the subject of reconstruction by my remarking upon the wonderful quickness with which the State had returned to tranquillity, as illustrated by my quiet and safe journey into the interior of the State. He answered in general terms that, as I said in a former letter, the people of the State were fully convinced of the failure of the rebellion, and desired in good faith to return under the Government of the Union; and that they were also convinced that slavery was at an end, and were ready to do whatever was necessary to try the experiment of free labor in good faith. He had conversed with gentlemen of influence from all parts of the South, and this was the unanimous sentiment. For himself, he would go further, as he supposed, than most, and say that not only did he admit that slavery was dead, but he should be very strongly opposed to any attempt to revive it, or even to prolong it for a day; that it was better for the South to have it perish at once than to have any intermediate or gradual stage. He was not sure, he repeated, that he went further than others in this. I think, however, from all I could learn, that he was right, and that the majority of the planters strongly desire—although only a very few of them really expect—that Congress shall interfere to make emancipation gradual. A planter from Anderson District, sitting near us, assented to Mr. O.'s testimony as to the opinion of the community, and the same statement was afterwards emphatically confirmed by a wealthy and influential gentleman from Sumter, and, indeed, by everybody whom I met.

Mr. O. told me that as soon as possible after our occupation he called his house-slaves together, and told them they were free now to get work where they could, and he was free to hire whom he liked; that it was probable it would be better for both parties to make a change, as there would be some embarrassment in keeping together under their new relation; however, that was for them to decide, and they need be in no haste about the decision, as they could stay with him until they had made up their minds. So far, they had all staid. Indeed, it is my opinion that house-servants, as a rule, can do better for the present by staying with their masters without wages than by changing. Almost all of them have children, and if they can get themselves and children boarded and clothed, it is all they can expect for some time to come. In Charleston, I saw a family that had left their master because he would give no wages. They could get no employment, and were simply living on their friends. People must examine into circumstances before they advise those who are situated in this way to demand wages. For field-hands I think there will be a great demand; but house-servants have always been in excess. They have grown up gradually with a family, and now that the Southerners are adopting free labor, the first thing that strikes them is the enormous cost of their establishments—with white domestics they could be served much better at much less expense. I think that almost always they prefer (although this is really against their interests) to make no change, but continue to live as they are accustomed. But if the servants insist upon wages, we can hardly blame them, in their present reduced circumstances, if they conclude that they can do better by hiring some one who is not encumbered with children. Many house-servants, I have no doubt, must go to the fields before long. Few families will put up, in hired servants, with the slovenly and inefficient habits of those who have been slaves.

Mr. O. looked upon the prospect of free labor more hopefully than most Southerners. He considered it still an experiment, in which large numbers of the negroes would perish, but which would eventually succeed. He analyzed the faults of the negro character very skilfully, exaggerating them somewhat, as I thought, and, as was natural, attributing them rather to the race than to the circumstances they have had about them. He did not, however, seem at all disposed to overlook their good traits, and when a bystander spoke of the insolence of the freedmen, he answered, "I think they have behaved extraordinarily well under the circumstances—bet ter, I fear, than the same number of white men would have done in their place."

When I expressed my surprise and gratification at the marks I found of returning loyalty, he protested somewhat warmly against the intolerance of the people of the North in refusing to believe them when they said they submitted in good faith—our newspapers and preachers seemed determined to keep up the spirit of hostility against them. One of our officers had told him that if he should print in the North under his own signature a statement of what he had himself seen and heard, it would receive absolutely no credence beyond the immediate circle of his friends. This he thought was discreditable to our intelligence and fairness. I might have answered that we had been told so often and so emphatically of the undying resolve of the South to resist for ever, that it was hard to believe that in so short a space of time such a change of sentiment could have taken place. My own belief is, that as the people of South Carolina went into this rebellion more earnestly and honestly than those of any other State, so now that they are convinced of their failure they adapt themselves to their new circumstances more honestly and promptly than any others. It is not fair to call them secession ists now, for they have frankly given up secession. They certainly are not loyal, in our sense. I think they have passed through the stage of submission, and their present temper may be called acquiescence, not yet satisfaction—unless, indeed, as there are some indications, a reaction has taken place since I left, caused by the premature establishment of civil government, unsettling their minds, and interrupting a healthy progress of opinion.

I was much interested in the view which Mr. O. gave me of the democratic revolution worked by the war in the industry of the State. The cotton crop, he said—and this was the concurrent testimony, he assured me, of gentlemen who knew the facts—had always been chiefly raised by the small planters and farmers. The large plantations, of a thousand bales, had very little to do with making up the total, which consisted mainly of the two and three bales each of the small farmers. And now, since the planting of cotton, except for home use, had been prohibited, these small farmers had found themselves living so comfortably and independently in this [Northern] style, that they were not likely to return to their old habits. At the same time, the breaking up of slave labor threw into the market a large number of laborers, whose habits had become unsettled, and who now would work for wages for the small farmers who had never owned slaves—being, as it were, members of their families, like hired laborers at the North, and sitting at the same table with their employers. It occurred to me that this would tend to destroy the hostility which undoubtedly exists between the "poor whites" and the blacks; and the result will be without doubt to elevate the poorer classes of farmers, by giving them a supply of cheap labor, while, at the same time, as I said in my last letter, the aristocracy is utterly ruined. It seems to me, too, if it is a fact that the cotton crop is chiefly made up from these seemingly insignificant contributions, that the supply on hand is likely to be larger than is usually estimated. I heard nobody in South Carolina put it higher than a million and a half of bales.

While upon the subject of free labor, I asked what was the disposition of the planters towards the freedmen, and whether they would receive just and fair treatment from them as a whole. Mr. O.'s answer was that he believed the prevailing disposition was to treat them well and fairly, and that certainly it was for their own interest to do so. He thought, indeed, that the danger was the other way—there was so great an apprehension felt of disturbances among them, and so great anxiety to avoid any pretext for complaint, that he thought they were likely to go further than was advisable in the direction of conciliating them and keeping them quiet. I urged the danger there was of class legislation, all the political power being in the hands of one class—that even with the best of intentions one class could not legislate well for another—they must be influenced unconsciously by their prejudices and interests; and asked whether it would be safe, in view of this danger, to reconstruct the State at once. He resented a little the suggestion of safety—self-government was a right, and "you in Massachusetts—supposing the case reversed, and the State held in subjection by South Carolina—would not exactly like to be asked whether it was safe to let you manage your own affairs." At the same time, he admitted the possibility of the danger, and could only say that he believed there was every desire to do right, and that there was no more risk than there always must be in political affairs. He would not demand an immediate restoration of civil government—there was no hurry about that—and he would not say that Congress might not impose certain conditions or restrictions upon State legislation (he did not commit himself, however, upon the right of Congress to do this), all he insisted upon was that South Carolina should not be governed from outside [by Massachusetts, he meant], but should have full powers of self-government at no very distant day. So that he came at last upon precisely the same ground with myself—delay, conditions of reconstruction, and then complete State rights in the true sense of that term.

The fact is, they feel and say that Massachusetts ideas have conquered South Carolina ideas; and while they admit that this is the case, and that they themselves must re-establish their State with the aid of Massachusetts ideas, they cannot bear the idea of having this done by Massachusetts—they can do it themselves, and will do it. I think this sensitiveness, which I found quite general among the older people, is at the bottom of some of what passes as a rebellious spirit (I am far from implying that it is so with most instances of this), and I am very sure that I could say nothing against it, but to protest that all the nation required was that the men whom we had set free should be bona fide protected in their freedom—we owed it to them that the freedom we had given them should not be worse for them than their former slavery. It may be at the bottom too of the disinclination to sell land which is observed—they are inclined to look upon new comers as interlopers. This very natural feeling, with which I could not help sympathizing in some degree, will be the most difficult thing to deal with—for instance, in the work of establishing schools through the South. If it is delicately and judiciously managed, there need be, I am convinced, no difficulty in getting the best among the planters and other citizens to take an interest in colored schools, and even to co-operate actively in their support.

The conversation did not turn upon negro suffrage, but I talked upon that subject with several other gentlemen, whom I found of all grades of opinion, from the one who said that the negroes would "never vote in South Carolina—never!" to the three Charlestonians who agreed with me that the races should have equal rights, and that the suffrage should be upon the basis of intelligence. This was likewise the ground taken by all the colored people that I talked with.

Mr. O. confirmed the common statement as to the small amount of corn raised this year. His usual crop was 1,300 acres—this year he has only 700. By "usual crop" I understood him to refer only to the time since the planting of cotton on a large scale was forbidden. Before that time the planters had bought most of their provisions, I believe. He thought that the negroes would really get less for their labor under the contract—in his case, half the crop, from which their expenses while the crop is making are to be deducted—than they did before; for before they got the whole of the crop. I heard this same view expressed also by other planters, and regret that I did not find out more exactly what they meant. Of course, it could not be true, as a rule, that the proceeds of the plantation were always all expended in feeding and clothing the negroes, although I rather think it is a fact that planters generally made little by their crop but their own support (in extravagant style) and that of the plantation, most of their profit being from the increase of their slaves. Probably what these gentlemen meant was, that during the war they have grown nothing but provisions, and of these only enough for their own use; so that now the negroes are to have only a half, where last year they consumed practically the whole of the crop; and that with crops averaging only half of last year's! No wonder, if this is so, that they are dreading famine. One thing, however, is certain: they must have raised enough during the war to have to spare for the army, a burden they will be free from this year.

This rate of contract—half the crop, with the expenses deducted—is the honest one; indeed, it is almost universal in some districts. About Orangeburg and Columbia, however, the contracts vary according to the caprice of the individual, the officers in charge of the business taking care that there is no injustice done to either party. They told me that it was impossible to lay down any rigid rule—that what would be a fair rate on one plantation would not be on another. In this district many of the planters agree to furnish food and clothing and not a fraction of the crop besides. The question then is, supposing half the crops (with these expenses deducted) is a fair share, what will be the just rate when these are thrown in? It is obvious that the larger the proportion of working hands among the negroes, the larger their fair share of the crop. It is also obvious that where there is a very small crop planted, the half-crop of the negroes may be entirely used up in advance in supporting them. I do not doubt that in some cases where they are to receive half the crop this will actually be the case, and that they will end the year nominally in debt to their employers. A recent order of Gen. Hatch forbids contracts which require such debts to be worked out afterwards. No contracts are approved at Orangeburg which give the freedmen less than one-tenth of the crop besides their expenses. This seems small, but it will be seen from what I have said that it guarantees, at any rate, that the freed people shall not end the year empty-handed, and I was assured that the circumstances in each case were carefully examined.

I copied the terms of one contract, which may be of interest. There were six working hands and eight children. They were to be supported to the end of the year, being provided with one suit of clothes. At the end of the year, each working hand was to receive nine bushels of corn, one bushel of rice out of every fifty raised, and half the potatoes remaining on hand. They were to have every other Saturday to themselves, and their crops were to be cultivated with the proprietor's. This last item refers to the lots of land which were allowed to each hand to cultivate for himself—or rather, as appears by this, to be planted according to his fancy, but worked at the expense of the employer. This is a provision which, I was told, came into a good many of the contracts, the terms of which might otherwise appear disadvantageous to the laborer. MARCEL.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

VI.

LYNCHBURG, Va., August 12, 1865.

DURING the past week I have been making short journeys into the country round about Lynchburg, travelling by the canal or on horseback, and visiting parts of the counties of Appomattox, Campbell, Amherst, Bedford, and Rockbridge.

Everywhere the country presents the same general aspect, except that as the traveller goes westward and enters the limestone region, the streams no longer look as if they ran with puddle-water, and the eye is not wearied by the hot, bricklike consistency and color of the red clay soil as it glares and cracks in the sun. But everywhere are steep hills bright green with grass, or darker with a heavy growth of walnut and chestnut trees laden with their fruit, pines, gum trees, and black, red, and white oaks; little brooks fall in successive cascades down ledges of rock, or trickle over the face of cliffs that overhang the road and shade it; and almost always blue mountains are to be seen upon the verge of the horizon. Almost always, too, the roads are rough and lonely, so that, travelling slowly along, one has time and opportunity to enjoy the great beauty of the scenery. Occasionally a negro man or woman is met, perhaps leading a child and carrying a bundle of clothes, perhaps driving home a long string of cows from pasture, who makes a low bow or curtsey and trudges on, turning often to stare at the stranger; or a white man, mounted on a mule or horse, rides slowly along, invariably giving a salutation as he passes, wishing a "Good morning" if the time is earlier than one o'clock in the day, and, if it is later, always saying "Good evening, sir." At every house there is a field of corn, which seems to grow with an almost rank luxuriance of leaf and stalk, though I noticed that seldom any single plant bore more than one ear. Fields of wheat and oat stubble were of rare occurrence, and I saw none at all of any great extent. Of these two crops the former, I am informed, is very light in all this section. I was told of one farmer whose ill fortune had been remarkable. He had sown forty bushels of seed, and from it all got but eleven bushels of wheat, and these in the aggregate weighed only one hundred and twenty-six pounds. As to the character of his husbandry I made no enquiries.

Where I have been, houses of the better sort are few, or, at least, few are visible from the road as one rides along. Some, however, I saw, standing among trees, and well built of wood or of brick—roomy and pleasant mansions, that looked as if they might be the residences of people at once farmers and educated gentlemen, and the abodes of a hospitality of which we may read in Virginian histories. Not far from such houses were usually the cabins of the negro laborers, huts, framed and boarded in some instances, in some instances built of unhewn logs. Similar to these are the greater number of the detached houses occupied by the white population of the country through which I have been travelling. Very simple architectural rules govern the construction of these dwellings, and a description of one is a description of all. They are about fourteen feet in length and from ten to twelve feet in width. The height from the ridge-pole to the ground does not exceed fourteen feet. The chimney, which is always at one of the gable ends of the building, and on the outside of it, sometimes just peers above the roof and sometimes stops short a yard or so below it, and vents its smoke against the wall. The dwelling has two windows, unglazed, but furnished with a shutter, which is closed when the rain comes in or when the wind is in such a quarter that there is difficulty in persuading the smoke to go up the chimney if there is any interference with the draft from the door. The floor may be of earth trodden hard, or, as is more common, of boards; and there are also boards laid upon the cross beams which, terminating just beneath the eaves, separate the lower room from the space immediately under the rafters. These boards form the floor of a loft, which contains the beds of the children, and which also serves as the granary and general store-room of the family. Most likely the apartment on the ground floor is unequally divided by a rough partition wall of home-made clapboards, and thus another private sleeping place is obtained; opposite the bedroom-door is the fireplace, six feet high and four feet wide, an oblong hole of these dimensions having been cut in the logs that form the end wall. Outside the house two upright posts, one opposite each side of the above-mentioned aperture, and about four feet distant from it, are planted in the ground. Then "puncheons," pieces of wood roughly resembling laths, and used for the same purpose, are so arranged as to form the three sides of the fire-place, shorter puncheons, laid as children lay sticks in making cob-houses, are piled one on another till the frame-work of the chimney, growing narrower as it ascends, is properly made. Over all is spread a thick coat of mud, which commonly is well enough prepared, or often enough renewed, to protect the sides and back of the fire-place from the action of the fire, but higher up the bare puncheons are charred and in places burnt into holes where the sparks have at some time kindled the dry wood. Within and without, the house, unwhitened by paint or whitewash, bears traces of continual smoke and the blackening power of time and weather. The furniture is of course scanty and of the poorest kind. The objects that most strike the attention on entering are the large fire-place with its cooking utensils, and the range of pipkins and tubs, with the drinking gourds, containing water; for few of these houses are provided with a well, and the water is brought from the nearest spring at set times of the day, the vessels being usually carried on the heads of the children. A fence of palings, or of pickets interwoven with brushwood, encloses a small patch of garden ground, planted with cabbages, string-beans, and tomatoes. Just at the door-step, where the soil is likely to be richest, a dozen of tobacco plants, raised for home consumption, grow strong and tall, and near by is a bush or two of red peppers, much used by these people in medicine and in cookery. Probably a small fowl-hutch stands at the corner of the garden, two or three pigs lie at length by the road-side, and there is never wanting a noisy cur to bark at the passer-by. Sometimes it is a group of white children, sometimes of little negroes, that gaze at me from the doorway. Always there is corn growing beside such cabins, and beside one I saw the only cotton that I have yet observed in Virginia. There was, perhaps, half or three-eighths of an acre of it, and the plants were in full blossom. The field seemed clear of grass and weeds, but the cotton was not two feet high, and must, I should think, have been unmanured. The people who inhabit these houses must be the poorest of those who draw rations from the Government stores, and so far as my observation has extended, the military order which remands them to their own resources for a livelihood is perfectly justifiable, as relieving the Government of an unnecessary burden, and discouraging indolence.

Nearly as often seen as houses of this kind are the dwellings of the ordinary class of farmers, who cultivate from one to three hundred acres of land. They are usually of wood, painted white, and surrounded by a post and rail fence, inside of which are plum and peach trees, and, very likely, one or two forest trees for shade. A little in the rear, in a condition more or less dilapidated, stands a row of three or four negro cabins. The farm-houses seem to contain three rooms or four, uncarpeted and otherwise poorly furnished; but in external appearance the house itself, the farm outbuildings, and the fences are a good deal superior to those which have just been described, and offer many indications of the greater means, if not of the greater thrift, of the owner. The inmates differ less than their habitations, being alike in manners and speech, and generally giving one the impression that, without having much knowledge or having been greatly indebted to education, they are intelligent and tolerably civil and good-natured. There is an occasional exception. Fatigued with riding the other day, and the weather being very hot, I came to one of these houses, which stood invitingly in a cool and shady yard. Dismounting, I walked in. A lean and dirty-looking woman of some forty years of age sat, without occupation, beside the door, and of her I begged a drink of water.

"Thar's the well."

I drew some water, and drank from the little tin pail which served for a bucket. The not very gracious reception I had met with made me think it not best to try to get a dinner from the woman, and I asked if there was any house near, where travellers were taken in.

"Go on down to the station. Heap o' people lives thar."

"Is there any place there where I can get a dinner and have my horse fed?"

"Reckon ye kin. Kin try it. Heap o' people lives thar, anyhow."

"Is there a hotel or anything of that kind?"

"They used to keep a kind o' tavern thar. Don't know what they do now. Country yerabouts is mighty bar."

"I suppose you could n't get me a dinner, ma'am?"

"Hed our dinner at half-past eleven."

"How far is it to the station?"

"Mile, maybe; maybe mo'."

So I rode on, and soon crossing a railroad track came to a "kind o' tavern." It was a farm-house, not dissimilar to the one I had just left. The landlady, with a sun-bonnet perched on the back of her head, met me in the yard with a look of close scrutiny, and informed me that my horse could have some chopped oats, and that for me there was some lamb, she reckoned. I followed her into the house. There was a hall with a door at each end. Sitting in the draft, and in the full blaze of the afternoon sun, was a man in his shirt-sleeves and with an empty pipe in his mouth. Beside his feet lay an old hat, which he seemed to have been using as a spittoon. Without looking up, he said something as I entered, and I stopped to hear his remark.

"Never heed," said the woman; "old man 's been drinkin' apple brandy. Walk into the parlor." Dinner was made ready, and I ate it to the accompaniment of a song which was unintelligibly droned out by the old gentleman in the hall. The flies bothered him a good deal, and the song was interrupted by growling at them. By the time dinner was over, he was thoroughly awake and quite attentive to his guests.

A negro man-servant waited at the table, over which presided the landlady, with a palmetto fan in her hand. From a silver-plated pitcher, bearing an inscription to the effect that at an agricultural fair it had been awarded to the landlord as a prize, she offered me cider, made the day before. It had been pressed from apples laid in a trough and beaten with a pestle. A good part of their cider, she said, was made by that process. Sitting in the parlor after dinner, a pale young man, limping as he walked, came into the room and accosted me. He wore the gray uniform jacket and trousers which, especially in the country, are so very common as to seem almost the universal male dress. He apologized for addressing a stranger, but wished to know, he said, if I were not a relation of General Wise of Norfolk, as I bore a marked resemblance to that gentleman. I informed him that I had never been in Virginia until the middle of this year; that I was from the North. Having thus begun to talk, we conversed for some time about the war, the soldiers of the two sections, the state of the country at present, and its future prospects.

Yes, that was a quiet place, he said, a mighty quiet little place, but it was none too quiet for him. He never wanted to hear another gun fired in war as long as he lived. There was no more fight left in him. Ever since the 6th day of April, 1861, he had been in the army, knocking round in camps, or marching or fighting, and he had no desire to shoot at anybody or to be shot at by anybody any more. He was eager to go in when he first went, but if they had another war they 'd have to burn the woods and sift the ashes before they 'd find him in it. His sympathies were with the Southern cause, and always would be, but there would n't be another war in behalf of it. The South was sick of fighting, and the North was too strong. How was it down there at Appomattox Court-House? When Lee started from Petersburg he had only a handful of men; nearly all he had he lost on the way up by desertion and death in battle; and on the Sunday when he surrendered, Grant's army was one hundred and fifty thousand strong. Yes, he was willing to acknowledge himself beaten for good and all.

Did he think a foreign war would unite the North and South? No, nor anything else. Three-fourths of the Confederate soldiers would be more inclined to join Maximilian, if Andy Johnson should make war on him, than to fight for the United States. But he hoped and thought there would be no more war. He wanted to go to Brazil himself, if he could. That was the place for Southerners, and the emperor wanted them there, too. But a man needed capital, and what was he to do who had n't had more than six dollars since he got out of a Federal prison, over two months ago? That was his case. He had been captured before Petersburg, badly wounded, and had been in hospital or in jail ever since last January. He had a little money when he went in, but since he came out six dollars was all he 'd seen, and that he got by borrowing it. He had been for a good while in prison when the news came of Lee's surrender. He did not give up then. When the news of Johnston's surrender came, he concluded the Confederacy was done. His father, who owned some property in Norfolk, came down to get it back again if he could, and he succeeded in getting released at about that time. But his father had failed to get his estate restored to him and had left the city, so that when he reached it he found himself without money. He lived awhile with some relations, all as poor as himself, and at last went up to see an uncle, who was a wealthy man and owned a fine place near the Potomac. After a short stay at his house, he asked for the loan of enough money to carry him home. His uncle told him he had none, but he would endeavor to get him a little. So he made his niggers kill some sheep and carry the mutton down to the crews of a couple of Yankee schooners lying in the river. When the meat was sold, his uncle gave him six dollars. Since then, being sick, he had been staying round among his relations, and if he were well, he did n't know what he should be able to do. Could get corn-bread enough, he supposed, to keep the life in him for some years to come, but that did n't seem much of a show for a man, and the worst of it was that all the people were in about that same state, and there did n't seem to be much chance that their condition would improve for the next ten or twenty years.

I said that I supposed things were bad enough in the Southern country, but that it seemed to me not impossible that farmers and planters in Virginia and in most parts of the South might get a better living, if they hired their laborers as Northern farmers did, than they formerly got by working slaves.

"Yes, sir," he replied, "of course you think so. Every man from your section says the same thing. You do n't know the niggers. No nigger, free or slave, in these Southern States, nor in any part of the known world, ever would work or ever will work unless he 's made to. Have you ever been in Norfolk?"

"Yes, I was there for a day or two; in the city merely."

"Well, when you are there again, just go out ten miles on any road leading from the city. All along by the roadside you 'll see that the niggers have built little shanties of old boards and so on, and they 've got a little corn growing beside them, and you won't find one in ten of the patches that has n't got more grass in it than corn. They would n't hoe it. There 's the grass higher than the corn, and there are the niggers sitting in the shade. Now, do you think those Norfolk niggers won't starve by the thousand this winter? Wait and see. They 're sure to starve if they are left to their own means of support."

"But are n't they like other people? Won't the experience of starvation be enough to make them work?"

"They may scratch a living one way and another—those of them that are left after these two winters are over; but starvation is n't going to make them good steady laborers. Our free niggers used to starve enough. Steady labor is what we want; and it 's what we 're not going to get from them."

"Do you have a good deal of trouble with them here?"

"I do n't really know much about this vicinity. I believe they are doing very well. They have n't been free long enough here, and have n't had time to get saucy. Down in Norfolk, where they 've been free this two years, it 's a different thing. Besides, the niggers in this State have n't had enough to do this year. There has n't been work enough done to test them. It is next year and the next after that will tell the story. There 's no work in a nigger, and so you would say if you knew them as well as I do."

"Do you think that giving them a vote would tend to make them better laborers and better members of society? There 's some talk of that at the North."

"Give them a vote! I would rather die, sir, than see a nigger voting in old Virginia. I would rather die," repeated the young man with emphasis, "and so every citizen of this State will say."

"Why," said I, "free negroes once had a vote in nearly, if not quite, every Southern State, so it would not be without precedent if the right of suffrage were now given to free negroes. And for the rest, would it be safe to trust white men at the South with the power to repudiate the national debt? I believe many Northern men fear that might happen."

"Repudiate? I should hope they would. I 'm whipped, and I 'll own it; but I 'm not so fond of a whipping that I 'm going to pay a man 's expenses while he gives it to me. Of course, there are not ten men in the whole South that would n't repudiate."

The young man had evidently become somewhat heated during the latter part of our talk, and said things which, I dare say, he did not wholly believe, and would not have said at the beginning of it.

Leaving the tavern, after paying "a dollar and a quarter in greenbacks" for the entertainment, I rode on over a hilly road, and just at evening came to the famous little hamlet of Appomattox Court-House, where I rested during the night, neither the one sheet, which was all that the bed boasted, nor the vermin, nor the heat, preventing my sleeping soundly.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, August 2, 1865.

THERE being at this moment an absolute dearth of news, I shall take the opportunity of writing to you on a subject important not only in itself, but as an illustration of our national character, and that is the feeling of England towards America since the conclusion of the war. For the moment, then, if you will allow me to speak frankly, the public interest in your affairs, whether friendly or hostile, has to a great extent died away. Our fits of excitement with regard to foreign countries are always short-lived. Anybody acquainted with England can always predict beforehand the rise, decline, and fall of our accesses of foreign enthusiams. Whether the object of our sympathy is Italy, or Denmark, or Poland, the course is just the same. Suddenly the condition of the "most favored" country is the one topic which fills our newspapers; its representatives are the lions of the day; bazaars are held and subscriptions raised to promote its cause; pamphlets by the hundred are written in its behalf; and then of a sudden the interest dies away. We do not change our opinions, but still sympathize in the abstract with the "oppressed nationality," be it what it may; but we are tired of the subject, and pass on to something else. This fickleness is of course resented by the deposed favorite, but, I think, unjustly. With an empire so vast as ours, it is impossible we should devote any lengthened attention, as a nation, to the affairs of other countries. Our sympathy is genuine enough while it lasts; it is not our fault if it is of its nature short-lived. Now the Southern Confederacy had its day of popular English favor. To do ourselves justice, the South never occupied the same high rank in our affections as Hungary, or Italy, or Poland had done in previous years. If I may use a theatrical metaphor, the spectacle of Southern independence filled the stalls and dress circle, but never "drew" the pit or gallery. The old national dislike to the name of slavery always hindered the cause of the South from being popular with the masses. Yet for a time the Confederacy had what the French call a "succès d'estime." It was clear to observers that the interest in the South was dying out, long before the war ended; and had it been far stronger than it ever was, it could not have survived the downfall of the Confederacy. If ever there was a nation which had the faculty of forgetting what it does not like to remember, it is our own. Our pro-Southern sympathizers are, to speak the plain truth, annoyed with their clients. They were so confident that the Confederacy could never be subdued, that the Southerners would fight to the last man, and that no proposal for reunion would ever be listened to by the seceded States, that the complete and sudden collapse of the Confederacy was felt, by the English admirers of the South, to be a sort of personal injury. Confederate stock in consequence has fallen as low in the social as it has in the commercial market. The interest has died out; and the few advocates of the South who still, like the Standard, remain faithful to a fallen cause, find that they preach to deaf ears.

Thus the Confederate cause has become unpopular; but it does not follow that the Federal cause has become a popular one. No doubt English feeling has changed very much within the last few months. The assassination of President Lincoln not only excited an extraordinary sensation, but it gave a death-blow to the repute for chivalrous gallantry which strangely enough had been believed to cling to the South. Then, too, the generous use you have made hitherto of your victory has produced a marked effect. The rough good sense of the nation has shown it that—no matter what its leaders in the press may declare—a people which has shown itself so merciful in the hour of triumph is not likely to have been especially vindictive in the heat of battle. And, finally, the fact of your success is patent and undeniable. Cynics would say that this last fact is the sole cause of our change of feeling; but cynicism is very rarely the expression of the truth; and it is only partially so in the present instance. With regard to either England or America, it matters, I think, singularly little what is the sentimental view which each takes of the other. The great political and commercial interests which unite our two countries are quite sufficient to ensure permanent good-will, apart from any personal likes or dislikes. We have both got work enough to do at home; and I believe our relations would be far more cordial if we both cared less about the comments that each of us makes on the other's conduct. On this account, I think it is a decided advantage that the English excitement about America, either pro-Northern or pro-Southern, is passing away. While the war lasted I was most anxious that my countrymen should entertain juster and kinder views of the North, because the prejudice against the Federal cause created for the time a risk of intervention; but that danger is happily avoided; and I think, henceforth, facts will plead your case better than any arguments. If our newspapers have now only a stray article here and there about the United States, and if the telegrams from America are no longer looked for with intense interest, the course of affairs across the Atlantic will not, I suspect, be materially modified.

The chief interest, I own, which the immediate progress of your work of reconstruction possesses for us now is the effect it is likely to produce on the cause of popular government. You have done so much to vindicate the character of democracy that its friends in the Old World are perhaps unreasonably anxious lest you should do anything to throw any discredit whatever on its success. On this account, you will perhaps pardon me if I try to explain the reasons why men like myself, who have sympathized as Englishmen with your struggle for freedom and nationality, and who cannot be justly accused of any love for the Confederate cause, are yet opposed to the penalty of death being inflicted on the leaders of the secession movement. For Mr. Davis himself I think I have as little respect or sympathy as for any man alive. Contrary to the received opinion in England, I never could see the evidence of his possessing any extraordinary ability. Still less, as far as I could discover, was there about him any trace of that heroism which often redeems the championship of an evil cause. Moreover, I must fairly own that my sense of poetical justice would be satisfied by his execution. Any man who, right or wrong, chooses to upset a settled government and inaugurate a revolution, ought to risk his life as the price of failure. John Brown, I conceive, had no cause to complain about his execution, however noble may have been the object for which he suffered death; and if Kossuth had been hung by the Austrians in Hungary, and Garibaldi by the Neapolitans in Sicily, I, for one, should never have said that personally they had been hardly dealt by. If you choose to gamble and lose, you should be prepared to pay; and if Mr. Davis should suffer death on the gallows, he will only undergo the same penalty that many better men have suffered for a like offence. Moreover, I admit freely that you have ample precedent for executing captured rebels, and that Englishmen, of all people in the world, have the least right to blame you for exercising your privilege. Two historical anecdotes I can mention, amongst hundreds of others, show clearly enough how little right we have to lay down the law with reference to the treatment of defeated insurgents. In the last volume of the Wellington dispatches, there will be found a letter from Lord Liverpool to Earl Castlereagh in Paris, written at the time Napoleon was making his way to the coast after the battle of Waterloo. In that letter the British minister remarks that, if the emperor should fall into our hands, his disposal would be a source of extreme embarrassment to his majesty's Government, and therefore Lord Castlereagh is advised to urge upon the royal Government of France the expediency of catching Napoleon before he could make good his escape, and hanging him as a traitor. The other story does not rest on documentary evidence, but I have heard it on good authority. At the period when the American War of Independence was at the lowest of its fortunes, General Clinton wrote home stating that it was very probable the insurgent army might surrender at discretion, and, in that case, he should like to know what he should do with Washington. The answer forwarded was that the general should be tried by a drum-head court-martial, and shot as a deserter. Now, quite apart from any political prejudice, every Englishman must feel thankful that these two propositions were never carried out, and that his country was saved the lasting disgrace which the execution of Napoleon or Washington would have conferred upon her. Yet I have known people of a past generation who believed to the last that the first Napoleon was a monster of iniquity such as the world ought not to have allowed to breathe; and—strange as the fact may seem to you—English contemporary literature of the end of the last century proves conclusively that honest, though mistaken, persons held Washington to have been guilty of heinous offences. The execution of Major André and of the Duc d'Enghien were thought, by the hasty judgment of Englishmen, to be crimes which placed their authors beyond the pale of civilization. Posterity has not confirmed the justice of this verdict; and I am not altogether sure, or rather, I would say, you cannot be altogether sure, that the estimate the next generation places on the character of Jefferson Davis will be quite the same as you place upon it now. The instinct of mankind makes a difference between wholesale and retail crimes. It is all very well for your poet, Mr. Lowell, to have said—but practically the author of the "Biglow Papers," even at the height of his antagonism to the Mexican War, would, I am sure, have acknowledged that a soldier and a murderer were not liable to the same penalties. I am not disputing for one moment the truth of the accusations of cruelty and barbarity I see attributed in your papers to the Ex-President of the Confederacy. Whether they are true or not, is a fact of which you are the best judges. All I say is, that any amount of crime committed by a man in his public character is somehow or other not the same thing as a crime perpetrated in his private character for personal ends, and therefore I am unwilling that a people whose conduct of the war will be recognized by history as characterized by an unexampled humanity, should commit what I hold to be the error of confusing public with private guilt. I should like the record of a war for freedom carried on by a free people to be stainless to the end. Moreover, I do not wish Mr. Davis or any of the leaders of secession to have the sort of hybrid glory which is conferred on all who suffer death for a political cause, be that cause good or evil. There never was a more brutal, cowardly, and monstrous crime than the attempt of Orsini to assassinate the Emperor Napoleon, by the explosion of an infernal machine. Never was a man executed more justly, and yet it would have been better had this crack-brained assassin been allowed to live. The mere fact of his death has invested him in popular imagination with something of the attributes of a hero; and I believe the "Red" faction in France would have been more powerless than it is if Orsini had never died. The time is not, I think, far distant when the world will acknowledge the fact that the punishment of death is a relic of barbarism; and I wish to see the United States take the lead in what may be called, without any cant in this instance, the path of progress. Perhaps you may think that I am wandering from my duties as a correspondent in thus discussing a matter which in its immediate issue concerns America alone. But the subject of the fate of the Southern leaders is one which still commands great attention in England. I can understand and sympathize with the indignation you must feel at the foolish diatribes of the pro-Southern journals in this country, that have the audacity to talk as if the execution of Jefferson Davis would be a crime unparallelled in history; and therefore I think you may like to know the grounds on which well-wishers to the Union hope that the life of the men who betrayed the republic may still be spared.

"Ez fer war, I call it murder;"

About the only news of the week is that Dr. Colenso is going back to Natal. Amidst the excitement of a civil war you have probably taken no particular note of the great religious war which has raged here for the last three years, as to whether the Bishop of Natal has or has not been guilty of heresy in his views concerning the inspired character of the Pentateuch. Nobody can have a greater antipathy to ecclesiastical controversies than I have myself: I have ever entertained a sneaking sympathy for the Indian editor who at the time of the great baptismal regeneration dispute between the Bishop of Exeter and Dr. Gorham, headed his summary of European news: "The Gorham case again: d—— the Gorham case." I am not going therefore to enter on the question whether Dr. Colenso did or did not prove that the children of Israel could not have eaten the number of pigeons they are supposed to have done according to Holy Writ. His book is a very dull one, and would have excited no attention if it had not been written by a bishop. However, the Orthodox party in the country, whether High Church or Low Church, resented most bitterly this heresy on the part of an ordained bishop, and every means has been resorted to to oust him from his diocese. However, every court of law which could be appealed to decided that there was nothing in the views put forward by the bishop inconsistent with his remaining in his see of Natal; and then his opponents, being driven to extremities, resorted to a piece of rather sharp practice in order to punish him for his want of orthodoxy. The salary of our colonial bishops is made up partly by a grant from Government, and partly by a subsidy from certain religious societies, who attach enormous importance to the introduction of Episcopacy into our colonies. In consideration of this subsidy, these societies are allowed to recommend the candidates for any vacant bishopric. Dr. Colenso was so appointed, being at the time of his nomination the most orthodox of clergymen. Unfortunately, when he became prone to heretical proclivities, the societies in question resolved to stop his pay, without which he could not manage to discharge the duties of his see; and when he protested, they told him that he might go to law for his remedy—a recommendation which they knew to be futile, as the societies, being supported by voluntary subscriptions, cannot easily be sued. In order to counteract this move, a number of the bishop's friends have subscribed some £3,000, or six years' allowance, to enable him to return to Natal. He is now on the eve of sailing—a fact at which the indifferent public will rejoice, as we had got dreadfully weary of the Colenso controversy.

Another old bone of controversy, though not of a religious character, seems likely at last to be removed from public discussion. After twelve years of quarrelling and bickering, the "Guild of Literature," which was to have re-organized the whole condition of the world of letters, has become a reality. It is true that the scheme has dwindled down into the erection of three almshouses for decayed artists or writers, for which occupants happily cannot yet be found. However, the almshouses are there, and their opening was inaugurated on Saturday last by a fête at Sir Bulwer Lytton's, who was the chief promoter of the scheme, and whose play of "Not so bad as we Seem" raised the largest share of the funds for its realization. Charles Dickens was there, and made a happy speech, as usual; but with this exception there was not a single first-rate or even second-rate representative of English letters or art. Why it should be so, I cannot discuss now; but the fact is that every attempt to get English literary men to work together has always proved a failure; and with us a fund is always synonymous with a job of some kind or other.

Considerable dissatisfaction is expressed at the way in which Mr. Peabody's munificent donation to the poor of London is to be disposed of. The trustees have built a number of model lodging-houses, which are to be let to working-men earning not less than a pound a week and of good character. Now the class so designated is a very deserving one, and one, as a rule, very badly housed; but still it is not a class that can be considered as representing the poor of London. It is for this class, for the class which infests our streets, and which, happily for you, you have not in America, that the Peabody gift was, I believe, designed.

POISONING AS A SCIENCE.

To an intelligent person deliberately contemplating the perpetration of murder, the inducements to make use of poisons are certainly very great. The secrecy with which the processes can be carried on, the fact that violence and bloodshed are avoided, the safety to the perpetrator which the passive condition of the unsuspecting victim guarantees, the similarity which exists between the symptoms produced and those of many well known diseases, and the difficulties of detecting the poisonous substances in the body of the deceased, are considerations which the educated murderer cannot contemplate with indifference. It may safely be asserted that so great are the advantages which poisons offer over other murderous agents, that but for the great advance which has taken place in late years in the sciences of physiology and chemistry, the career of the poisoner of the present day would be as triumphant and as safe as that of either Toffana or the Marchioness de Brinvilliers, who numbered their victims by hundreds, and whose iniquities were not arrested till the perpetrators had become over-bold by long continued and unvarying success.

We all know what a poison is, and yet if we attempt to define the word, we find we have undertaken a very difficult task. The dictionaries say that any substance, animal, vegetable, or mineral, which, if taken into the stomach, introduced into the blood, or applied to the skin, produces derangement of the system or death, is a poison. A little reflection is sufficient to convince us of the error of this definition. If it be correct, the indiscreet youth who dies from a surfeit of green pears, or the miserable wretch who is bastinadoed to death by a Turkish executioner, are poisoned. Water is not a poison, and yet many persons have died from drinking too much of it, and even from small quantities imbibed at improper times. But for all practical purposes, it is immaterial whether or not we can accurately define the word poison. We are able to classify the agents to which poisonous properties are ascribed into three groups, and though the arrangement may possess objectionable features in the eyes of the systematic toxicologist, it is sufficiently precise for all the useful ends of the jurist or the physician.

Looking at the matter therefore from a purely practical point of view, we make three grand classes of poisons:

1st, Those which act locally, producing inflammation and disorganization of the parts of the body to which they are applied;

2d, Those which cause excitement or depression of the brain or nervous system, and which must therefore be absorbed into the blood; and

3d, Those which act both locally and generally. Under the first category are included the corrosive acids, alkalies, and mineral substances generally. Under the second, opium, henbane, hemlock, stramonium, nux vomica, and other vegetable substances, with their active principles, morphia, strychnia, etc., hydrocyanic or prussic acid and its compounds, together with several substances of animal origin. Under the third, tobacco, belladonna, poisonous mushrooms, aconite, etc.

Now it is of great importance to the poisoner that he should possess tolerably correct ideas relative to the properties and effects of the substance he contemplates using: one of well-defined taste, or of striking color, or which when administered produces strongly marked symptoms, or which admits of easy recognition after death, is a dangerous agent for him as well as for the object of his machinations. A poison therefore like sulphuric acid, with its highly sour taste and its intensely corrosive action on the mouth, throat, and stomach, causing immediately the most agonizing pain, would not be thought of by any but the most ignorant bungler. And so of arsenic, which, though tasteless, produces violent pain and vomiting, and which can be detected in the blood or tissues of the body, when present, in wondrously small quantities, and after years have elapsed since death. In a case which is on record the body had lain in the grave for over ten years, and had become reduced to a skeleton; the bones were examined chemically, arsenic was discovered, corroborative evidence was adduced, the prisoner confessed, and a verdict of guilty was rendered. Nearly all the substances of the class of irritant poisons give rise to prominent and violent symptoms, and are readily detected by chemical analysis. No refined, educated, and intelligent poisoner who has a due regard for his own welfare, would think of using any of them. They are only fit to be employed by those murderously inclined individuals who, possessed with the idea that they must kill some one, are gracious enough to immolate themselves.

But if we turn our attention to that class of poisons which includes those not possessed of irritant properties, but which, when taken into the stomach, must be digested and absorbed into the blood before they can produce deleterious effects, the case is very different. Chemistry has made such rapid progress in isolating the active principles of poisonous substances, and thus giving us in exceedingly small compass agents of tremendous potency, that it is doubtful whether the advance which has also been made in the direction of tests and antidotes has been sufficient to neutralize the additional power she has conferred on the evil-minded. Thus the one-tenth of a grain of aconitina, the active principle of aconite, is regarded by high authority as a fatal dose for a human being. Such a small quantity could be so administered as to attract no attention. There is no antidote which can be depended upon, and no chemical test which is competent to establish the fact of its presence in the body. Another of these principles—fortunately unknown to commerce, and scarcely even heard of by chemists and physicians—extracted from the arrow poison of a tribe of South American Indians, is so powerful that if the skin of a man be even scratched with a needle dipped in its solution, death would probably result. There is neither an antidote to its effects nor a characteristic test of its presence.

But it is not likely that either aconitina, or corrovalia, or other of the high-priced and rare alkaloids, will be employed by the ordinary poisoner. It is only the adept who will ever have recourse to them. Morphia and strychnia are more readily obtained, and if they are used with discretion, chemistry is not apt to reveal their presence in the corpse. The latter substance especially, from its intensely poisonous power, has been a favorite, and, from the facility with which every villain with a dime in his pocket can purchase enough to kill half a dozen people, has to a great extent taken the place of the less energetic, better known, and more easily detected arsenic, which once occupied the highest position in the estimation of the poisoner.

Still, though chemistry cannot be exclusively relied upon to establish the presence of several of these fearful poisons, there are signs which unerringly reveal their presence. Take, for instance, strychnia—a half a grain is sufficient to cause death, and yet, if no more than this quantity were swallowed, it is exceedingly doubtful if any chemical reagents could detect its presence in the stomach or tissues. Being an organic substance, it is often so acted upon by the digestive and other fluids of the organism that it is not long before it becomes entirely decomposed into its constituent elements, and then its identity is altogether lost. Besides, however valuable the chemical tests for strychnia may be when the pure substance is subjected to their action, it is very different when the poison is mixed with organic matters, such as blood, the contents of the stomach, pulverized liver, kidneys, lungs, etc. The indications of the presence of strychnia which chemistry gives us are based upon certain changes of color which it undergoes when brought in contact with the proper reagents. These are masked or altogether destroyed by the presence of animal matters; and even when Stas' process or some other is made use of to separate the strychnia in a pure form, there are so many difficulties in the way of the due recognition of these chromatic changes that it would be exceedingly unsafe to rely upon them if they were apparently present, or to conclude that strychnia had not been administered if they were not produced. Thus, a case is recorded in which four grains of strychnia were certainly taken, the symptoms came on in an hour, and death took place in ten minutes afterwards, and yet the most careful chemical examination failed to find the poison in the body. In another instance, four grains were taken by mistake, and though death followed with great rapidity, no traces of strychnia were detected in the contents of the stomach. In the case of Cook, poisoned with strychnia by Palmer, no evidence of the presence of this substance was found in any part of the body.

But, as we have said, the poisoner is not to go free because chemistry cannot convict him. We call to our aid the science of physiology, and if strychnia has been taken into the stomach in quantity sufficient to cause death, or even in still smaller amount, we are able to bring forward such evidence of the fact as cannot be questioned. It is the only poison, with one exception—brucia, and this is also extracted from nux vomica—which uniformly produces well-marked tetanus or, as it is called in the vernacular tongue, locked jaw. Arsenic, antimony, and aconite occasionally give rise to tetanic spasms of an irregular character; but such convulsions, as well as the tetanics due to wounds or exposure to cold and wet, are clearly distinguishable by the competent physician from the tetanus due to an over-dose of strychnia. It was by the symptoms manifested in Cook that the medical witnesses were enabled to prove conclusively that strychnia had been the cause of his death.

But this is not all. The frog is one of the most useful animals to man. His posterior extremities and—we tell it as a great secret, known but to few gourmands—his liver make dishes, compared to which nightingales' tongues and peacocks' brains are insipid. He has contributed more to the advancement of physiology than any other creature that inhabits the earth—allowing his abdomen to be ripped open, his brain exposed, and his nerves excised, without uttering a croak or moving a muscle; and, after all these things, he will live on in a state of quiescent beatitude as long as you please, whilst hour by hour the scientific physiologist watches him, and records the observed phenomena. Now we put him to another and still higher use. We bring him into a court of justice, and, before the wondering eyes of judge, jury, and counsel, we prove whether or not a murder has been committed with strychnia; for so sensitive is this gentle reptile to the effects of the poison in question, that a few drops of a fluid containing but a hundred-thousandth of a grain are sufficient to throw him into a state of rigid tetanus. Thus, as some one has remarked, the frog revenges himself on man for the cruelties inflicted on him; and yet not only so, for even in his revenge he is faithful to principles of utilitarianism.

What is true of strychnia is true, more or less, mutatis mutandis, of most of the other organic poisons. And as the science of physiology goes onward to more thorough development, we may expect that the certainty of detection will become so great that even the most skilful and most far-seeing poisoner will have little chance of escaping the punishment which the law awards to him.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF INSTRUCTION.

THE Educational Conference at New Haven last week had some excellent points. It was the thirty-sixth annual meeting of the American Institute of Instruction, an association of teachers, superintendents of public instruction, and friends of popular education, gathered chiefly, but not exclusively, from New England. Dr. Wayland, in 1830, was the first president of the society, and from the beginning onward a long line of wise and honorable men have taken part in the deliberations of the body, so that whatever merit pertains to the public schools of New England is in a considerable degree to be attributed to these annual councils.

At the recent meeting not far from five hundred persons, almost all practically concerned in teaching, were assembled in New Haven. A larger number than usual of college men were present, and were prominent in the lectures or discussions. Washburn, of the Cambridge Law School; Haven, of Michigan University; the veteran Taylor, of Andover ("Uncle Sam," as the boys will call him); Cummings, of Wesleyan University; Day, Woolsey, and Thacher, of Yale; Greene, of Providence; Upson, of Hamilton; and many more such men, gave a tone to the deliberations of the society, while some other men of weight, like Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, Señor Sarmiento, the Argentine plenipotentiary, Bishop Stevens, of Pennsylvania, and Bishop Smith, of Kentucky, emphasized and enforced in public addresses the broad and universal principles of popular instruction.

There is always danger in these educational conventions that much which is dry and empty and worthless will be brought forward by shallow minded men. Husks and shells are prone to be the fare. But this was far from being the case at New Haven. Live men spoke on live topics. Their hearers were not "the miscellaneous public," but a professional audience, and a new impulse, in our opinion, was given to many living and weighty truths.

The present state of the country, North and South, naturally enough, was constantly brought forward. The first lecture of the week, given by Ex-Governor Washburn, of Massachusetts, full of vigor and practical wisdom, urged the immediate necessity of introducing "civil polity" as a branch of instruction in the public schools. We can imagine how such a philosopher and publicist as Dr. Lieber would be astonished at this suggestion, and inclined to protest that it was folly to teach children every new science, and still greater folly to introduce them to the abstract generalizations of the science of law and government. To scholars versed in history and philosophy and law, "civil polity" is one of the most difficult and abstruse themes, involving many undetermined problems. But it appeared from the speaker's introductory remarks that he was not advocating the introduction of impossibilities. He aimed at that only which is practical. He showed how early children form some notions of political affairs, how ready they are to assume the party names and to echo the party watchwords of the day. He claimed that the idea of meum and tuum, and hence of property and rights, was among the first which a child could appreciate. By reference to other sciences, and especially by showing the mode in which simple, practical, religious truths are taught to the youngest minds, he maintained that the well established principles of republican institutions can be taught to all our American youth. Having very clearly brought out the possibility of such instruction, he next exhibited its importance by strong illustrations, drawn especially from the lessons of the last four years. We heartily concur in the views of the learned Governor. If the people of our republic are to remain its rulers, we must by every possible means, the school, the press, the lecture, the book, instruct and enlighten them in the true idea of the rights, and duties, and obligations of a State. The lecture of President Woolsey, and the eloquent address of Governor Andrew, incidentally confirmed the same opinions.

An interesting debate was held at one of the sessions, "High Schools versus Academies" being the theme. The speakers on both sides seemed to be afraid of hurting one another's feelings, and there was consequently less point to the remarks than some of the audience anticipated. Mr. White, Secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Education, who has been the agent of establishing free public high schools all over that commonwealth, explained the true character of such schools, and showed their advantages. But Mr. Hammond, the principal of a long established academy, argued that private corporations well endowed, receiving like lesser colleges pupils from abroad as well as from the neighborhood, are, in some respects, superior to high schools, and can never be dispensed with. He points triumphantly to the endowments at Andover, Exeter, Munson, East Hampton, and elsewhere. This subject is already of pressing importance in Massachusetts, and is likely soon to be so in Connecticut.

The educational wants of the Southern States were prominently brought before the Association. The loyal and patriotic Bishop of Kentucky, the secretaries of two large benevolent societies, the Union Commission and the Freedmen's Society, an accomplished African teacher from the Friends' School in Philadelphia, and others, gave such narratives of fact as were most impressive and startling. Prof. Thacher, of New Haven, then made an eloquent appeal to every patriot man or woman, willing in peace to serve his country, to be in readiness whenever the call came to go to the South and spread the light of education. It may be weeks or months before the door will be opened—but open it will be for intelligent, considerate, and unselfish educators.

A letter was read in connection with this subject from Maj.-Gen. Howard, Chief of the Freedmen's Bureau, written in an excellent spirit, to show what the Government is willing to do for the promotion of education, especially among the freedmen.

These are the more important topics which the Convention took up. [illegible]e whole, the meeting was uncommonly interesting and useful.

GOLDEN-HAIRED GERTRUDE,

THE CHOICEST OF JUVENILE BOOKS.

BY

THEODORE TILTON,

Editor of The Independent.

Illustrated from original drawings by H. L. Stephens. Printed on heavy tinted paper of finest finish. Nearly ready.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 Park Row, N. Y.

PUBLISHED THIS DAY.

ANNIE;

OR,

CONTENTMENT.

By Mrs. MACKENZIE DANIELS,

Author of "Fernley Manor," "Marrying for Money," etc.

"It will undoubtedly claim attention by its clever sketches of character and society."—London New Monthly.

"The style is flowing and unaffected, and the dialogue lively and natural."—London Critic.

"It abounds with much true feeling; in it are easy, chatty vivacity, wit and truthful shrewdness."—London Weekly Times.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

Mailed, free of postage, on receipt of price.

FREDERIC A. BRADY, Publisher,

22 ANN STREET, N. Y.

OUR MARTYR PRESIDENT.

Now Ready, Price $2,

AGENTS WANTED.

STIER'S WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

HEARTHSTONE SERIES.

SCHÖNBERG-COTTA WORKS.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL BOOKS.

A complete library can be made up from our stock, which includes the lists of all the societies of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.

Terms as low as can be had of the publishing houses.

BOOKS FOR SALE BY

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus,	Barnes' Notes,
Lange's Commentary on Matthew,	Bush's "
Knapp's Christian Theology,	Jacobus' "
McKnight on the Epistles,	Edwards' Works,
Home's Introduction,	Woods' "
Alexander's Commentary,	Kitto's "
Hodge's "	Shedd's Christian Doctrine,
Olshausen's "	Schaff's Church History,
Henry's "	Mosheim's " "
Benson's "	Eusebius' " "
Clark's "

Also, a great variety of Theological Works, Sermons, etc. A liberal discount to ministers

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 PARK ROW, New York.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of stamp.

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen,
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

REBELLION RECORD.

EDITED BY FRANK MOORE.

"A CYCLOPÆDIA OF THE WAR."

This work is a compendium of information, made up of special correspondence, official reports, and gleanings from the newspapers of both sections of the United States and of Europe.

The REBELLION RECORD has now become firmly established as the standard authority of the war. Most of the histories of the war yet published have been in a great measure compiled from this work.

It is of special value to statesmen, inasmuch as the course and policy of all prominent leading men are fully traced in its pages.

Published in monthly parts, each containing 112 octavo pages and two portraits.

Eight volumes already completed.

Price 60 cents per part.

$5 00 per volume bound in cloth.

$6 00 per volume bound in sheep.

$6 50 per volume bound in half calf or half morocco.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
192 BROADWAY.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE sum raised by the friends of free enquiry and offered to Dr. Colenso to indemnify him, to some extent, for the loss that he sustains by publishing the results of his Biblical studies, has reached the handsome amount of £3,200. This is derived mostly from private friends, and it is expected will be largely increased by an appeal to the public. It was presented to him at a meeting in London, previous to his immediate return to Africa to resume his clerical functions. His metropolitan, the Bishop of Cape Town, who claimed the right of deposing Dr. Colenso for heresy, on applying to the Treasury for the reimbursal of the expenses incurred with that object, is less fortunate. He is politely told that a claim of this nature was entirely contrary to the policy of the Government, who were disposed to regard it as an illegal attempt to exercise a coercive jurisdiction, and must positively decline to release him from the consequences of his own acts. Those who are desirous to understand the exact position of the Church of England in relation to the controversies of the day, may see it well defined in a work published by Murray this spring, "The Ecclesiastical Judgments of the Privy Council, 1840–64, edited by Geo. C. Brodrick and Rev. W. H. Freemantle, with a preface by the Bishop of London." Here will be found the proceedings of the final court of appeal on questions of doctrine, luminously arranged and illustrated.

—In one of the nooks and corners of England, at Chalfont St. Giles, a rural village in Buckinghamshire, there yet remains in its primitive state the cottage inhabited by Milton when he left London with his family in 1665, on account of the great plague then raging there. This cottage it is proposed to purchase, and maintain in some manner to be determined on, as a memorial of the poet and the great work that he brought to completion under its roof. There is better authority for this than for many other relics of greater fame and notoriety. We know from the narration of his friend Thomas Ellwood, the Quaker, by whom this house was hired for Milton, that "Paradise Lost" was finished there, and a casual remark by that worthy man under its roof gave to its author the first idea of "Paradise Regained." So long ago as 1737, in an age not given to hero-worship, Pope, who had visited the neighborhood, sent, in a note to Richardson the painter, a copy of some verses said to have been written on a glass window in the village of Chalfont, and apparently at this very house. The lines have not appeared in Milton's works, and are as follows. They seem to us to have something of the Miltonic ring in the measure of the verse, though as the poet was blind at the time specified, they could not have been inscribed, even if written by him.

"Fair mirror of foul times whose fragile sheen
Shall, as it blazeth, break: while Providence,
Aye watching o'er his saints with eye unseen,
Spreads the red roll of angry pestilence
To sweep the wicked and their counsel hence;
Yea, all to break the pride of lustful kings,
Who heaven's lore reject for brutish sense,
As erst he scourg'd Jessides' sin of yore,
For the fair Hittite, when on seraphs' wings
He sent him war, or plague, or famine sore."

It is said that the poem, by a lady of Philadelphia, beginning "Old am I, and blind," has already found its way into some American editions of Milton as a true utterance of the poet. It is more in favor of the authenticity of the lines above that they date at least from a time when imitative composition was certainly less common than at present.

—Goldwin Smith's small volume of "Lectures on the Study of History" is just reprinted at Oxford, after being for some time very scarce. It makes the seventh or eighth little brochure, in which shape only the writings of the professor can be found. It is worthy of remark, as one instance of intellectual difference between England and the United States, how much more the leading minds of the day in the former country have realized the ideal of an active, influential, and even potent use of the printing-press, than we have done here. To take, for instance, three or four prominent men, as Dr. Trench, Rev. F. D. Maurice, Charles Kingsley, and Dean Stanley—these authors alone might actually club together and set up a publisher of their own, keeping him, indeed, very actively employed, at the rate of their writings for the past few years. With men of this stamp, the old-fashioned dignity of authorship seems properly forgotten. If an emergency calls for their opinion, it comes out at once in a pamphlet, a letter, or a sermon, "hitting the nail on the head," without any consideration of how it may figure among the writer's collected works in the next generation. It is this readiness to take the lead that distinguishes the true leaders of the age. The improved position of literary men as a class before the English public, and the general healthy tone of thought on political affairs, is undoubtedly due to the process by which the highest theoretical wisdom of the time is brought into immediate actual contact with the practical questions that interest the whole community. It is to be feared this real and mutual influence of the thinkers upon the workers, and vice versa, is rather diminishing than increasing amongst us. A lecture, an oration, or a letter to a newspaper is the usual mode of appeal to the public, often indirect and circuitous in its operation. Our booksellers' stores, which ought to be the "high 'change" of fresh and direct thought applied to questions of the day, are singularly barren of such material, and in a country where the amount of printing and paper consumed (including newspapers) is almost equal to that of the whole of the rest of the world, the press seems to have abdicated one of its most valuable and important functions.

—A gentleman of Manchester, John Harland, F.S.A., has done good service to popular poetry by collecting in an elegantly decorated and beautifully printed little volume the "Ballads and Songs of Lancashire older than the Nineteenth Century." This county, though now almost given up to manufactures, from its northern situation and rugged natural features, was for a long time behind the rest of the kingdom in cultivation and refinement. It consequently offers a favorable spot for the preservation of the untutored minstrelsy of the people, that flowed spontaneously in commemoration of any event—a murder, a battle, or a rebellion—that impressed itself vividly on the popular mind. The collection includes some curious specimens as early as the reign of Edward IV., and comes down to the present century. Though the English had undoubtedly the same stock of traditions to start with that formed the intellectual stock of their Teutonic brethren in the northern portion of their island and the mainland of Europe, it must be confessed that they never acquired the power over the imagination—the weird and gloomy grandeur and the touches of pathos—that has made the study of northern song the delight of poets and scholars ever since it became known beyond its native limits. English popular poetry flows along with a steady jog-trot pace, and shows great art in omitting or degrading to its own level the situations and sentiments that thrill us in the wilder muse of Scotland, Denmark, and Iceland. Still the gathering is a curious one, particularly from its connection with local history; and it is so well edited by Mr. Harland that it may be read with as much pleasure as the collectious of Percy and Ritson.

—There is scarcely a current rumor to stir the lethargy which prevails among the publishers. It will probably continue during the present month. In the beginning of September the New York Trade Sales commence, when the presence of the country booksellers in the city necessarily conduces to general business. These semi-annual assemblages of buyers and sellers have never been regarded with perfect complacency by all the trade—the conservative members of the profession looking upon their influence as unfavorable to the stability of prices that a publisher loves to contemplate for his issues. Latterly, indeed, the peculiar features of the auction system have been almost ignored, as publishers have sold their books in any quantity they liked, and at a limit fixed by themselves, instead of by the purchasers. This fall there is an attempt to restore the original plan of sale of all the stock offered, without reserve, to the highest bidder among the company present. It is difficult to account for the inactivity of publishers, as abundance of money increases the number of purchasers, and no good book goes unappreciated.

—It is a question whether the reputation of M. Guizot would not have gained if that great scholar and statesman had reserved for posterity the commentaries on his ministerial character and the historical events of the latter years of Louis Philippe's reign, the last volume of which has just appeared, and includes the period from 1841 to 1847. Though the rapid progress of the world causes the occurrences of this date to be regarded as belonging to another era, there is an unavoidable want of delicacy in discussing the character and conduct of living contemporaries that posthumous publications are free from, while it naturally affords more unrestrained opportunities for discussion. Every scholar or man of letters would joyfully resign M. Guizot's vindication of himself and the monarchy of July for the completion of his great but unfinished "History of Civilization in France." That the world of literature will ever receive this from his hands we fear there is no chance: the minister has absorbed the professor, and no reference is made in his later writings to the studies that constitute the true basis of his fame. Of course "France under Louis Philippe" must contain much of value to politicians and future historians. It includes the whole period of the Greek and Turkish troubles (when all M. Guizot's influence was scarcely able to maintain peace between France and England), the affair of the Otaheite Queen Pomare and Mr. Pritchard, the war with Morocco, etc. M. Guizot deals sparingly in anecdote. One characteristic touch of Prince Metternich's portrait helps to paint the man. After the catastrophe of 1848 the prince and M. Guizot were together in London. "I said, one day, to the prince" (writes the latter), "permit me to ask a question. I know why and how the Revolution of February took place in Paris, but why and how it occurred in Vienna I am ignorant, and wish to learn from you." He replied, with a smile of melancholy pride, "I have sometimes governed Europe, but never Austria."

—We catch a few uncertain glimpses of an ever-welcome person—Charles Lamb—in Mr. Frederick Martin's sympathetic but rather affected "Life of John Clare," the Northamptonshire peasant-poet, who forty years ago was the literary phenomenon of the day. Clare's introduction to a metropolitan audience was through Mr. John Taylor, publisher of the "London Magazine," in which appeared the Essays of Elia and the early writings of Hood (the sub-editor), De Quincey, Allan Cunningham, Cary, Hazlitt, George Darley, and others of that brilliant coterie. Clare was introduced by Thomas Hood to Lamb, to whose house they went on a pilgrimage late one evening. "Elia" was in splendid good humor—comfortably ensconced in a large arm-chair, with a huge decanter at his right hand, and a huge bronze snuff-box, from which he continuously helped himself, on his left. Clare having been formally introduced, Charles Lamb took a whole handful of snuff, and, falling back in his arm-chair, stuttered out an atrocious pun about rural poets and hackney coaches. Seeing that his guest looked somewhat displeased, he took him under closer treatment, and with the help of the big decanter soon put him into excessive good humor. The conversation now became general, and Clare thought he had never met with such an agreeable companion as the great Elia. Till late at night the drinking and talking continued, until at last Lamb's sister came into the room, delivering an eloquent lecture upon the value of sobriety; when Clare looked serious. "Do-do-don't be offended, my boy," quoth Charles, "we all know the virtue of rustic swine, I me-me-an of a rustic swain," which saying, Elia pushed on his decanter. But it was too much for Clare. "I must goo," he said, and go he did accordingly. At a subsequent editorial dinner given by Mr. Taylor, Clare remembered Elia's words, "I have been trying all my life to like Scotchmen, and am obliged to desist from the experiment in despair," caused by some disagreement with Allan Cunningham.

—The indications that a new poet has arisen are strong, and though many, like Lord Dudley in a similar case, would prefer to "wait and see if the thing would not blow over," the public voice is rapidly confirming the genial notice by George Henry Lewes in the "Fortnightly Review," wherein a high place among poets is claimed for Robert Buchanan, author of "Idyls and Legends of Inverburn." Mr. Buchanan has seen and sympathetically lived with the weavers and dominies of a Scottish village; he has tasted of their joys, and been shaken by their sorrows. Under his meditative observation have passed the humble tragedies of peasant life, the coarse grim humor of Scottish life, and he has wrought them into verse. He was the friend of David Gray, and the editor of his posthumous volume of poems. A more imaginative rendering of the sad and brief career of that youth of genius, too early quenched, is the subject of "Poet Andrew," the finest of the idyls. It is a psychological study of the growth and unfolding of the spirit of poesy in a frame too fragile to endure the battle of life that the cultivation of this precious endowment implied—showing skilfully the gradual awe and estrangement of the parents as the lad's higher aspirations and larger views of life unfolded themselves, all melting down into the old tenderness and hushed emotion when the young poet, on the very threshold of the attainment of his hopes, came home to die. "Willie Baird," the other poem, of equal value, is the story of a boy pupil lost in the snow, related in a tone of sweet, low pathos by the master of the boy that indicates a power of conforming the outward show of things to the inmost affections of the mind worthy of a great master. Perhaps the most striking single poem by Mr. Buchanan is "A London Idyl," published in the same work that contains Mr. Lewes's kindly criticism. It is the story of a girl of the lowest order, who dies in giving birth to a child, related to the attendant clergyman. For singleness of purpose and completeness of the effect produced, it may be compared to Hood's "Bridge of Sighs." In speaking of poetry, we naturally turn to Messrs. Ticknor & Fields. No two books can well be more diverse than Swinburne's "Atalanta in Calydon" and Buchanan's "Idyls and Legends of Inverburn." Yet both are morally certain of an ardent welcome from lovers of poetry, and we hope to see neat Boston impressions of them both before the summer is over.

—The second volume of the "Life and Writings of Joseph Mazzini" has just appeared. It comprises critical and literary papers, and will surprise many who have regarded the writer as a mere conspirator by trade. The difficulty of writing good English is known to be much greater for natives of Southern Europe of Latin origin than for those of kindred type in the north. They have, perhaps, never been surmounted with so much success as by Mazzini, whose English style is a model of clearness, gravity, and weighty expression. His late refutation of the theory of Cæsarism is the noblest piece of writing that the subject has called forth, and should be republished in America.

—The highest living authority on mathematics and the kindred sciences, Sir J. F. W. Herschel, is responsible for the following calculation, which will give a new idea of the power of numbers and the powerlessness of the unaided mind to grasp the simple conception of them, without physical illustration:

"For the benefit of those who discuss the subject of population, war, pestilence, famine, etc., it may be as well to mention that the number of human beings living at the end of the hundredth generation, commencing from a single pair doubling at each generation (say in thirty years) and allowing for each man, woman, and child an average space of four feet in height and one foot square, would form a vertical column having for its base the whole surface of the earth and sea spread out into a plane, and for its height 3,674 times the sun's distance from the earth. The number of human strata thus piled one on the other would amount to 460,790,000,000,000."

It occurs in a dialogue "On Atoms," in No. 1 of the "Fortnightly Review."

—The foreign papers abound with notices of the great preparations of various kinds making for Louis Napoleon's Life of Cæsar, to assist him in his narration of the Roman emperor's campaigns in Gaul and Hispania, by all the lights that archæological and military science can throw upon the scenes of action where barbarian valor succumbed to the superior force of Roman discipline. We do not know how the case may be in France, where it may possibly be the duty of some Government functionary to "bull the market" for the imperial writings, but in England the book is commercially dead and past resuscitation, whatever may be the merits of the forthcoming volumes. Booksellers themselves were carried away by the artfully prepared preliminary notices of the press, and have generally become encumbered with a heavy stock of a book that the public will not help them off with. We believe this is partly the case here, and that there are not likely to be so many rival editions of Volume II. as there were brought out of Volume I. The hybrid portrait of a composite emperor, combining the physical features of Napoleon and Julius Cæsar, attracted some attention as a clever artistic "tour de force," but when Louis Napoleon conceived it he can scarcely have recollected the injustice he was doing to the lineaments of his uncle. There is a remarkable testimony to the heroic character of Napoleon's head from an unimpeachable witness, C. R. Leslie, the painter. Speaking of Dr. Antommarchi's cast from the face of Napoleon, he says: "It is more handsome than any bust or portrait of him, and indeed has the look of a much younger man than he appears in the latest portraits. This is easily accounted for. Illness had reduced the superabundant fleshiness of the lower part of his face and brought it back to the condition of an early period, and death, by leaving the mouth slightly open, had destroyed that expression of selfish determination which the thin compressed lips give to every portrait of Napoleon. The profile of the cast is the most perfectly beautiful profile of a man I ever saw, the faint smile caused by the last slight convulsion after all consciousness had ceased adding the beauty of death to a face originally of very fine proportions."

—The new work by Dr. John W. Draper, shortly to be issued by Messrs. Harper, is entitled "Thoughts on American Civil Polity." Dr. Draper's previous book, "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," showed how extensive had been the range of his researches in the past history of the race. It is not surprising therefore that in his forthcoming book he draws illustrations of the future of America from a wide induction, which takes cognizance of the varying conditions of man on the globe as influenced by the operation of physical agents. Contrasting the present stagnation of Asiatic life with its former activity, he remarks in a passage, the interest of which will excuse its length:

"We forget how many contributions to our own comforts are of Oriental origin. Their commonness hides them from our view. If the European wishes to know how much he owes to the Asiatic, he has only to cast a glance at an hour of his daily life. The clock which summons him from his bed in the morning was the invention of the East, as also were clepsydras and sun-dials. The prayer for his daily bread, that he has said from his infancy, first rose from the side of a Syrian mountain. The linens and cottons with which he clothes himself, though they may be very fine, are inferior to those that have been made from time immemorial in the looms of India. The silk was stolen for his benefit from China. He could buy better steel than that with which he shaves himself in the old city of Damascus, where it was first invented. The coffee he expects at breakfast was first grown by the Arabians, and the natives of Upper India prepared the sugar with which he sweetens it. A school-boy can tell the meaning of the Sanscrit words 'sacchara canda.' If he prefers tea, the virtues of that excellent leaf were first pointed out by the industrious Chinese. They also taught him how to make and use the cup and saucer in which to serve it. His breakfast tray was lacquered in Japan. The egg he is breaking was laid by a fowl whose ancestors were first domesticated by the Malaccans, unless she may have been—though that will not alter the case—a modern Shanghai. If there are preserves and fruits on his board, let him remember with thankfulness that Persia first gave him the cherry, the peach, the plum. If in any of these pleasant preparations he detects the flavor of alcohol, let it remind him that that substance was first distilled by the Arabians. A thousand years before it had occurred to him to enact laws of restriction in the use of intoxicating drinks, the Prophet of Mecca did the same thing, and has compelled to this day millions to obey them. We gratify our taste for personal ornaments in the way the Orientals have taught us—with pearls, rubies, sapphires, diamonds. Of public amusements it is the same. The most magnificent fireworks are still to be seen in India and China; and as regards the pastimes of private life, Europe has produced no invention that can rival the game of chess. We have no hydraulic constructions as great as the Chinese Canal, no fortifications as extensive as the Chinese Wall; we have no artesian wells that can at all approach in depth some of theirs. We have not yet resorted to the practice of obtaining coal gas from the interior of the earth; they have borings for that purpose more than 3,000 feet deep."

DE TOCQUEVILLE IN THE UNITED STATES.*

We have received the eighth volume of the "complete works" of Alexis de Tocqueville, edited by his lifelong friend, Gustave de Beaumont. The contents of the first six volumes, of which three contain his "Democracy in America," the fourth his "Ancient Régime and the Revolution," and the fifth and sixth his "Remains and Letters," besides a sketch of his life by the editor, have been presented in more or less valuable translations to the reading, or rather thinking, public in this country. The seventh contains a new collection of "Letters." The miscellaneous contents of the volume just issued, which will be followed by but one more, embracing his academic and similar elaborations, can be divided into two parts, one consisting of "Historical Fragments and Notes on the Ancient Régime, the Revolution, and the Empire," given for the first time to the public in the unfinished shape in which the premature death of the author has left them; and the other of "Notes of Travel," put down for the writer's own use during his journeys in America (1831–2), England (1833 and 1835), Ireland (1835), Germany (1836), and Algeria (1841).

It is needless to say that whatever De Tocqueville wrote and Gustave de Beaumont publishes, even when devoid of those peculiar charms of diction and finish which the pen of the former so richly bestowed upon his elaborate writings, fully deserves the attention of the friends of serious literature. It is true his finished pages offer us a variety of literary amenities, but, after all, it is the ripe fruits of his studies, observations, and reflections, and not the blossoms, however beautiful, in which he carefully wraps them, which we look for in all his productions. Besides, De Tocqueville seems to have studied but choice literature; his observations were all made with the eye of a writer, and even the germ of his thought is always presented to us in the garb of exquisite expression. To Americans, whom he, more than any other man, helped to understand the philosophy of their own political institutions and social phenomena, the first recorded remarks of the keen-eyed traveller in this country, entirely private and free of reserve and coloring, as they sprang forth from his brain, have the additional value of affording them an opportunity of appreciating the degree of candor, impartiality, and philosophical independence which he applied to the performance of his task. The glimpses we are thus permitted to catch of his mental laboratory will, in a measure, also enable us to judge how much of the obtained results was the product of convictions long cherished, how much of reflections suggested or ripened by vivid impressions, and how much of careful investigation and enquiry. For these reasons we select the American "Notes" as the subject of our first notice of the volume before us, reserving some of the "Historical Fragments" for a future article. Unfortunately the traveller wrote or left but few notes, and of these some are little more than commemorative pencil-marks. However, they will allow us to follow him through some parts of his immortal tour.

On the 10th of May, 1831, De Tocqueville arrived in the United States, landing at New York. His first note written in that city bears the date of May 20. He was struck with the immensity of the view before him, but this did not fill him with enthusiasm, because he had to ascribe more of what he saw to the nature of things than to the will of man. He found something febrile in the movements of industry as well as of the human mind; however, that fever seemed to him to increase force without troubling reason. What remained to be done seemed to expand in proportion to what had been done. He compared the twenty thousand population of New York at the outbreak of the war of the Revolution with the two hundred thousand before him, to which every year added immense development. He understood the wilderness of the Mississippi was becoming peopled still more rapidly. The material movements appeared of incredible magnitude, the political but superficial; society marching alone, and the art of government in its infancy.

During an excursion to Sing Sing, he compared the essential characteristics of the ancient republics with those of the American. The principle of the former was the sacrifice of individual interest to that of the whole; the principle of the latter, he believed, to make individual interest enter into the general. A kind of refined and enlightened self-love seemed to be the pivot of the whole modern machinery. People did not trouble themselves to learn whether public virtue was good, they sought to prove that it was useful. The question for them was, How far can individual and general good be united and melted into one? To what point will a conscience derived, so to speak, from reflection and calculation be able to bear down political passions which will certainly arise? The future alone could give an answer.

A few days later he notes down the substance of a conversation with Mr. Gallatin, ex-ambassador of the United States to France and England, on American lawyers, magistrates, and women. In this, as well as other colloquies, De Tocqueville appears only as a respectful interrogator and attentive enquirer, bent on eliciting information from native knowledge and experience, and entirely free of the vanity of displaying his own.

His first attempt at sketching to himself the American character contains these lines:

"There are as yet no American habits. Every one takes from the association that which suits him and remains in his originality. Why should it not be so? Here the laws vary incessantly; magistracies succeed each other; the systems of administration vary; nature itself changes more rapidly than man. By a singular inversion of the order of things, nature seems to be moving and man immovable. . . . . .

"The same man may have given his name to a wilderness which nobody ever traversed before him; may have felled the first tree of the forest, raised in that solitude a planter's house, round which first a hamlet grouped itself, and finally a vast city has grown up. In the short space which separates death from birth he has witnessed all these changes. In his youth he lived among nations that are no more; in his lifetime rivers have changed or diminished their course; the climate itself is different from what he knew it to be in former days; and all this is in his thought but the first step of a boundless career. However powerful and impetuous the current of time may be, fancy outstrips it here; the scene is not wide enough for it; it already grasps after another universe. An intellectual movement goes on here comparable only to that which, three hundred years ago, produced the discovery of the New World. It is erroneous to believe that such thoughts can arise only in the head of the philosopher; they strike alike the mechanic and the thinker, the inhabitant of the country as well as of the city. They become embodied in all objects; they form a part of every sensation; they are palpable, visible, felt in one way or other. Born under a different sky, placed in the midst of a constantly moving scene, pushed onward by the irresistible current which carries off all that surrounds him, the American finds no time to fix himself by any kind of attachment; he becomes accustomed only to change, and eventually regards it as the natural condition of man; more than that, he loves it; for instability, instead of presenting itself to him in disasters, seems to engender around him but prodigies."

Travelling along the upper course of the Hudson, and through the valley of the Mohawk, De Tocqueville looked in vain for traces of the aborigines; he sighed after "the Mohawks, the most ancient and bravest of the tribes of the Iroquois Confederation;" he thought with melancholy of the melting away of the Indian races "by their contact with civilization, as the snow melts under the rays of the sun." At Utica he wrote:

"Every ten years or thereabouts the Indian tribes which have been pressed back into the wilds of the West perceive that they have gained nothing by falling back, the white race advancing still more rapidly than they retreat. Irritated by the feeling of their powerlessness, or inflamed by some new offence, they assemble and impetuously dash into the regions they formerly occupied, and in which now rise the habitations of Europeans. The Indians traverse the country, burn the dwellings, slay the herds, and carry off some scalps. Civilization then falls back, but like the wave of the sea in its tide. The United States take the part of the least of their settlers, and declare that those wretched little tribes have violated the law of nations. A regular army is sent against them, and not only is the American territory reconquered, but the whites, driving the savages before them, destroy their wigwams, seize their herds, and fix the extreme limit of their own possessions a hundred leagues further than ever before. Thus deprived of their new adopted land by what schooled and enlightened Europe chooses to call the right of war, the Indians resume their march westward, until they halt in some new solitude, where, too, the white man's axe will soon be heard."

* "Œuvres complètes d'Alexis de Tocqueville." VIII. ["Complete Works of Alexis de Tocqueville." Vol. VIII.] Paris, 1865.

He was not insensible to the benefits accruing to mankind from this fated vanishing of the Indian race, but it was with a mixed feeling that he observed smiling villages and towns springing up on their bloody track, and followed the pioneer marching in the van of the immense European family through the conquered primeval forest, where he builds his rustic cabin, and only waits for another war to open to him a road towards new wilds.

At Oneida Castle he saw the first Indians. They were begging. Shortly after his return from a trip through Oneida Lake, a narrative of which is given in the fifth volume of the "Works," we find De Tocqueville at Canandaigua, engaged in a conversation with John C. Spencer, subsequently the author of an abridgment of the "Democracy," whose philosophic views on various important constitutional topics, as expressed in his lucid answers to the traveller's queries, fully agree with, if they have not originated, the conclusions arrived at by the latter in his analysis of American institutions. As a striking instance, we cite the following queries and answers:

"Q. What is the influence of the press on public opinion?

"A. Its influence is great, but it is not exercised in the same way as in France. We attach but very little value to the opinions of journalists. The press only obtains influence by the facts it communicates, and by the turn it gives them. In this way it sometimes succeeds in misleading opinion in regard to a public man, or to the character of a measure. The press, it is certain, will be found a formidable instrument in every country and under all forms of government.

"Q. Which, according to your opinion, is the best means of diminishing the power of the periodical press?

"A. I am perfectly convinced that the most effective of all is to have the number of journals multiplied as much as possible, and to prosecute them but in extreme cases. Their force diminishes in proportion to their number. Experience has made this manifest to us. I hear that in France there are only two or three great journals of credit. I think in such a case the press must become a very dangerous agent."

De Tocqueville for several days continued his instructive intercourse with Mr. Spencer. Among other things communicated to him by the latter, he recorded the following anecdote of Red Jacket, one of those men "whose superior intelligence foresees the fatal destiny of their race, and whose savage energy yet struggles against that fatality; . . . . one of those men whom we might call the last of the Indians." In his capacity of District Attorney, Mr. Spencer once conducted a prosecution against an Indian, of the neighborhood of Buffalo, accused of having murdered an American. Red Jacket, with the aid of an interpreter, pleaded the cause of the accused, who was acquitted. When the trial was over, he approached his antagonist, and with apparent simplicity said: "No doubt my brother, on some remote day, inflicted on you a great injury?" Mr. Spencer answered that he had never heard of him before. "I understand," replied Red Jacket; "the white man who was killed was your brother, and you wanted to avenge him." Mr. Spencer tried to explain away his error by making him understand the nature of an attorney's functions. The Indian, having listened with attention, asked him whether he was paid by the elders of his people for doing what he had just explained, and, on receiving an affirmative answer, indignantly exclaimed: "So! not only did you try to kill my brother, who has never wronged you, but you sold his blood in advance!"

In the latter part of July, De Tocqueville made that great excursion from Detroit through lakes and primeval forests which he described in his charming "Fortnight in the Wilderness," given in the fifth volume of his "Works." He immediately after embarked on board the steamer Superior, the first which penetrated on the great lakes as far as Green Bay. He ascended Detroit River; traversed Lake St. Clair; saw on the shore of St. Huron a group of entirely savage Indians dancing the war-dance, fine men but gesticulating like devils; cast anchor at the extremity of the latter lake amid Indians all astonished at the sight of the steamer, and on the morning of Aug. 6 reached Sault Ste. Marie.

"A charming site. Admirable weather. Ste. Marie: a palisaded square, with a mast in the centre bearing the American flag; further on, two points of land covered with fine trees, by which the river is narrowed; under the trees, wigwams. Between the points, the rapids. Still further, mountains and interminable forests. At our arrival, the entire population on the banks or on the roofs of the houses. A vessel like ours is seen there only once in a year. Strange character of that population. Mixture of all kinds of blood. The most numerous, the Canadian French."

An Indian canoe carried our traveller to Lake Superior, on the shores of which he visited Pointe aux Chênes and a camp of Indian traders, everywhere studying the character of the aborigines. They were described to him as kind and hospitable in peace, but wild beasts in war. He rejoiced to hear his native tongue spoken in that remote wilderness by Canadians, and learned with pleasure that the Indians of those regions had a predilection for it while disliking the English. He returned to the steamer, descending the Rapids, between rocks, with the swiftness of an arrow, and admiring the extraordinary skill of the Canadian boatmen.

On board the Superior he conversed with an eloquent and devoted Catholic priest, Mr. Mullon, who told him his opinions concerning religious freedom, the true condition, as he was convinced, of the advancement of religion; the position of the Catholics in the United States, whom he represented as more fervent in their faith and more successful in spreading it than those of any other part of the world, owing to the total separation, in this country, of the church from the state, and in spite of the hatred of Catholicism which all other denominations united in cherishing; the merits of the ancient Jesuits in converting and civilizing the Indians; and the character of these savage people, of whose laconic eloquence, ferocity in war, and attachment to Christianity, when converted to it, he spoke in very strong terms.

The notes written at Michillimackinac and Green Bay are all devoted to observations on the Indians. After his return to Detroit, De Tocqueville saw the Falls of the Niagara, on which he is silent, and made a tour through Canada, the notes on which, though copious and highly interesting, we pass over without remark or quotation, as transcending the sphere of our article. But we cannot refrain from extracting several remarks from his "Reflections on the Causes which make it difficult for the French to have Good Colonies," suggested by a comparison of colonial developments north and south of the St. Lawrence. The principal difficulties, the writer thinks, lie in the national character, political customs, and laws of the French. In the French character a deep-rooted attachment to his native home and an ardent inclination for adventures are strangely mixed together—two things equally detrimental to colonization. The Frenchman fondly clings to his domestic hearth, but, when torn from it by accident, is most apt to become passionately fond of the hazardous course of savage life. It is exceedingly difficult to persuade the poor but honest countryman of France to seek a fortune beyond its frontiers. But if you succeed in bringing him to a foreign shore, you can hardly settle him there. He is not animated by that ardent and obstinate desire of making a fortune which so constantly stimulates the Englishman, and makes him exert all his faculties toward one aim. The Frenchman is satisfied with little; his progress is slow; he is continually attracted by the charms of a lazy and vagabond life. This original obstacle is aggravated by the influences of political training. For centuries the government has tried to direct everything in France. To-day it not only governs, but administers all affairs in all parts of the country. It has carried its principles of centralization even beyond the seas. Be it from want of confidence in its tools, jealousy of power, or force of habit, it has made prodigious efforts to be at the head of a colony what it is at the centre of the state. It has tried to judge things unknown; to arrange conditions entirely foreign; to obviate wants beyond its conception; to foresee everything; to examine, direct, control, and do everything. The French colonist, on his part, is excellently trained for such tutelage, and is just as eager to refer everything to his protector as the latter is to guide him. He relies not on his own efforts; he has little taste for independence; he must be compelled to be free.

"The history of the last centuries offers us, we must confess it, a singular spectacle.

"We see France undertaking a vast system of colonies. The plans are ably conceived, the places well selected. The task was to unite, by an uninterrupted chain of settlements, the St. Lawrence with the Mississippi, and thus to found in the centre of North America a new French empire, of which Canada and Louisiana were to be the two outlets.

"Great sacrifices in men are made, immense sums and pains are expended, to attain that end. The government is incessantly occupied with the affairs of these new establishments, and forgets not for a moment the duty of guiding them. And still, in spite of all its efforts, the colonies languish. The land opens in vain before the steps of the French; they advance not into the fertile wilds which surround them; the population increases imperceptibly. Ignorance seems to spread. The new society remains stationary, acquiring neither force nor wealth. It finally succumbs, after an heroic struggle, to foreign aggression.

"Near by, on the shores of the ocean, English settlers establish themselves. The others have been sent by the mother country; these have rather escaped from the bosom of theirs. As soon as they have set their foot on American soil, you would say, they have become strangers in England, so little mindful seems that country of governing them. From the start they have their political assemblies and their tribunals; they ar-point most of their magistrates, organize their militia, care for all their wants, form their police, and frame their laws. The mother country has almost nothing to do with their internal affairs. Its only intervention consists in protecting their commerce and defending them against foreign assaults.

"And yet these settlements, thus abandoned to themselves, which cost their mother country neither money, nor care, nor efforts, double their population every twenty-two years, and become centres of riches and culture."

Returning from Canada in September, De Tocqueville again travelled through parts of New York, and then through New England. He was very favorably impressed by the appearance of the latter, as well as of Boston society, the higher strata of which he found resembling almost completely those of Europe. Where he moved, he noticed refinement and taste, literary culture and distinguished manners. The ladies spoke French; the gentlemen had been in Europe. Fine literary collections were not wanting. A religious interest seemed to prevail. His conversations with prominent men embraced the highest topics of politico-philosophical enquiry. With Senator Gray, "a man of great talent," he conversed on municipal self-rule and the influence of institutions and habits; with John Quincy Adams, with whom he dined at Everett's, and who spoke French "with facility and elegance," on national conventions, the American character, in general and sectional characteristics, slavery and the dangers threatening the Union; with Sparks on the division of lands, laws of inheritance, and emigration to the West; with Channing, "the most remarkable living American writer on grave topics," on religion in France and in the United States, Protestantism, Unitarianism, and natural religion.

He returned to New York meditating on the advantages and much greater disadvantages of a strict division of labor, as chiefly illustrated by the progress of industry and the wretched condition of the laboring classes in England. In the almost total absence of a division of labor he found the cause of the great intelligence and general capacity of working-men in America. Little is done very well, but everybody does a little of everything. Hence, also, a superiority in the common affairs of life and the government of society.

Philadelphia offered him an opportunity of studying the character of the Quakers, "the only religious sect which has always practised toleration and Christian charity in its full extent." In a note written in that city he speaks of the superiority of the spirit and manner of a people over its laws in shaping its conditions. Still the laws have their part in forming the character of a people. The "great problem" is to know in what proportion.

In Baltimore we find him enquiring after the distinctive features of the Southern character, the "spirit of chivalry," and the workings of slavery. He there visited Charles Carroll, the only surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence, then ninety-five years of age, and the richest land-owner in America. He found him amiable, well educated, proud of his Revolutionary remembrances, and in everything resembling the European nobleman, even in his political opinions. But this race, De Tocqueville noticed, was vanishing in America, after having given it its greatest men. The tradition of higher manners vanished with it. The people became enlightened, knowledge extended, and a mediocre capacity common. Eminent talents, great characters, were rarer. Society was less brilliant and more prosperous. It was a natural effect of the march of civilization.

Returning to Philadelphia, he conversed with Mr. Biddle on the United States Bank, the great topic of the day. He then traversed Pennsylvania, embarked in Pittsburg on board the steamer Ohio, and descended the river of the same name to Louisville, visiting Cincinnati, where he conversed with Judge McLean, of the Supreme Court. Having set out on a fatiguing journey through Tennessee, he fell sick at Sandy Bridge, and reached Memphis only at the close of 1831. His notes now become more and more scanty. New Orleans, Alabama, and Norfolk are the only geographical names marked before reaching Washington, which closes the tour. His last remarks, dated January 30, 1832, refer to "the great men of the first times of the republic, their enlightenment, true patriotism, and high character," and, first of all, to Washington. "Les dieux s'en vont."

MISS COBBE ON RELIGIOUS DUTY.*

"A MAN'S own virtue," says Miss Cobbe, "is the end of his creation;" and the scope of her book accordingly is to exhibit religion as an outgrowth of the moral rather than the spiritual nature of man. Miss Cobbe is full of earnestness, has always a meaning of her own whether right or wrong, and a bluff English directness of speech which disdains the alluring graces of rhetoric. We have a real respect for her conscious intellectual sincerity; but we have none the less decided a conviction that she overdoes; that her manner is grave and earnest beyond the requirements of her matter; that her style, in short, is a great deal louder than the strict merits of her thought—estimated at least by its relation to the religious history of the race—at all entitle it to be.

Nothing can be more transparent than Miss Cobbe's philosophy. It is that whatsoever appears is; that the actual or phenomenal is a direct and every way competent measure of the real or absolute; in short, that nature and man, or flesh and spirit, cohere not by inversion or correspondence, as effect and cause, body and soul, cohere; but directly, or by continuity, as greater and less, or beginning and end, cohere. Her idea of religion consequently is very simple. It is that religion was designed to house and nourish the moral or voluntary life of man—that to which he himself is completely competent—rather than his spiritual or spontaneous one, to which he himself is profoundly incompetent; that it was intended to soften and modify his native instincts into a more or less real conformity with the Divine nature, rather than to endow him with a new nature exquisitely alien though still tenderly indulgent to the old one, whatever that may have conventionally been. Thus her notion of religious duty, that of worship for example, is that it is of the nature of a debt incurred for benefits received, and can no more go unpaid without serious though limited damage to the debtor, because the creditor happens to be infinite, than it can without such detriment when the creditor happens to be finite. We are "bound to worship because it is right that such a being as man should worship such a being as God. It is as much a part of eternal justice that the rational recipient of unnumbered benefits should return gratitude to his benefactor, as it is a part of justice that a murderer should be punished." (Pages 13, 14.) Can anything be more plain? Is it not indeed revoltingly plain? Did ever any one before place our obligation to worship God on the same ground of self-defence, or self-protection, as that exacted by the obligation to punish murderers?

Religion, then, according to Miss Cobbe's showing, is much more an affair of the head than the heart; and religious worship much more a prompting of duty than of delight. "Religion," says Miss Cobbe, "is identified with sound morality;" and God is "necessarily a perfect moral being," who, "in making us rational creatures, has implicitly rested his title to our allegiance on his own moral perfection, for to such perfection alone is it lawful for such creatures to bow." (Pages 2, 3.) We repeat that Miss Cobbe's meaning is plain, vastly too plain. For how shall any one who honors, however feebly, the living form of religion, endure to hear it christened a purely "rational" or calculated commerce of man with God? How shall any one who knows the faintest breath of living worship endure to hear it defined as a moral or voluntary homage of the soul to God imposed by a sense of benefits received, and not as a wholly spontaneous or involuntary one, based upon no sense of "benefits received" or to be received, but solely upon the sense of a worth in its object so immaculate, so immeasurable and overwhelming as to baffle reason, and leave the soul no voice nor choice but praise.

So it is, however; Miss Cobbe takes religion back to the days of the patriarchs, or runs it into a mere legal covenant between God and the worshipper, conditioned upon the reciprocal worthiness of the parties to it; and the whole strain of her book consequently goes to exhaust the relations of the soul to God of all hidden or mystic depth, of all tender spiritual sanctity and awe, by making them strictly moral or personal relations—such as two mutually independent but mutually courteous persons sustain to each other. Far be it from us, however, to hint that Miss Cobbe's gospel, however Edenic it be in point of theology, is at all inappropriate in point of time. If anything is clear in our mental tendencies, it is that men are getting weary to death of that tyrannous conscience of disunion between them and God which has been bred of their past moral disorder, and aspiring with one heart and mind to a regenerate social condition of the earth, in which every man shall be born into harmony with the Providence that governs it, and so unlearn all actual evil. In this new Eden, this beautiful state of human nature, it will be perfectly safe and salutary to make religion the eminently just and decorous thing Miss Cobbe would have it to be. In that condition, no longer of faith but of knowledge, when the Divine bounty shall have drowned the very senses with wonder and reverence, it will be as discreditable to a man not to join in public adoration or worship, as it is now discreditable not to pay his debts. Clearly, religion will then be the superb letter or ritual which Miss Cobbe desires to make it; and every one will feel religious worship to be a debt, the payment of which is guaranteed by his very senses. We hint no word of discouragement to all this jubilant hope, and say Amen, ab imo corde. But we must make just one observation to our very clever friend, the force of which, we hope, will one day be apparent to her, and that is—that in every debtor and creditor relation there ought to be some provision made for bankruptcy; and her scheme of religion, as such a relation, leaves this contingency wholly unprovided for.

* "Religious Duty. By Frances Power Cobbe." Boston: W. V. Spencer, 1865.

Without doubt, the observation seems just now wholly unnecessary to Miss Cobbe; but she may be very sure that she is never going to supersede even Moses as a religious legislator, until she supply this want or devise some lustration which shall purge the guilty conscience rather than ratify the righteous one. She may rely upon it that while man remains man and God remains God, the courts of heaven are essentially bankruptcy courts, and that no one soever, therefore, will be able to pass them save as a bankrupt, though his schedule should prove him to have paid a hundred cents to the dollar of every debt he owed. In the best conceivable moral condition of the world to which she ever finds herself aspiring, she will encounter a vast deal of this secret spiritual bankruptcy. Even in what she would regard the world's millennium, so far as morality is concerned, there will always be men who abhor religion as a ritual, because they feel it to be an inevitable ministry of death, not of life; men who regard "their own virtue" as something very puerile and ludicrous, when it is not atrocious; who smile with inward scorn, or rather turn pale with dread, at the idea of paying the great God his dues—since this would involve the surrender of their vital breath at every moment; men, in short, who have an infinite horror of inviting God's personal complacency to them at any time, and would much prefer to be for ever forgotten by him, if only his knowledge might so survive with them. We assure Miss Cobbe that these sceptics as to the integrity of the popular devotion will always exist; that they will even abound, perhaps, in that flowing land of Cockaigne to which we are hastening—these doubters, these recreants to the sunshine, these reckless contemners of "their own virtue"—and we ask Miss Cobbe what is to become of such people unless she provide a good bankruptcy law? We, ourselves, feel a sneaking regard for these castaways, who can have no religion "to speak of;" who will be obviously faithless to it in every aspect under which Miss Cobbe sees fit to commend it; who will have no more sense of it as an obligation or debt enforced upon their observance by rational sanctions than any unmitigated Pottowattamie Indian has; and we insist upon Miss Cobbe taking some thought betimes about them.

Thus we have no criticism, but only commendation, to bestow upon Miss Cobbe, within her own intellectual limits. We only find these limits very intolerable to ourselves.

THE SANITARY CONDITION OF NEW YORK.*

If there is one thing more than another in regard to which the people of New York appear to be utterly indifferent, that thing is the sanitary condition of the great city in which they live, and die too, at a greater rate than the inhabitants of any other large city in Christendom. Without efficient hygienic regulations, with a thorough disregard of the imperfect system which exists, with the most shameful neglect and criminality in all matters which relate to the health of the population committed to their care, the authorities are allowed year after year to pursue a course which is hurrying thousands upon thousands to untimely graves. The wealthy, the educated, the respectable, in whom the real power resides to right these wrongs against the society to which they belong, are content to look out from the windows of their well-arranged high-stoop or English-basement houses, and to thank God that the street is clean, that the garbage is removed, and that there is no probability that the typhoid fever or small-pox, which exists in the tenement houses in the rear, will infect their own luxuriously equipped dwellings. Attention has again and again been called to the deplorable and wicked recklessness of those having the immediate charge of the sanitary condition of the city, and innumerable efforts have been made to rouse the people themselves from the apathy they have constantly evinced in regard to their own hygienic welfare. It has all been in vain. With a degree of composure and stolid unconcern which have either proceeded from the grossest ignorance or the most thorough indifference, they have turned a deaf ear to the arguments and the entreaties which have been made, and New York to-day is the filthiest and the most unhealthy city to be found within the limits of the civilized world.

In the work before us we have the record of the best organized and most scientific effort which has ever been made to awaken the people of New York to a sense of the great dangers to which they are constantly exposed. If the Citizens' Association had never done another act to entitle it to the thanks of all well-wishers of humanity, it certainly deserves them for the courage, the persistency, and the completeness with which it has conceived and carried out the great undertaking, the results of which are now published. Bearing in mind, however, the failure of all former endeavors in the same direction, and marking the feeble response which has been made to the appeals of individuals and of the press for years past, we have no very sanguine expectations that any decided effect will come from this last and best attempt. The public taste for horrors requires something more piquant than the statement that many poor wretches in this Christian city live habitually under the level of the street in spaces of less area than a moderate sized grave. Such dens of everything that is vile and filthy as the "Gotham Rookery," the "Great Eastern," or the numerous "fever nests" of Washington and Park Streets, in which one-fourth of the population is constantly sick, and one in twenty die every year, do not excite sufficiently startling thoughts in the brain of the staid and even-minded citizen.

The report of the Council of Hygiene (composed, we believe, entirely of physicians) is a clearly written, outspoken document, the author of which may well congratulate himself on the valuable matter he has presented to the public, and on the forcible way in which he states his opinions. If his labors have not met with the full attention they deserve, he should not be discouraged. Time, which it is said works wonders, may bring his fellow citizens to a full recognition of the magnitude and value of his exertions in their behalf, and in the meantime action may possibly be quickened by the cholera epidemic, which slowly, but surely, is travelling towards our shores. The same language may be used in regard to the indefatigable and competent medical inspectors whose reports make up the body of the volume. Probably not a hundred persons, exclusive of the active members of the Citizens' Association, have read the sensible and fearless remarks they have made, or cared even to make themselves superficially acquainted with the important information they have collected. Reformers in this world have a hard time of it. They are certain while they live to make more enemies than friends, and it is only after they are dead that mankind begins to appreciate them. Beyond this hope of posthumous reputation, and the approval of their own consciences, we are afraid the gentlemen who have devoted their time and energies to the cause of sanitary reformation in New York have very slim prospects of due appreciation.

But although the reports contained in the book under consideration are valuable, and present a horrible but doubtless truthful picture of the worst phases of social life in the great metropolis, there is an absence of those deductions which can only be made as the result of difficult but unerring scientific investigations. We have no analysis of the air of the tenement houses, or even of that of the city, such as Ramon di Lama has made of the atmosphere of Madrid. It may be said that the nasal organ is capable of telling whether or not the air of a locality is healthy. Such, however, is by no means invariably the case, as some of the most disgusting odors are not only not prejudicial to health, but are, on the contrary, favorable to it. The microscope, by means of which the most interesting and important details might have been obtained relative to the morphological constituents of the atmosphere, does not appear to have been employed at all. As we know that many diseases spread by the actual contact of microscopic organisms floating in the air, we regret that this valuable instrument was not brought into requisition. Neither have we any analysis of the water, except in one instance, or of the milk, or the other articles of food upon which the poorer classes of our population live.

But if the object of the Citizens' Association was simply to act upon the public mind in the shortest and most forcible way, the plan adopted will accomplish the end if it is possible to bring it about at all. It must be recollected, however, that it is from the scientific data which are only obtainable by cold and dispassionate and intelligent research, that well-directed and effectual means can be devised for improving our sanitary condition. We have scarcely glanced at these, but there are doubtless gentlemen within the reach of the Citizens' Association who are perfectly competent to collect them. And now that this organization has so thoroughly done its duty in seeking to awaken attention to the deplorable state of our hygienic arrangements, may we not hope that it will attempt to clinch all its conclusions by the unanswerable and unerring statements which science can enable it to make? In the meantime, we feel that we cannot sufficiently express our high sense of its labors; and in the hope of adding our mite to the good cause, we advise all our people who value their own lives and those of their fellow-citizens to get the book we have mentioned, and to do their part towards remedying the evils which are there so graphically described.

THE STORY OF THE GREAT MARCH.*

The events of the recent civil war are still quite too near us to justify any attempt at grasping them as a whole. Of course, we shall have scores

* "Report of the Council of Hygiene and Public Health of the Citizens' Association of New York upon the Sanitary Condition of the City." New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1865. pp. 360.

* "The Story of the Great March. From the Diary of a Staff Officer. By Brevet-Major Savage Ward Nichols, Aid-de-Camp to General Sherman. With a Map and Illustrations." New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers, Franklin Square. 1865.

of books after the wisdom of our generation, and they may occasionally be the product of genius. Mr. Kinglake's "Invasion of the Crimea" is certainly an indisputable proof that current history can be written in current time. But there is a grand dramatic aspect of the rebellion which requires distance for its proper unfolding. We may, indeed, even now hastily glance over the broad stage, assemble the dramatis personæ, and roughly sketch the acts, conforming them numerically to the Shakesperian model. Yet our classification and division must be essentially imperfect, unless, perhaps, we except the denouement, which was so rapid, and exhibits such condensation and completeness as to admit of no serious errors. It was in these final scenes that General Sherman played so conspicuous a part, and his mysterious and tortuous march through the hitherto unpenetrated districts of the Confederacy will always fill a conspicuous place in history, both for the startling picturesqueness of the movement and for its splendid results. It is to set forth the story of this great march which is the object of the author of the book whose title we give below.

Major Nichols was relieved from detached service in the West during the summer of 1864, and was ordered to report to the general commanding the Military Division of the Mississippi. He found Sherman at Atlanta, was at once placed upon his staff, and, according to his own story, possessed much of that general's confidence from the start. His position gave him an excellent opportunity for observation, and it is only fair to suppose that he faithfully improved it. The volume which he now presents to the public is compiled from notes taken on the spot, and has, therefore, freshness, raciness, and vigor. There is included in it an appendix containing the official reports of the campaigns of Georgia and the Carolinas, the letters pertaining to the famous conference, Sherman's testimony before the Committee on the War, and much other matter necessary for the complete illustration of the subject. Altogether, it is a valuable addition to our war literature. Preeminently a book of details, it conforms to the great need of the time; for, as we have previously hinted, the irrepressible cry of to-day is for facts—the tout ensemble will be done hereafter, and by hands that are yet innocent of the responsibility of the ballot-box. If the reader hopes for revelations, however, he will be disappointed. Revelations about the author, indeed, there are plenty. We get frequent glimpses of his noble sentiments, of his detestation of the slave system, of his admiration of work and scorn of idleness, of his enthusiasm for Sherman, of his cogitations while dripping under a "fly tent" during a rain-storm, and of his night adventures in a Carolina slough. But revelations in respect to anybody else there are none.

Nevertheless, the book is full of interest. Military movements are divested of much of their enigmatical terminology and are made intelligible to the uninitiated. The chess-board of war becomes as easy to understand as simple addition. With the map turned back on the fly-leaf, and with the major as our cicerone, we can follow every move of the game. Hood is to the north; the Union bayonets are gleaming to the southward; Atlanta is flaming to the rear. We witness the defence of Altoona by Corse; we wind along the flexible line of Kilpatrick, now threatening Augusta, now dashing boldly, but alas too late, into the Union prison-hole at Millen; and we mark the straight black line of Logan, always firm to the right, and closing the first stage of its journey on the glacis of Fort McAllister. The campaign of the Carolinas is traced quite as vividly as that of Georgia.

We wish we had space to quote the description of the capture of Fort McAllister, but we will compound for the omission by an extract from the speech of an eccentric Georgian of quasi-Union tendencies, who seemed to take the destruction of his property as a dispensation of Divine Providence. He had been complaining of the cowardice of the original secessionists:

"It is these rich fellows who are making this war and keeping their precious bodies out of harm's way. There's John Franklin went through here the other day, running away from your army. I could have played dominoes on his coat-tails. There's my poor brother sick with small-pox at Macon, working for eleven dollars a month, and has n't got a cent of the d—d stuff for a year. 'Leven dollars a month and eleven thousand bullets a minute. I do n't believe in it, sir!"

It was not always that this universal devastation was so stoically viewed. We have a vivid and painful picture of women in tears, of old men broken down, stunned, almost foolish under this stroke of war, of houses, corn-stacks, wheat-fields, blazing along the route—the great inland army sweeping on as relentlessly and terribly as a fire on a Western prairie. Unavoidable, salutary; it is nevertheless sad. It was the plague—scoffed at by the stern feudal lord when it was afar off, and afflicting only the innocent and the lowly—now stalking through the palace doors and penetrating the loved chamber. Even to-day the effects are still felt, and the latest news from Columbia and other places in South Carolina is of stark misery and starvation; while the worst of all is that these people, cast down as they are, still have the adder sting; and, if Northern philanthropy should bring them aid, would take the gift and curse the giver. Of their helplessness the following bits of conversation are illustrative:

A highly cultivated lady said to me:

"It is terrible, sir! All my slaves have left me; my plantation is broken up. I do n't know but the land will be given to my slaves. I have no money, or but little. I shall have to starve or work!"

"Well, madam," I replied, "I really would n't advise you to starve. Supposing you do work?"

"But I never did such a thing in all my life!" she answered.

Mrs. ——, who had always passed her summer at the North, and had lived a life of perfect ease, found her income of $20,000 a year swept away at a single blow. With the most charming innocence she protested to me:

"I really fear, sir, that I shall have to submit to the disgrace of giving lessons in music."

I was rude enough to reply:

"Madam, I hope so."

Thus far we have only considered Major Nichols's matter, but there is much to say about his manner also. Style, remarks Buffon, is the man himself; we trust that the present work is an exception to this rule. We prefer, indeed, to take the great naturalist's dictum as implying only a coincidence between the emotions of the individual at a particular moment, and the language by which those emotions are made known. An irascible man, when provoked, makes use of violent phrases, yet it would be unfair to infer that his style is always violent. Now, in the work before us, we have an unpleasant impression of stilts. There is a dizzy elevation about it. One is in constant fear lest somebody should tumble. On the last page there is an engraving of an eagle with spread wings—and we cannot get over the idea that it has been flying through every page of the volume. Of course, high art requires the grand style, and the author had certainly a noble subject for his pen. Yet we confess to a wish that the flight had been a trifle closer earth. Its fault, however, is probably due less to the author than to his situation. He had not gotten over the effect of the campaign. The boom of cannon and the rattle of musketry were still in his ears. Thus his very sentences are photographic of the march. They have a dash of national music in them; but the instruments sometimes get dust-clogged. At one time they roll out as superbly as a cavalry charge, and again they are like a body of skirmishers entangled in a swamp.

A real military narrative of the march is still a desideratum. Major Nichols was, we believe, only an amateur, and joined General Sherman's staff more for his own convenience and comfort than for the purpose of soldiering. The working of the great design which underlay the march can only be described accurately by a professional hand.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

The Oil Regions of Pennsylvania. By William Wright.—Harper's Hand-book for Travellers in Europe and the East. Harper & Brothers, New York.

The Works of William Shakespeare. (Globe Edition). Edited by William George Clark and William Aldis Wright. Roberts Brothers, Boston.

Science.

DISCOVERIES AND INVENTIONS.

The character of wormwood bitters (liqueur d'absinthe) has been much debated and little examined. They have been pronounced now pernicious, now harmless, and again an active poison; and wormwood has had to bear the blame as if it were at fault. Dr. Deschamps, of Avallon, has analyzed many different samples of these bitters, which all agree in being destitute of wormwood except in name. The liquor consists of alcohol colored with the juice of spinach, nettles, etc. Indigo and turmeric are also at times employed as coloring agents, but are quite innocuous. The mischief-maker is, as ever, the alcohol, at whose door must be laid all the brutal excesses of the intoxicated. The drink is truly dangerous, and tempts so strongly to continued indulgence that moderation is almost impossible.

—Señor Alvaro Reynoso, of Havana, has devised two new and highly important processes in the manufacture of sugar. To clarify the juice of the cane, he treats it first with the acid phosphate of alum, which eliminates the more persistent and injurious substances, and afterwards with the acid phosphate of lime, which eliminates the useless. The water of the sugar is then removed by artificial congelation, without the risk of change which accompanies the attempt to volatilize it. Thoroughness and economy are claimed for this method, which would be still cheaper if practised in the beet-growing districts of Europe—notably in Germany, Poland, and Russia—where the natural severity of the winters would enable the sugar-manufacturers to dispense with machinery for producing cold. An experiment on a large scale is to be tried before a committee of the French Academy of Sciences.

—Every man his own gas-maker is likely to be a possibility in any apple-growing country. A discovery has been made in one of the French departments that the residuum of the cider press can be utilized by distillation. With only 200° (centigrade) of temperature a gas is produced that will burn without smoke or smell, and with a power of illumination superior to that of common gas, to make which from oil requires 1,000°. The cost of the former, meanwhile, is only one-fourth that of the latter, and the light coal which remains has also its uses and an appreciable value. The waste heat of our ordinary gas-works could be profitably put to the new distillation, but portable works have been contrived especially for this purpose, and can be owned by the most moderate establishments of town or country. There is evidently here a convenient source of mechanical power also.

—A superior writing ink, that flows easily from the pen, does not grow muddy in the inkstand, and does not clog the pen, is said to be made of pyrogallic acid and certain vegetable coloring matters.

—An experiment was made last month in the Champs Elysées with a post-chaise, to which were attached two horses, driven by a postilion. From a full trot the animals were put to their utmost speed, to represent runaways. Suddenly, as if before some obstacle or precipice, the reins being supposed to have parted, the horses were detached from the vehicle, which, by a simple contrivance managed by the person in the chaise, was turned to the right or left, or even back, with reversed motion, according to the fancied danger. The separation was accomplished instantaneously, and the subsequent movements of the carriage directed with perfect ease and certainty. The experiment was repeated several times with complete satisfaction. The mechanism is said to be applicable to any conveyance.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

VERMILYE & CO.,

BANKERS,

44 Wall Street, N. Y.,

GOVERNMENT LOAN AGENTS,

KEEP ON HAND, FOR

IMMEDIATE DELIVERY,

THE ISSUES OF

7.30 TREASURY NOTES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS.

We BUY and SELL all classes of GOVERNMENT SECURITIES at market rates.

ORDERS from BANKS and BANKERS executed on favorable terms, and with dispatch.

Also, receive DEPOSITS, and ALLOW INTEREST on current balances.

VERMILYE & CO.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,

56 WALL STREET,

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world.

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

OF NEW YORK.

Assets, July 1, 1865, over	$13,000,000
Cash Income, 1864, nearly	3,000,000

FREDERICK S. WINSTON, PRESIDENT.

Offices, 144 and 146 Broadway, cor. Liberty St.

Endowment Policies, Ten-year Policies, and Life Policies are issued by this Company on the most favorable terms.

ALL THE POLICIES OF THIS COMPANY PARTICIPATE IN THE SURPLUS, THE WHOLE OF WHICH IS DIVIDED ANNUALLY IN THE MOST EQUITABLE MANNER AMONG THE POLICY-HOLDERS.

Dividends of return premiums will be paid in CASH, or may be used if preferred in the form of additional insurance.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

FREDERICK S. WINSTON,	HENRY E. DAVIES,	ALEX. W. BRADFORD,
JOHN V. L. PRUYN,	OLIVER H. PALMER,	DAVID HOADLEY,
WILLIAM MOORE,	SAM'L E. SPROULLS,	HENRY A. SMYTHE,
ROBERT H. MCCURDY,	SAM'L M. CORNELL,	WILLIAM V. BRADY,
ISAAC GREEN PEARSON,	LUCIUS ROBINSON,	W. E. DODGE,
MARTIN BATES, JR.,	W. SMITH BROWN,	GEORGE S. COE,
WILLIAM BETTS,	RICHARD PATRICK,	WM. K. STRONG,
JOHN P. YELVERTON,	WILLIAM H. POPHAM,	WM. M. VERMILYE,
JOHN WADSWORTH,	WILLIAM A. HAINES,	JOHN E. DEVELIN,
ALFRED EDWARDS,	EZRA WHEELER,	WELLINGTON CLAPP,
NATHANIEL HAYDEN,	SEYMOUR L. HUSTED,	M. M. FREEMAN,
JOHN M. STUART,	SAMUEL D. BABCOCK,	ALONZO CHILD.

Secretaries, ISAAC ABBATT, THEO. W. MORRIS. Actuary, SHEPPARD HOMANS. Cashier, FRED. M. WINSTON.

Medical Examiners, MINTURN POST, M.D., ISAAC L. KIP, M.D.

Counsel, WILLIAM BETTS, LL.D., Hon. LUCIUS ROBINSON. Attorney, RICHARD A. McCURDY.

Applications and communications from persons in the undermentioned States to be through General Agents in their respective districts.

F. RATCHFORD STARR, General Agent at Philadelphia, for the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio. Delaware.

HALE REMINGTON, General Agent at Fall River, for the New England States.

H. B. MERRELL, General Agent at Detroit, Michigan, for the States of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota.

L. SPENCER GOBLE, General Agent at Newark, for the State of New Jersey.

J. A. RHODES, General Agent for New York and vicinity, office, 5 Wall Street.

H. S. HOMANS, General Agent at San Francisco, for California and Oregon.

AETNA INSURANCE COMPANY, OF HARTFORD,

INCORPORATED 1819. CHARTER PERPETUAL.

Paid up Capital,	$2,250,000 00
Assets, July 1, 1865,	3,850,351 78
Losses Paid in 45 Years,	$17,485,894 71

T. A. ALEXANDER, Pres't. L. J. HENDEE, Sec'y.
JONA. GOODWIN, Jr., A. Sec'y.

Insurance against loss and damage by Fire, and of Inland Navigation.

NEW YORK AGENCY, 62 WALL STREET.
JAS. A. ALEXANDER, AGENT.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL	$1,000,000 00
ASSETS	1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.
PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,

108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000
Surplus, over - - - - - - - - - - - - 400,000

This Company insures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND INLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

IF PREMIUMS ARE PAID IN GOLD, LOSSES WILL BE PAID IN GOLD.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
EDWARD A. STANSBURY, 2d Vice-President.
JOHN C. GOODRIDGE, Secretary.

ATLANTIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY,

51 WALL STREET, cor. of William, NEW YORK.

JANUARY, 1865.

Insures against Marine and Inland Navigation Risks.

The WHOLE PROFITS of the Company revert to the ASSURED, and are divided ANNUALLY, upon the Premiums terminated during the year; and for which Certificates are issued, BEARING INTEREST until redeemed.

The Dividend was 40 per cent. in each of the years 1863-4 and 5.

The Profits for 22 years amount to the sum of.....$19,691,020
Of which there has been redeemed by Cash..... 12,653,730

The Company has—

ASSETS, OVER ELEVEN MILLION DOLLARS,

VIZ.:

United States and State of New York Stock, City, Bank, and other Stocks.....$4,974,700
Loans secured by Stocks and otherwise.....2,187,950
Premium Notes and Bills Receivable, Real Estate, Bond and Mortgages, and other securities.....3,140,530
United States Gold Coin.....541,890
Cash in Bank.....288,430
$11,133,500

TRUSTEES.

John D. Jones, Charles Dennis, W. H. H. Moore, Henry Coit, Wm. C. Pickersgill, Lewis Curtis, Charles H. Russell, Lowell Holbrook, R. Warren Weston, Royal Phelps, Caleb Barstow, Daniel S. Miller, Joshua J. Henry, Geo. G. Hobson, David Lane, James Bryce, Wm. Sturgis, Henry K. Bogert, William E. Dodge, Dennis Perkins, Joseph Gaillard, Jr., J. Henry Burgy, A. P. Pillot, Cornelius Grinnell, C. A. Hand, Watts Sherman, B. J. Howland, Benj. Babcock, Fletcher Westray, Rob. B. Minturn, Jr., Gordon W. Burnham, Frederick Chauncey, James Low, Charles H. Marshall,

JOHN D. JONES, President.
CHARLES DENNIS, Vice-President.
W. H. H. MOORE, 2d Vice-Pres't.
J. H. CHAPMAN, Acting Secretary.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,

46 PINE STREET, NEW YORK,
BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

THE

MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY,

COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.

JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.

CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE
Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

B. C. MORRIS, President.
WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY,

OFFICE, 111 BROADWAY.

ASSETS, January 1, 1865, - - - - $1,140,628 89

DIVIDEND, Thirty-seven and One-half per cent.

This Company insures against MARINE and INLAND NAVIGATION risks on Cargo and Freight.

No Time Risks, or risks upon Hulls of Vessels, are taken.

The Profits of the Company, ascertained, from January 10, 1855, to January 1, 1864, for which certificates were issued, amount to..... $1,437,700 00
Additional profits from January 1, 1864, to January 1, 1865..... 324,385 73

Total Profits for ten years..... $1,762,085 73
The Certificates previous to 1862 have been redeemed by cash..... $1,065,960 00

NEW YORK, Feb. 10, 1865.

ALFRED EDWARDS, Pres.
WM. LECONEY, Vice-Pres.
THOMAS HALE, Secretary.

F. W. WORTH. LOOMIS L. WHITE. H. B. KEEN.

WORTH, WHITE & KEEN,

BANKERS,

47 WALL STREET,

(Offices formerly occupied by Messrs. W. C. Pickersgill & Co.)

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Orders executed in Gold, Railway Stocks, and Bonds, at the Stock Exchange.

Four per Cent. Interest allowed on all deposits.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.
JOSEPH W. WILDEY, Secretary.

E. W. CLARK & CO.,

BANKERS AND BROKERS,

35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS,

COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

BILLS ON LONDON

At Sixty Days' Sight and at Three Days' Sight, for sale by

WARD, CAMPBELL & CO.,
56 Wall Street, New York.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY, A.M.

WALL STREET has been in a whirl of panic and excitement throughout the week on account of frauds, forgeries, and failures in very unexpected quarters. On Monday it was made known that one of the gold brokers had failed to pay for about $130,000 out of $170,000 gold delivered to him the previous Saturday in good faith; his checks on the bank for the currency value of the gold being refused as not good. But this case, though one of the most flagrant breaches of trust and honesty which could have been well perpetrated—marked by deliberation and a cold calculation of the chances of successfully converting the property of other brokers—was lost sight of next day in the astonishment of the Street at the forgeries of young Ketchum and the stoppage of payments of his father's wealthy banking-house of Ketchum, Son & Co. The particulars have been amplified and sufficiently dwelt upon by the daily press; we are, therefore, content to record in brief the manner of the forgeries; the causes which induced them; the unworthy uses which they were designed to subserve, and the previous abstraction of good securities by the young man from the house of which he was a junior partner; and also the liabilities of the house to their depositors and correspondents the day they suddenly stopped payment.

The brokers keep their gold accounts with the Bank of New York, on a charge of $1,000 per annum on each account, for the receipt, safe keeping, and disbursement of the gold. Each dealer is furnished with a Gold Check Book, the checks having running numbers printed on each, so that no two or more books can bear the same numbers on their checks. Young Ketchum was a member of the Stock Exchange, but both the house of Ketchum, Son & Co. and himself, for his private account, did most of their business through another member of the Exchange, Mr. Charles Graham, who was regarded as the broker of Messrs. Ketchum, and had credit on nearly all his transactions, as acting for the account of the house. As it turns out, most of his enormous purchases and sales were under orders from young Ketchum, and are disavowed by the house, since their failure. Graham left town at the close of June for summer recreation, and his office was placed in charge of quite a young partner under direction of young Ketchum, by whose orders (and it is now discovered for whose separate account) nearly all the business during his absence would be conducted. Graham had no gold account with the Bank of New York, but young Ketchum opened one for him, receiving a gold check book with 500 checks, numbered 58,501 to 59,000 inclusive. The rule of the Gold Exchange requires that no check shall exceed $5,000. No deposit was made in Graham's name, but young Ketchum commenced the forgeries of the checks furnished from the bank in the names of some half a dozen other brokers who did keep accounts in the bank. To these checks, besides the names of the drawers, he also forged the certifications of the bank officers to make them "good" without presentation, and then borrowed money on them under pledge from the lenders that they should not be lent or otherwise used in the market, or presented for payment. The number of checks thus forged, at various times between the 27th June and 14th August, is ascertained to be 350 out of the 500. The number still in circulation or under hypothecation, not provided for, is 209. Assuming $5,000 for each check, the gross forgeries would be $1,750,000; the amount not provided for, $1,045,000, of which sum $595,000 falls upon two of the banks, $100,000 on an Exchange Place banking firm; in both without other collateral to mitigate the loss. The remainder is distributed among various money-lenders, mixed with other and genuine collateral.

Young Ketchum had lost heavily in speculations earlier in the season. He sold stocks heavily short at low prices, and they reacted upon him under the lead of equally wealthy and older and more experienced operators. He had sold gold short on the turn of the market in February and March, but failed to get in all his profits, the pro-Southern gold houses having failed. He then bought heavily of gold; changed his position in stocks; bought heavily for a rise, and it is said made good his deficiencies by abstracting the securities and drawing on the funds of his firm. This brought him into the months of July and August, when with all the power and machinery and the large credit of his father's name and house, he could neither force up the price of gold so as to cover its cost and the expense of carrying on the speculation, nor take the additional supplies thrown on the market from the Treasury office, without resort to large additional collaterals, which he could no longer venture to abstract from his own house, but which he could and did forge in the manner above described. Nor could he turn suddenly the large mass of railway stocks which he had bought up at high rates, and the sequel of this extraordinary career was explosion, flight, and the ruin of his father's house, with unpaid liabilities to the amount of three and a half millions!

The house of Ketchum, Son & Co. have made an assignment, and Mr. M. Ketchum a separate assignment, for the benefit of their creditors. It is supposed, at present, that the estate will pay 50 or 60 cents on the dollar to the depositors, most of whom are New England banks and bankers.

For some days after the foregoing events, the general money market was much disturbed by loss of confidence rather than scarcity of supply. But on Friday there was more willingness evinced by lenders to meet the market at 7 per cent. The railways were also much depressed by the heavy sales of Erie, Central, Reading, and Western shares forced on the market on Monday night and Tuesday, by way of closing out the large amount held by the brokers for young Ketchum or his broker, Mr. Graham. There was a subsequent recovery, but not to the points of the previous week. The Government stocks held a very steady course, and are now firm. The speculations which led to the Ketchum and other explosions were seldom directed to U. S. stocks, but rather to gold and the railways. The operators found, in the sequel, too much of both for the measure of their ability to command, in an honest way, the greenbacks to pay for them, and yet, with singular inconsistency with the facts of the case, a portion of the daily press assert that young Ketchum was the dupe, and the great house of his father the victim, of the Legal Tender Act!

The trade of the week has again been very active. The dry goods business, both in domestic and foreign fabrics, is brisk and remunerative. The July importations are found not to have been excessive in the total, nor in advance of the wants of the market. The amount of dry goods and general foreign merchandise marketed during the month was $19,674,662, gold value, before the duties were assessed, and on this the Government collected for customs duties $9,778,276 in gold. The August importation will probably exceed these figures, though not to a large difference. The customs of the present week will be about two millions; the exports of produce $3,300,000; the receipts of cotton 19,400 bales. There is scarcely any export of gold, though the sale of exchange for this day's steamers having advanced to 109¾ on London, we look for a partial resumption of gold shipments next week.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The U. S. 5-20's are 106⅛ to 106¼ per cent. for the original issue; the second issue 104⅛ to 104⅜; the 6's of 1881, 106⅜ to 107; the 7.30's (all the series) after declining to 98¾ on Tuesday's panic, are in large request, especially from small investers, and are up to 99¼. The certificates of indebtedness steady at 97⅛ to 97¾ per cent.

STATE SECURITIES.

Tennessees have advanced from 72½ to 74, and returned again to 72½ per cent. Missouris are selling at 70¼ to 70½ per cent.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The mortgages of the railways stood the panic comparatively well, though the market was dull, and no large sums could have been sold without a serious decline.

Erie shares from 86¼ last Saturday went down to 76½, and have since recovered to 82½ per cent. New York Central marks a decline from 92½ to 88½ and up to 91; Reading, 106½ to 98¾ and up to 102¾; Michigan Southern, 65⅝ to 60¾ and up to 62¾; Pittsburg, 70¾ to 64 and up to 66¾; North-west 28⅝ to 26 and up to 27½; North-west Preferred 62⅝ to 58½ and up to 61; Fort Wayne, 97¼ to 92½ and up to 94; Rock Island, 108¾ to 102 and up to 105½. The market still on the recovery at the close of the week.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

The bank stocks are generally lower, owing to the recent frauds. The Phœnix, Importers', and Fourth National have suffered most. Atlantic Mail ran down to 125 per cent., and recovered to 135. The shares of Canton, Cumberland, and Quicksilver fluctuated 2 per cent. on the panic, but are on the upward move again in common with the railways.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Gold fell to 140¾ per cent., but subsequently returned to 143½ on the firm appearance of exchange, which is now quoted at 109½ to 109¾ for gold.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW,
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL,

JOHN G. WHITTIER,
SAMUEL ELIOT (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford),
PROFESSOR TORREY (Harvard),
DR. FRANCIS LIEBER,
PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH (Oxford),
PROFESSOR CHILD (Harvard),
HENRY JAMES,
CHARLES E. NORTON,
JUDGE BOND (Baltimore),
EDMUND QUINCY,
PROFESSOR W. D. WHITNEY (Yale),
PROFESSOR D. C. GILMAN (Yale),
JUDGE DALY,
PROFESSOR DWIGHT (Columbia College),
PROFESSOR TAYLER LEWIS (Schenectady),
JUDGE WAYLAND,
FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED,
REV. DR. MCCLINTOCK,
REV. DR. JOS. P. THOMPSON,
REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS,
REV. DR. BELLOWS,
C. J. STILLÉ,
HENRY T. TUCKERMAN,
BAYARD TAYLOR,
C. A. BRISTED,
C. L. BRACE,
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON,
SYDNEY GEORGE FISHER,
THEODORE TILTON,
JAMES PARTON,
GAIL HAMILTON.

TERMS:—Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER,
130 Nassau street, N. Y.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

Celebrated Gold Medal

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,

AND

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL.

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,

1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of GIFFARD'S INJECTOR, For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!

Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees

IN EVERY STYLE,

MANUFACTURED BY

ROBERT PATON,

24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

Great Improvements in Sewing Machines.

EMPIRE SHUTTLE MACHINE!

Salesrooms, 536 Broadway, N. Y.,
250 Washington Street, Boston.

This Machine is constructed on entirely new principles of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements, having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION COMBINED.

It has a straight needle perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither RIP nor RAVEL, and is alike on both sides, performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nansook Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is

EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE!

AGENTS WANTED where none are established, to whom a liberal discount will be given.

T. J. MCARTHUR & CO.,
Manufacturers and Proprietors,
536 Broadway, N. Y.

Hudson River Institute

Affords the very best advantages for a Classical, Scientific, Commercial, and Musical education. French Conversation and Lewis's Gymnastics for Ladies, and Military Drill for Gentlemen daily, without extra charge. A new Gymnasium, costing $6,000. Eighteen Instructors. Term opens September 11.

REV. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Principal.

Claverack, Col. Co., N. Y.

T. C. SELLEW,

MANUFACTURER OF DESKS AND OFFICE FURNITURE,

107 FULTON ST., near NASSAU ST., N. Y.

LIBRARY AND SCHOOL FURNITURE MADE TO ORDER.

WHEELER & WILSON'S

LOCK-STITCH SEWING MACHINES,

625 BROADWAY.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

GREAT CENTRAL ROUTE

TO THE WEST AND NORTH-WEST.

MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILROAD,

BETWEEN DETROIT AND CHICAGO, 284 MILES,

is one of the connecting links in the direct and shortest line of rail communication between the Atlantic seaboard and the Mississippi and the Northwest, and, with its connections, forming a through route unequalled for speed, safety, and comfort.

WESTERN CONNECTIONS.

At CHICAGO (at the GREAT CENTRAL DEPOT, with the advantages of transfer of passengers and baggage within the same building) with the ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD, to all Central and Southern Illinois, Cairo, and lower Mississippi River points.

With the CHICAGO, BURLINGTON & QUINCY RAILROAD, to Galesburg, Burlington, and Quincy, and thence by the Burlington and Missouri Road to Southern Iowa, Council Bluffs, and Omaha City; and with the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, to St. Joseph, Leavenworth, Lawrence, Kansas City, etc.

Also, convenient connection with the CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN, the CHICAGO & ROCK ISLAND, and the ST. LOUIS, ALTON & CHICAGO RAILROADS.

Luxurious Sleeping Cars accompany each Night Train.

RUTTANS' PATENT VENTILATING AND ANTI-DUST ARRANGEMENT ON ALL DAY TRAINS.

OFFICERS:

J. W. BROOKS, President, Boston.
R. N. RICE, General Superintendent, Detroit.
C. H. HURD, Assistant Superintendent, "
H. E. SARGEANT, General Agent, Chicago.
THOS. FRAZER, General Ticket Agent, Detroit.
H. C. WENTWORTH, General Western Passenger Agent, Chicago.

☞ Freight Contracts, Bills of Lading, and information furnished at the offices of the Company in the following places:

NEW YORK—Office 173 Broadway, C. E. Noble, Agent.
BOSTON—Office 21 State Street, P. K. Randall, Agent.
BUFFALO—Office Western opposite Mansion House, J. D. Hayes, Agent.
ST. LOUIS—Office 11 City Building, Commercial Street, James Smith, Agent.

EDDY'S

KEROSENE COOKING AND HEATING

Stoves and Ranges.

These Cooking Stoves will Bake, Boil, Stew, and Roast with the greatest economy and facility, and without heating the room in which they are used. They are perfectly simple, operating like an ordinary Kerosene Lamp with a chimney, and are the only Kerosene Stoves that burn without smoke or odor.

"We have been prfectly astonished to see what a labor-saving, dirt-saving, and heat-saving institution is EDDY'S PATENT KEROSENE STOVE. Taking the cost of running it, and the result attained, it is the best patent in the market."—Worcester Daily Spy.

Our Heating and Cooking Stoves are very convenient and economical, especially where a fire is required but a few hours at a time.

Orders for Stoves may be sent through American Advertising Agency, 389 Broadway, New York.

LESLEY & ELLIOT, MANUFACTURERS,
494 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Send for Illustrated Circular.

THE HOWE SEWING MACHINE CO.

ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,

629 BROADWAY.

GARDEN & CEMETERY ADORNMENTS.

FOUNTAINS, VASES, ETC., ETC.

SUMMER HOUSES,

ARBORS, CHAIRS, SETTEES, ETC.

Wire Trellises and Arches

FOR VINES, FLOWERS, ETC.

IRON FURNITURE,

Bedsteads of every description

For Dwellings, Public Institutions, Hospitals, Prisons, etc.

Patent Spring Beds, Mattresses, etc.

STABLE FIXTURES,

Hay Racks, Mangers, Stall Divisions, etc.

IRON RAILING,

For enclosing Cemetery Plots, Offices, Dwellings, Public Squares, etc.

Having purchased the business of the New York Wire Railing Company, HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM late Agents, we are now the exclusive Owners and Manufacturers of

Patent Wire Railing & Farm Fencing, Window Guards, etc.,

And we offer to the public the largest variety of ORNAMENTAL IRON GOODS to be found in the United States.

Particular attention given to Export trade.

CHASE & CO.,

Warerooms 524 Broadway,

OPPOSITE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, NEW YORK.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,

Importers and Dealers in

TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;

Manufacturers of

COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,

19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

DECKER BROTHERS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PIANO-FORTES.

FACTORY AND WAREROOMS,

91 BLEECKER STREET,

(MARBLE BUILDING,)

One block west from Broadway,

NEW YORK.

MARVIN'S

PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.

Superior to any others in the following particulars:
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by

MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.

Send for a descriptive Circular.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
123 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

DEMULCENT SOAP,

FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,

FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.

MANUFACTURED ONLY BY

J. C. HULL'S SON,

32 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Benedict's Time,

171 BROADWAY, COR. CORTLANDT ST., NEW YORK.

TO SOLDIERS.

AMERICAN (WALTHAM) WATCHES.

Let every soldier, before he returns home, provide himself with an AMERICAN WATCH; no better use can be made of money than to invest it in one of these durable and accurate time-pieces. It is a kind of property that constantly returns good interest, and its money value is so well-known that a pocket full of silver dollars wouldn't be as useful.

For sale and warranted by
BENEDICT BROTHERS, Jewelers,
Keepers of the City Time, and Agents for the sale of the American (Waltham) Watches,
171 Broadway, cor. Cortlandt St.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,

STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,

45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS,

AND

BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

STATIONERY.

TO STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS, AND NOTION DEALERS.—The undersigned, being the oldest envelope manufacturers in this country, and having the amplest facilities, are always ready to supply, by the thousand or by the million, envelopes of every variety of size, pattern, and color, at the lowest prices.

Samples furnished when called for.

WM. P. LYON & WHITTEMORE,
537 Pearl St., New York.

W. H. Schieffelin & Co.,

SUCCESSORS TO

SCHIEFFELIN BROTHERS & CO.,

Importers and Jobbers of

DRUGS,

Indigo, Corks, Sponges,

FANCY GOODS, PERFUMERY, ETC., ETC.,
170 and 172 William Street, N. Y.

CARTER, KIRTLAND & CO.,

Manufacturers and Jobbers of

CLOTHING,

340 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK,

OFFER TO FIRST-CLASS BUYERS A LARGE AND VERY COMPLETE STOCK OF

FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING

OF ALL GRADES,

EMBRACING FINE, MEDIUM, AND LOW-PRICED GOODS.

Having made extensive purchases at a time when all were sellers and very few were buyers, we are in a position to supply our customers upon the most favorable and advantageous terms.

Jobbers, Merchant Tailors, and Dealers generally will find it to their advantage to call and examine our stock before purchasing.

Particular attention paid to the execution of orders.

SAM'L CARTER, WM. H. KIRTLAND,
JOHN ROSE, CHAS. B. PEET,
JOHN H. WERTS, Special.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.
New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by
JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

FINKLE & LYON'S

IMPROVED

LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

Economical Housekeepers Use

PYLE'S SALERATUS. | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.

Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

Archer & Pancoast,

9, 11, 13, 15, AND 17 MERCER STREET, NEW YORK,

Manufacturers of Gas and Coal Oil Fixtures, Chandeliers, Pendants, Brackets, Lamps, etc., etc., for home trade or exportation, as also the Patent Convex and other Lanterns for burning coal oil without a chimney.

Dealers are respectfully invited to examine our goods. Warerooms and Manufactory, 9, 11, 13, 15, and 17 Mercer Street, New York.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.

ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.

"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.
"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.
"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.
"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.

Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.

WM. B. BRADBURY,
425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 9. THURSDAY, AUGUST 31, 1865. $3 PER ANNUM.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 257
The Latest Phase of Conservatism 261
Governor Perry at Washington 262
Something New from the Stump 263
Coolie Labor at the South 264
Personal Controversy 265
Traitors and Treason 265
CORRESPONDENCE:
Classical Education 267
The South as It Is 268
England. — Infanticide amongst the Poor 270
Out-of-Town Summer Life 271
The Competitive Element in Education 272
New York State Inebriate Asylum 273
Pre-Raphaelitism 273
LITERATURE:
Literary Notes 276
Mill on Hamilton 278
De Tocqueville on the French Revolution 281
Affixes to English Words 283
FINANCIAL REVIEW 286

Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

THE chief sensation of the week has been disaster by land and flood. On Monday, the 21st, a train on the Chicago and North-western Railway ran at night into a culvert washed away by a storm. On Tuesday, a train was thrown from the track of the Shore Line Railroad, Connecticut, by running over a cow. On Wednesday, there was an accident on the Oil Creek Road, Pennsylvania, and another on the Old Colony Road, Massachusetts—the results of culpable carelessness and misconduct. On Friday, a train on the Alabama and Tennessee Railroad ran off the trestle-work of a bridge. All these involved the destruction of at least twenty persons, and the maiming of more than a hundred others. A collision on the Chesapeake drowns one person and injures two, while an explosion on the Ohio causes the death of twelve and the scalding of eight. Lastly, we hear of the total loss of the steamer Brother Jonathan, on the Pacific coast, on the 30th of last month, in which but seventeen lives were saved out of two or three hundred. Among those who went down were Brig.-Gen. Wright and his family. He was on his way to Fort Vancouver, to take command of the Department of the Columbia.

AN important organization was effected in this city on Friday. Representatives of the principal Freedmen's Associations, East and West, met together and formed the "American Freedmen's Commission," with the following list of officers: Bishop Simpson, President; Wm. Lloyd Garrison and John V. Farwell, Vice-Presidents; Fred. Law Olmsted, General Secretary; Jacob R. Shipherd, Associate Secretary; and George C. Ward, Treasurer; which officers, with J. Miller McKim and J. M. Walden, Corresponding Secretaries of the Eastern and Western Departments, will constitute the Board of Managers. Other prominent and representative names embraced in this new Association are Francis George Shaw and Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, of this city; Stephen Colwell and Francis R. Cope, of Philadelphia; Judge Bond and Archibald Stirling, Jr., of Baltimore; C. G. Hussey and Dr. Howard, of Pittsburg; Adam Poe and Abraham M. Taylor, of Cincinnati; Dr. Newberry, of Cleveland; Dr. Patterson, of Chicago; Dr. Duffield, of Detroit; Calvert Fletcher and Robert Morrison, of Indiana; James E. Yeatman and Dr. Elliott, of St. Louis; Judge Russell and Rev. John Parkman, of Boston; John G. Whittier, of Amesbury; Postmaster Bowen, of Washington, etc., etc. This Commission completes the unity, so long desired, of the various philanthropic combinations which, under whatever name, have the welfare of the freedmen at heart. It will work in harmonious co-operation with the Bureau at Washington, to which it will bring no small measure of strength and public support. It is another guaranty that the revolution of to-day shall go forward and not backward, nor cease till the rights of man are acknowledged in every citizen of this Republic.

THE Mississippi Convention finished its business and adjourned on Thursday the 24th. It declared the ordinance of secession null and void. It prohibited, by a constitutional amendment, the revival of slavery, by a vote of 86 to 11. It ratified the proceedings of the courts, the sales of administrators, and all marriages since January, 1861. It fixed upon the first Monday in October as the day for the State and Congressional elections. Judge E. S. Fisher was nominated for Governor. The delegates, in their unofficial capacity, drew up a memorial to the President asking for the pardon of the two State offenders, Jefferson Davis and Governor Clark. The convention received a telegraphic dispatch from the President through Governor Sharkey, congratulating them upon their action, and the prospects of Mississippi's readmission into the Union, and promising the restoration of the habeas corpus and the removal of the troops as soon as practicable.

A CORRESPONDENT calls our attention to the fact that a petition was presented to the Senate in February of this year, by Senator Morgan of this State, praying for the passage by Congress of a "General Election Law" regulating the suffrage in all the States, in the manner indicated by "T. F." in the last number of THE NATION, and in virtue of the power claimed by him under the Constitution for the national legislature.

THE Kentucky Court of Appeals have reversed a decision of the Louisville Chancery Court, by which the appellant was required to accept Treasury notes in discharge of his contract for money. Judge Williams dissented, but the majority held the act of Congress of Feb. 25, 1862, to be unconstitutional in so far as it made these notes "lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, in the United States." Judge Robertson summed up his conclusions in two propositions: that the people, on adopting the national Constitution, emphatically and aforethought "established gold and silver coin as the money, and the only legal money, of the United States;" and that, to secure this deliberate object, "they determined that no legislation, State or national, should ever make anything else a legal tender for money, demandable on any contract made between citizens under the sanction of State laws." He added, as a necessary corollary, "that all power not expressly delegated over money is constructively forbidden," and that, therefore, "there can be no implied power to make Treasury notes a legal tender in private contracts."

THE trial of Wirtz, which was commenced on Monday the 21st, then suddenly interrupted, and resumed on Wednesday, promises to drag its slow length along like the Assassination trial, which it will probably resemble, in evoking a great deal of testimony more pertinent to the general character of the rebellion than to the charges against the prisoner. Wirtz is beyond question a villain, but then a regard for decency ought to restrain people from pelting him with rotten eggs as he sits in the pillory. The following delectable morsel is from a correspondent of the Boston Advertiser:—

"Yet the central figure in the room is, after all, this Swiss-American, Henry Wirtz, whom God probably made, and yet whom no man thinks of as brother. Is there family relationship among fiends? Let us be thankful that this one can claim neither American birth nor education; let us mourn that our sister republic of Switzerland must own his parentage. Wirtz came in with a quick step and a slightly embarrassed manner. He is about five feet eight in height, and of about 135 pounds weight. He wears a black coat, dark vest, dark brown pants, with reddish tinge, and white shirt. His appearance is slovenly, and he is round-shouldered and stooping. His head is high over the ears, wanting in the rear, and deficient in the upper forehead. His hair is dark brown, and he begins to be bald in front. He has full whiskers and moustache, cut to about half an inch in length. He is thin of face, dark of skin, bloodless of lips, dark and very keen of eye. His nose is thin and sharp, his mouth straight and inelegant. There isn't much of the original villain in his appearance, though he looks like a man utterly without conscience, and ready to do, for a consideration, almost any infernal deed set for him by a superior."

The expression of doubt as to God's having made Wirtz is doubtless intended to be a crusher for Wirtz, but it is in reality not so hard upon anybody as on the person who utters it. And we should like to know from this acute observer how he tells, by a man's looks, that he would not do "an infernal deed for a superior" without a consideration, or that he would not do it with a consideration for an inferior or an equal. This stuff, too, is called a "pen picture."

The war between the New York daily papers on the subject of the City census still rages with unwonted violence. The census just taken makes the population only a little smaller than in 1860, when taken by that model of democratic virtue, "Captain Rynders." The Republicans say that he cheated; the Democrats say he did not, and that it is Chauncey Depew, the present Secretary of State, who is now cheating. The probabilities are that a part of the apparently slow growth of population in the last five years is due to the tenderness of Rynders for the Democratic majorities, which the city always gives; and part to the real and steady exodus to the country which has long been going on. The fact is, and there is no denying it, that taxation and bad government have begun to tell in New York already. If no reform take place, there is nothing so very improbable in the supposition that the next ten years may witness a gradual transfer of business to some better regulated port further South. If the municipal net could be thrown over all the people who live elsewhere, and do business here, the local burdens would be considerably lightened, but then the "citizens" who might be caught in this way would only fly further off.

There was substantial agreement between the resolutions passed at Harrisburg by the Pennsylvania Democratic Convention, on Thursday last, and those of the Ohio Democratic Convention on the same day at Columbus. Both affirmed, as a logical deduction from the nullity of secession ordinances, that the late rebellious States are fast in the Union, and have all the rights which formerly belonged to them. Negro suffrage was equally condemned—at Harrisburg as "a high crime against the Constitution, and a deliberate and wicked attempt to degrade the white race to the level of the black." Here, also, negro equality was pronounced a "curse." For the rest, there were the usual charges of the war, and the debt, and illegal, unconstitutional procedure, and the usual harping on habeas corpus suspended and military trials established; and, after all, an effort to tack the party to the skirts of the President. Col. W. H. H. Davis was the Pennsylvania nominee for auditor-general; Gen. Geo. W. Morgan, the Ohio nominee for governor.

Mr. Maretzek has written a "second letter" to the editor of the Herald. We have not seen the first, and we suppose the recipient would wish he had seen neither. The present epistle is in answer to a threat on the part of the Herald to withdraw its "subvention" from the coming opera. The lively manager hastens to return thanks and estimate his losses. He reckons that the Herald's private proscenium box, and ten reserved seats of the very best, and extra seats and admissions, if paid for, would amount in a single season to $3,200; that the advertising and printing, done at double the usual rates at the Herald establishment, cost $7,500; and that black-mail to reporters, etc., borrowed and unreturned wardrobes, compulsory employment of useless persons, extra advertisements in the Play Bill, etc., take $3,000 more from the manager's pockets. Other features of the "subvention" are various interferences of the Herald with the affairs of the opera, even to dictating what artists shall be engaged, and what plays performed. So that altogether the threatened withdrawal will save Mr. Maretzek some $20,000, or more than the entire rent of the Academy of Music. No doubt this exposé is as truthful as it is scathing; yet while quite ready to regard the Herald as the chief sinner in this business, the skirts of the rest of the daily press are by no means clear, and it is not too much to say that the system of reciprocal favors which now exists makes genuine theatrical criticism impossible among those to whom the public looks for it.

The trial of Charles J. Colchester, a so-called spiritual medium, at Buffalo, terminated on the 23d in a verdict of guilty. He was prosecuted for neglecting to take out a license under the internal revenue law as a juggler, which he refused to do, on the ground that his spirit performances were not juggling. The testimony was neither so interesting nor so conclusive, one way or the other, as might have been expected. There were damaging charges of deception and fraud against the defendant, but the attempts to explain and counterfeit in open court his most remarkable feats—such as the blood-red writing on the arm—were failures. What Colchester did instantaneously could not be produced by the competing "magician" under several minutes, nor would the latter undertake to cross-write at all. It is to be regretted that the defendant was not permitted or called upon to show, if he could, the distinction between the two operations, in which the whole question of supernaturalism is involved; just as, that a table should be moved is no extraordinary matter, unless we see it stirring suo motu to all appearance. The counsel of Mr. Colchester applied for time to present certain points of law. Judge Edmonds, the well-known spiritualist, has expressed, in a published letter, his distrust of Colchester's integrity, and condemns his practice of earning money by his manifestations.

The name of Major George Ward Nichols was badly misprinted in our notice of his book, "The Story of the Great March," last week.

One of the trustees of the colored schools in Washington is said to have demanded of the Mayor the portion of the school fund assigned by act of Congress to the education of the colored people of the District. Of course the money was not forthcoming. Campbell Hospital, one of the finest in the city, has been taken possession of by the Freedmen's Bureau. It will accommodate a large number of freedmen, and will prevent much suffering during the coming winter. The Government buildings at Vienna, and the Seminary hospital at Fairfax, Virginia, have been appropriated as centres for freedmen's villages. The approach of winter is regarded with great apprehension by the residents of Prince George County, which was widely devastated by our army. Captain Flagg, superintendent of the First District of Virginia, has received an application from fourteen hundred colored families who wish to purchase with ready money a tract of arable land in Virginia to dwell upon and cultivate. They prefer, for complete security, to make their purchase of the Government or through its agency. It would be pleasant to believe that the pro-slavery spirit in North Carolina is not so black as it is painted, and sometimes there seems to be a set purpose to decry, as during the rebellion there was to extol, the loyalty of the State. Be that as it may, the record is dark without relief. Fayetteville is now most prominent for its hostility to the freed people and their cause. Colored men have been tied up and publicly whipped by the sheriff, at the direction of a magistrate, and the citizens appear to have been exercising the usual prerogatives of slaveholders, including murder. It is needless to add that all this was consequent upon the withdrawal of the military. The mayor of the city has endeavored to deny the truth of these reports, but he makes a liberal exception for "practices of necessary control and discipline." There is no doubt that as one approaches the South Carolina border, the treatment of the blacks grows worse, and that their condition as yet differs little from slavery. Instances occur of a continuance of the old régime by individual slaveholders, far enough removed from the military authorities to preserve by main force their patriarchal system.

Others dismiss their hands unpaid as soon as the crops are secured. Gen. Saxton has issued a lengthy order on the subject of marriage among the freedmen. Some of the complications which slavery creates are revealed by such instructions as the following: If a man, without a wife, finds two wives restored to him by freedom, he shall, other things being equal, prefer the one by whom he has had children. A man living with a wife without issue may, with her consent, leave her for a previous wife by whom he has had children who are still minors, provided she has no other husband known to be living. In many parts of Georgia, particularly around Atlanta, the contract system is adopted very indefinitely, or violence is resorted to to maintain the status quo ante bellum. The planters are even said to be organizing for this purpose. Gen. Wild had ordered Mrs. Robert Toombs to vacate her premises in Washington, Georgia, in order to its occupation by the Freedmen's Bureau, but the order was countermanded by Gen. Steadman. General Swayne, assistant commissioner in Alabama, is making the judicial officers under the provisional government his legally constituted agents to assist in the care of the freedmen. Governor Parsons is said to be co-operating personally and by circulars of instruction. Gen. Fisk is on a tour of inspection in his department, in pursuance of orders from Washington. Captain Sweeney, superintendent of the district of Eastern Arkansas, reports that during the month of July rations were drawn only by orphans, the sick in hospital, and the employees of the Bureau. Great numbers of refugees are returning to their homes, and the citizens are reconciling themselves to the new order of things, and making contracts with their former slaves. We cannot better conclude this summary than by quoting entire the letter of a Louisiana planter to the Freedmen's Aid Association of New Orleans, dated Iberville Parish, Aug. 1:

"Gentlemen: I am a planter of twelve years' experience; this year I am working twelve hands, six men and six women; my laborers are to get one fourth of the net proceeds of the crops. They have a full understanding of their interest in the said crops. Our contract was made on the 1st of February last, and the result so far is a complete success; we have, to-day, 85 arpents of cotton; 25 arpents of sugar canes; 75 arpents of corn, all in perfect condition. I don't mention the vegetable crops. Under the old system ten arpents to the hand was considered a fair result, and more than three-fourths of the plantations failed to come to that standard.

"My laborers are all good people, behaving well, having good common sense; they are honest and true to their families. Besides the crop in common, they have raised for their private account small crops of corn and vegetables, and have poultry, etc., of their own. Not a single difficulty has occurred among them since they have agreed to work on my farm."

Gen. Banks returns to private life, along with six other Major-Generals of Volunteers and a host of Brevet Major-Generals, more or less distinguished, according to an order of the Secretary of War on Thursday last, which musters them out of the service.

It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. The Lynchburg Republican, taking alarm at the colored conventions in Virginia and elsewhere, pronounces all similar organizations to effect a radical change in the present political or social status of the blacks to be "fraught with the most dangerous consequences" to them. The argument which it employs could easily be turned to the disfranchisement of the chivalry, by a simple substitution:

"There can be but one dominant race under any government; and when that is in doubt, the force of arms invariably decides the issue, and proclaims the stronger party. It is clearly, therefore, the part of wisdom for our colored population to be satisfied with their present status, and to make the most of their newly acquired advantages, instead of reaching after impossible results. For just so certain as they undertake to form a distinctive power in the State, just so certain will they be overwhelmed in disaster and ruin."

The negroes have no wish "to form a distinctive power in the State," as they will be compelled to do if divorced at the polls from their loyal white fellow-citizens. The bestowal of suffrage would take away the necessity of combinations according to color and race, by making the test of parties irrespective of these accidents. But the Republican expresses frankly the prevailing notion of the Southern mind in regard to the meaning of emancipation—one class uppermost and "dominant" as before, the other submissive and subordinate. This relation may not be denominated slavery, but it is evidently not the same as liberty.

A correspondent of the London Times, writing from Saratoga, happened to allude to the incredible and infamous treatment which Northern captured soldiers received in Southern prisons. Whereupon, Arthur Freemantle, Lieutenant-Colonel, and Captain Coldstream Guards, writes to that paper to deny the fact and especially to shield Mr. Davis from implication in it. His merits as a witness may be summed up in his statement that he travelled through the entire Southern States at the height of the war and never saw any inhuman treatment of Northern captives. He cites the evidence of the Times' correspondent in Richmond concerning the charges against the Libby. He heard General Lee regret, after Gettysburg, the necessity of marching several thousand Federal prisoners back to the rebel capital, because no exchange could be effected. Mr. Davis, too, would have been glad to strike a balance at any time between the prisoners held by the two contending parties, but it is notorious that all objections to exchange prisoners came from the North, not from the South. The public have just been enlightened anew on this whole subject by a letter from Gen. Hitchcock, who shows that the first disturbance of the regularity of exchange was caused by Davis himself, when, in a message to the rebel Congress, he informed that body that Union officers who might be captured while serving with colored troops should be delivered over to the State authorities, to be dealt with under State laws as if guilty of exciting servile insurrection. The colored soldiers themselves were to be disposed of in the same way, and in nowise to be considered in the category of prisoners to be exchanged. President Lincoln at once provided for the safety of the officers thus exposed by holding certain Confederates in our hands as hostages. Then the cartel began to be violated by the Confederate government. At the same time, and most conspicuously at Gettysburg, the practice was inaugurated of making prisoners of Northern citizens, and refusing to release them unless the United States would agree to make no arrests because of opinions favorable to the rebel cause, or avowed sympathy with it. This preposterous demand of course could not be tolerated, however Lee might grieve at being burdened with the inoffensive inhabitants of Pennsylvania; yet it was persisted in to the close of hostilities. This is the whole story; and there can be no doubt that the atrocious cruelty which began to be indulged from the summer of 1863 in Southern prisons and stockades was a deliberate measure for compelling submission to simply impossible terms. Gen. Hitchcock certifies to the exertions of Secretary Stanton to relieve the suffering of the victims, and to the barbarous bad faith of the Southern authorities on receiving supplies from the Federal Government for distribution. Capt. Freemantle thinks there may have been hardships at Andersonville, but attributes them to the poverty and insufficient means of the Confederacy. The excuse is a false one, but it does not explain the waste and peculation of Northern bounty before the very eyes of those for whom it was intended. Nor is truth to be impeached by styling well-authenticated pictures "disgusting sensational photographs—a novel and horrid manner of raising public feeling against the South."

The utility of the Freedmen's Courts is already apparent. They show which party to the contracts now making is least to be trusted. For example, in Tennessee a citizen of Giles County, named Abernethy, refused to pay his colored laborers the wages agreed upon. Two of them went before the court and took oath to this breach of faith. Abernethy was summoned straightway to General Fisk. He was told that two fellow-citizens and neighbors of his had appeared against him, and was not a little chagrined on learning that they were, as he styled them, his "niggahs." Being corrected on the point of ownership, and reminded, moreover, that one of the complainants was probably his own son, the old gentleman surrendered, and promised to discharge his debt next day; which he did, and then entered into a written contract with his employees. In this and numerous similar instances, no redress could have been had in any State court under the existing State laws.

A military commission, ordered at Salisbury, North Carolina, by Gen. Schofield, has half a dozen murder cases to dispose of. Five of these are the deliberate shooting of negroes by white men. The sixth, which was first on the docket, and has been tried, was also a case of shooting, but the victim was a colored woman, Galina, and the murderer the daughter of her former mistress. Temperance Neely is the name of the person who could not restrain herself from committing this bloody act. The facts as elicited beyond dispute are these: Galina was rescuing her child from punishment at the hands of Mrs. Providence Neely, and had pushed her late mistress down in the act. "Miss Tempe," who had warned her not to enter the house, being disregarded, shot her in the breast deliberately as she came out. Sentence has not yet been passed upon the guilty woman.

We commend to General Cox the action of the colored people who were settled, after the rebels burnt Hampton, Virginia, on the abandoned and confiscated lots within the town, and the farms of Messrs. Sinclair and Shields near by, also deserted, and also appropriated by Government—together amounting to 1,000 acres. These colonists have just taken a census of themselves. They consist of 800 families, or 4,500 souls; 587 can read and write, and 915 are church members. They estimate their own (not the Government's) property at $51,000, and of their wealthy men two are worth $4,000 each, one $2,000, one $1,500, and nine more than $500 and less than $1,500. About a fourth of the population is in the town, and the chief pursuit is agriculture. They have built five churches since the rebellion, and pay their pastors a salary of $1,050. They have a general store of their own in Hampton, stocked by themselves, and an association for the benefit of the colored people. They boast that the farms of Sinclair and Shields will yield this year both richer and larger crops than when under the best slave cultivation. They are now annoyed by the former proprietors, who threaten to dispossess them, and are endeavoring to undo the workings of the Confiscation Act. This the colored people are by no means disposed to submit to. They have resolved in open meeting that they will not leave their "happy homes unless compelled to do so by legal authority;" that they will lease or purchase their lands of the United States; that they will resist the claims of Sinclair and Shields before the highest tribunal. Accordingly, they have employed Mr. Calvin Pepper, of Norfolk, to act as their attorney, and if justice depends for its execution upon the longest purse, we imagine this thrifty community will carry the day against their disloyal adversaries. That they refuse to budge is the point to be heeded by the Ohio candidate for governor.

The yearning for immigration to people and restore the waste places is already visible at the South, along with the first ripples of the flood that is sure to set in ere long. Governor Brownlow has prepared a circular of invitation, in which the resources of Tennessee as an agricultural and mineral State are enumerated. Eastern Maryland points to her "geographical position, salubrious climate, fertile soil, and navigable streams." Virginia delights in the arrival of a company of some sixty Swedes, direct from their native land. Their destination is the upper James River, where there is a thriving colony of their countrymen, by whose representations they were induced to come out to this country. A movement is on foot to plant a Polish colony in the same State.

We publish in this number a rather lengthy review of Mills' book on Sir William Hamilton's philosophy, though not lengthier than the subject demands. We advise all readers who dislike "thinking" to save themselves the trouble of writing to us to complain of its "dryness," by skipping it. For the existence and importance of the science of metaphysics, the constitution of man, and not The Nation, is to blame. The happy time which so many seem to long for has, fortunately or unfortunately, not yet arrived, when the great problems of the universe will be solved by merely turning a crank, and men and women will be able to devote themselves without stint to the perusal of "tales and sketches and anecdotes." Until that period, some will have to pass over the disagreeable duty of diving into the difficulties of metaphysics, which, as Mr. Mill remarks, "lie at the root of all science."

Every year at this season the newspapers are half filled with long letters from the various "summer resorts," giving an account of the way people pass the day at these places. The perseverance with which this sort of writing is kept up is sometimes remarkable, considering that any paper might, by changing the dates, furnish the very same amount of appropriate matter by going back to last year's files. The eating, drinking, and dressing, and lounging at Sharon, Newport, and Saratoga are just the same as they were last summer. The same scenes recur in the parlors and dining-rooms; the men plunge and the women bob up and down in the surf in precisely the same fashion; and the journey to these places is performed in much the same way. An account of a "Walk Down Broadway," or a "Ride to Harlem in an Third Avenue Car," would be novel and interesting compared to most of the gossip from the watering places and mountains to which we are treated every day.

The committee presided over by the French Empress has reported at considerable length the results of its enquiries into the condition of the juvenile prisoners of the department of the Seine. The report gives a very full history of the legislation which preceded the law of August 5, 1850, and by which there had come to be a separation in confinement of the youthful and the more advanced and hardened offenders. In 1837 the American system of cell-imprisonment had obtained such influence, owing largely to the observations of De Tocqueville in this country, that it was extended even to the inmates of La Roquette—the children's penitentiary. The committee first charge the managers of this institution with not carrying out the provisions of the law of 1850, which enjoined some departure from the system of cells, and then devote themselves to a comparison of La Roquette with the various agricultural colonies—what we should call farm-schools—introduced into France by M. Demetz in 1839. The first and most distinguished of these is that at Mettray, a village not far from Tours. The statistics prove the immense superiority of these establishments, under equal disadvantages as regards the original character of their subjects, over the prison of La Roquette and the solitary confinement there enforced. Health, morals, and education in books and the callings of life are more rapidly and surely promoted in the sunshine of the country than within the gloomy walls of a city prison. The decisive test of the merits of the rival systems is the proportion of those who lapse into vicious ways when released from restraint. In some triennial periods the percentage of those who fell a second time was from La Roquette at least twice that of those from Mettray—in one instance four times as great. The gratifying fact is elicited that whereas the new-comers at the farm-schools generally prefer to learn other occupations rather than agriculture, they at last are disposed to give it the preference, and there is no difficulty in finding them homes and situations throughout the country. The boys at Mettray behaved so gallantly at the inundation of the Loire, in 1856, as to cause the city of Tours to strike a gold medal in recognition of their humane services. Massachusetts has initiated the experiment of putting young offenders on board a school-ship, where they are educated as if on land, while at the same time they are qualified to make competent and trustworthy seamen. Some of the graduates of this novel penitentiary distinguished themselves in the naval engagements of the late war.

A reminder of the primary signification of the "Tuileries" (tileries) is contained in a late discovery in the Place du Carrousel at Paris. In digging a ditch for a new edifice, the mattocks of the laborers grazed a brick structure, which proved on examination to be a kiln of the famous Bernard Palissy. An antiquarian who was present immediately connected it with a work which the great potter had undertaken for Catharine de' Medicis about the year 1570. Curiously enough, a letter of his to the queen-mother, offering to construct and decorate a grotto in the gardens which then occupied the place, was brought to light and published only four years ago. The designs which he set forth in it are confirmed almost to the least detail by the remains of moulds for statues, plants, shells, and much fantastic pottery, which have been found in the kiln thus proved to have been erected near the scene of his device.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE LATEST PHASE OF CONSERVATISM.

IT is profitable to observe how the forces of conservatism, rallying after the signal failure of their efforts to defend and perpetuate the institution of slavery, are marshalling their strength for the characteristic attempt to prevent the enlightenment, elevation, and enfranchisement of the negro race.

Viewed in the interest of humanity, our recent conservatism does not present a very praiseworthy record. Its influence, political and religious, has been mainly devoted to the defence of slavery. Learned divines have combined with unscrupulous demagogues to discourage all discussion of the principles involved in the enforced bondage of a race of human beings, and to denounce every effort to mitigate the atrocities of the inhuman system. To attack slavery on any grounds, moral or political, was to be promptly classed with the advocates of women's rights, wearers of the Bloomer costume, disciples of the school of free-love, disbelievers in capital punishment, spiritualists, communists, and supporters of every extreme "ism" and "ology" then recognized as having any adherents in this country. No efforts were spared to debauch the moral sentiment of the nation. A bishop of a Northern diocese of the Protestant Episcopal Church vied with a reverend president of a Northern college in defending the institution on Scriptural grounds. An incorporated religious society, organized for the purpose of diffusing pure evangelical instruction throughout the land, controlling immense funds, and having agents in all parts of the country, repeatedly refused to circulate tracts calling attention to the abuse and iniquities of the "peculiar institution," or even to endorse and distribute the teachings of the Bible on a subject so vital to the public morals and the nation's weal. In other words, conservative Christianity could denounce with the fiercest rhetoric the awful wickedness of theatrical exhibitions, and the deadly sin of dancing, but had no word of condemnation for a system that held four millions of human beings in helpless and hopeless bondage, denied them the right of marriage, excluded them from all opportunities of education, and, in short, regarded them theoretically, and treated them practically, as mere chattels.

Conservative statesmen deprecated all agitation of the question, and predicted the dismemberment of the Union and the downfall of democratic institutions everywhere, if the doctrine of a higher law should prevail. Conservative men of business joined most cordially in the unholy crusade against justice and human freedom. They saw danger to their craft from the popular presentation of any arguments which could irritate the South, and preferred "peace on any terms" to a withdrawal of Southern trade. The plausible but flimsy pretence of geographical parties and sectional platforms was vigorously and for a long time effectively urged. Temporary material prosperity was considered an ample equivalent for national dishonor, and large entries on the credit side of the ledger reconciled men to frightful inroads on their capital of self-respect.

Nor does the humiliating history end here. Not only were appeals to pecuniary interest diligently and successfully made, but conservatism did not consider its dignity endangered by the lowest appeals to class prejudice and distinctions of caste. If the opponent belonged to the sterner sex, he was instantly impaled on the point of the following pertinent enquiry: "How would you like to marry a nigger woman?" If the attack was made with feminine logic, the defence was put in this delicate and decisive form: "How would you like to marry a nigger man?" Those who lived by the labor of their hands were threatened with an aggressive horde of blacks to compete successfully with white laborers in every agricultural and mechanical employment, while, with a singular disregard of consistent reasoning, the philanthropic element of the North was informed that even gradual emancipation would inevitably result in the starvation of the negroes.

But the inexorable logic of events, or rather the Providence of God acting through human instrumentalities, has changed all this—American slavery, whether as recognized in the Constitution or as protected by State legislation, exists only in history. The slaveholders' rebellion has been crushed, and the corner-stone of the Southern Confederacy has been ground to powder. It has found in the armies of Grant and Sherman the upper and nether millstone. However the exorcised and departing demon may tear and rend the body of Southern society, its doom is sealed.

But is the sublime mission of conservatism accomplished? Is its ennobling occupation gone? Very far from it. The spirit which has thus far controlled its ineffective councils, and dictated its defeated action, still survives. To be sure, slavery as an existing and legalized institution is past praying for. Even its most zealous defenders, who > ——"cherished it long as a holy prize,

> Who bedewed it with tears, and embalmed it with sighs," are reluctantly compelled to confess that it is a thing of the past.

Unhappy as they must be to abandon such an excellent scheme for christianizing the African race, these benevolent conservatives must forsake their promising field of missionary enterprise. Nevertheless, we see them sorrowing not as those without hope. There is yet something worthy to be conserved. There are still extant many traces of the old iniquity. Neither the Emancipation Proclamation, nor the Constitutional Amendment, nor the utter dispersion and annihilation of the rebel armies, has inspired the great majority of those who were recently slaveholders with any sentiments of common humanity or common justice. There remains the old determination to compel labor without adequate compensation, to exact obedience at the bidding of the lash—in a word, to perpetuate the spirit without the system of slavery.

Now what a rare opportunity is here presented for conservative effort! What may not be accomplished by the active and intimate alliance of Northern and Southern conservatives? The opportune friendship of Pilate and Herod promised hardly less hopeful results. Of course vigorous opposition must be anticipated from those unprincipled radicals who loved the Union better than slavery, and were determined that at any cost of loyal blood and treasure the Constitution should be preserved, even if slavery perished in the conflict. But the principle to be contended for is certainly worth a desperate struggle. The policy to be pursued is clearly consistent with the historical record of conservatism. It is nothing less than a deliberate design to prevent the freedmen of this nation from enjoying those rights and privileges which, if not their natural birthright, have, in the opinion of these same crazy radicals, been fairly won by their services and sufferings.

We may, perhaps, be pardoned if we examine this question for a moment in the light of our recent experience as a nation. The lessons which this war has taught, with reference to the character and capacity of the Southern negro, would seem to be tolerably intelligible even to conservative minds. Let us glance at a few of these lessons.

During many long, dreary, conservative years, the danger of servile insurrection was the hangman's whip to keep the North in order. To discuss the right or wrong of slavery was to endanger the lives of innocent women and children; was to put guns, and knives, and firebrands in the hands of infuriated slaves; was to inaugurate a reign of terror from Baltimore to Brownsville. The Declaration of Independence was incendiary. The Sermon on the Mount was incendiary. Everything was incendiary which did not inculcate abject submission on the part of the slave, and unquestioned authority on the part of the master. To be sure, all this was somewhat inconsistent with what we were constantly told of the tender and touching nature of the patriarchal institution; but it was no time to be logical when the valuable lives of so many worthy and helpless people were imperilled. Now what has the history of the war taught us on this point? We have seen State after State of the so-called Southern Confederacy stripped of the immense preponderance of its adult white male population, thousands of plantations left in the sole charge of helpless women, and yet there has not been a single well authenticated instance of a slave revolt.

Whether this most significant forbearance, on the part of the slaves, to avenge by indiscriminate slaughter their lifelong injuries, was due to their apathy or their ignorance, will appear when we proceed to consider another pithy and pregnant lesson which we have learned during the last four years.

We have long been in the habit of hearing a great deal about the inherent and inevitable incapacity of the negro race. And yet it has been abundantly proved that, while the slaveholding rebels have used their utmost diligence and ingenuity to represent the "Yankee hordes" as the natural enemies of the negroes, fighting merely in the interest of white men, and designing only their swift destruction, the slaves have had a juster appreciation of the real questions at issue in the war, and a truer recognition of their best and most available friends, than the poor whites of the South. In fact, if the recent rebellion has demonstrated one thing more clearly than another, it has demonstrated that the blacks were par excellence the loyal population of the seceding States—ever faithful to the flag to which they owed no gratitude, and to the Constitution which had always been interpreted in the interest of their oppressors.

And once more, the war has taught us that the negroes were not only willing but eager to lay down their lives in defence of those great principles of constitutional liberty and republican government which were the hope and the refuge of the democratic idea all over the civilized world. And yet, has any one forgotten with what tardy acquiescence, not to say absolute reluctance, the North consented to offer to the enslaved race the poor privilege of dying that the nation might live? During how many dismal months of disaster and defeat did we hear the shallow and selfish cry: "This war is for the benefit of white men, and must be fought by white men?" How many of our readers who to-day rejoice in the good conduct and are proud of the courage of the black soldier, were hoodwinked for awhile by this appeal, which had only (the obvious pun may be pardoned here) a color of reasoning in its support?

But this is not all. We have learned two important lessons since the termination of hostilities:

1st, That the freedmen have no wish to emigrate to the North so long as they are protected in their old home from the illegal exactions and petty tyrannies of their former oppressors:

And, 2d, That the freedmen evince in every way an eager desire to be educated, which is in striking contrast to the wilful and persistent ignorance of the poor whites.

Now we do not contend that there is anything novel in the views which we have presented. Nor do we propose at this time to insist that any or all of these considerations establish conclusively the absolute right of the freedmen to exercise the elective franchise. This is an independent proposition, which we do not design to discuss in the present article. But what we do ask is, that conservative reasons for withholding from black men the civil rights which are freely extended to white men shall not be based upon theories which have been long since refuted, or enforced by arguments which savor strongly of injustice and inhumanity. The whole subject is too important, and involves issues too momentous, to be disposed of in the summary style which settled similar questions a few years ago. The blacks have at least earned the right to have their alleged claims fairly and fully presented for the deliberate and conscientious decision of a candid public.

Of course, this appeal for fair dealing in the consideration of the subject of negro suffrage is addressed only to honest, intelligent, and loyal conservatives. We desire no controversy on this point with disloyal people, North or South. Such men, whether they are classed with persistent and incorrigible rebels, or with workers and wire-pullers in a certain political party, are insensible to any claims of right and incapable of appreciating any arguments founded on natural justice. They have made up their issue, and seem willing to stand or fall by it. And this issue does not turn on the question of loyalty or disloyalty; of fidelity or faithlessness to the Constitution and the Union; of blood shed in defence or defiance of the Government; of ignorance or intelligence; but simply on the difference between a white and a black complexion. In other words, it is the old defence of slavery with a new application. It is an attempt to revive the infamous doctrine that black men have no rights which white men are bound to respect. It is the last effort of defeated and dying despotism to regain by the arts of diplomacy what has been lost by an appeal to arms. It is the latest and not the most creditable phase of the ancient alliance between Northern conservatives and Southern slaveholders. It wholly ignores the origin, objects, and results of the war; the light shed by the progress of events upon the temper and tendency of slavery; and the inherent and invincible strength of free institutions. It appeals to the old spirit of domination in the South and submission in the North. It invokes the aid of such logic as is to be found in frequent allusions to long heels, woolly heads, black skins, and thick lips. If such a war as we have waged for four years has not disabused the loyal North of such palpable heresies as these, there is good ground for despairing of the republic.

GOVERNOR PERRY AT WASHINGTON.

Governor Perry has got back to South Carolina, and gave at Greenville, on the 1st day of August, a most interesting and instructive account of his visit to Washington. He started for the purpose of asking the President to appoint a Provisional Governor and restore civil government in the State, but on his way met a messenger with a commission appointing him Provisional Governor, so that when he got to Washington he was himself a living, moving, smoking, and probably chewing evidence that South Carolina had not been forgotten.

The effect of his arrival in the Capital on his English and his manners was most gratifying. A year ago, he would probably have talked of "sending a message to Andy Johnson to say he 'd like to see him." Now, however, he "sent a note to the President asking the honor of an interview." Not hearing anything in reply, he called on "Governor Dennison, Postmaster-General." This gentleman, according to Mr. Perry's account, seems to have been thrown into a sort of mild ecstasy by the sight of him, for "he obligingly ordered his carriage," and hurried off to the White House to see what was the matter. The note had not been received. So the President wrote to say he would receive Governor Perry and his friends at three o'clock in the White House, or, as Mr. Perry calls it, the "Executive mansion." It might be popularly supposed that Mr. Perry replied that he would be there at that hour. Nothing so vulgar. He wrote to say "that he would do himself the honor to call on His Excellency at the hour designated," and that he would be accompanied by eight friends, four of whom were "colonels," and the other four ordinary men.

When the "hour designated" arrived, Mr. Perry had of course much reason to feel troubled in his mind, because he had, just before he started on his journey, delivered the well known speech in which he declared that the rebellion was no rebellion at all, that there was nobody who felt "the humiliation and degradation of going back into the Union more than he did," that the people of the South had won "immortal honors" during the war, "and that for his part he would not and could not ask his fellow-citizens to forget the past as far as the North was concerned." There was evidently some danger that "His Excellency" might not like this speech, and that he might make some disagreeable criticisms on it.

These dismal apprehensions were not realized. Mr. Johnson was everything that the Governor, the four colonels and four citizens could desire. He was "kind," "solicitous," "magnanimous." He impressed them with his "courtesy, dignity, and ability." His "views were those of a patriot and a statesman." His opinions on the subject of State rights "were identical with his (the Governor's) own." He scouted the idea of the general Government meddling with the State franchise. In fact, the party could hardly have had anything to say to each other, for no great thought had apparently ever been hatched in Mr. Perry's brain of which Mr. Johnson was not able to produce a duplicate on the spot.

On leaving the White House they called on Mr. Seward. Owing to the regrettable circumstance that Mr. Seward has no title, the Governor is obliged to call him Mr. Seward simply; but he found him charming —"kind," "cordial," and "gratified." Before seeing Mr. Seward they had seen Attorney-General Speed, who had cruelly expressed "surprise" and "mortification" at the Governor's speech, thereby, however, showing, as might be expected, that "he had only glanced at it," and, poor fellow, "did not comprehend the tone and temper of my (the Governor's) remarks." In Mr. Seward's bosom they found consolation for the Attorney-General's hard and worldly observations. The Secretary of State knew exactly how it was. He had talked bunkum himself many a time, and knew what it was to have his bunkum criticized by cold, analytical outsiders. Said he, evidently in the charitable design of consoling his guest:

"I read your speech this morning attentively, and, considering the stand-point from which you make it, I think it a very good one. When I was Governor of New York, I used to make speeches which were very severely criticized in Charleston, and I said to myself, what the devil have the people of Charleston to do with my speech made in New York? I did not speak to them or for them, but to the people of New York. And I suppose, Mr. Perry, you intended your speech for South Carolina and not for Washington."

We think Mr. Seward might now very well ask, what had the people of Greenville to do with his speech to Mr. Perry?

Thus the whole matter was explained in a jiffy and to Mr. Perry's entire satisfaction. He had come on to Washington feeling a little uncomfortable about the speech; with a dim consciousness that he had better not have made it, and that it was a very disagreeable burden for a Provisional Governor to carry about; and that the utmost he could hope for in the Capital was that it would not be alluded to. We may imagine his surprise and delight, therefore, when the Secretary of State told him the flattering tale that it was all right; that political opinions are to be judged by the latitude and longitude in which they are uttered; and that when high functionaries applaud rebellion against the Government in Charleston, it is an impertinence for people in other places to pretend to hear them. What Mr. Perry's speech contains, it appears, was local truth, which is well known to be an entirely different thing from universal truth—truth prepared for the citizens of the spot, just as sherries are brandied in Spain for the American and English markets.

Leaving Mr. Seward, the party called on Mr. McCulloch, and had a delightful time. Much as they enjoyed themselves at the Executive Mansion and in the State Department, their gratification in these places was not to be compared to that which awaited them in the Treasury.

The particular barrel of comfort which Mr. McCulloch tapped for them does not appear, and in fact, as well as we can make out, it was less from what this gentleman said that Mr. Perry derived his happiness, than from the contemplation of his character, which the visitors seem to have laid bare in a few minutes. How long he was in their hands does not appear—we should imagine not more than an hour at the outside; but it will astonish Mr. McCulloch, no doubt, as much as it will gratify him, to know that Governor Perry was "very much pleased with him as a gentleman, a public officer, and a statesman." It will be admitted even by the most embittered of Governor Perry's detractors that a person who can discover the qualities of a high official, as "a gentleman, officer, and statesman," in the course of a morning call, must be a person of uncommon penetration.

We ought to mention that Governor Perry also announced that he had informed the President "that he would have the State ready, her constitution reformed, and her members of Congress elected by the first Monday in December." This, however, it must not be forgotten, was said in Greenville, and was addressed to the people of Greenville, and should any evil-minded critics in this part of the country attempt to make disagreeable comments on it, the Governor would doubtless now have his reply ready, that he intended his speech for South Carolina, "and what the devil had the people of the North to do with it?" Bunkum is clearly a great political force. Shallow theorists often speak disrespectfully of it; but on really great occasions, when a nation is laboring in the throes of a mighty social crisis, and its weightiest and most sacred interests are at stake, a little frank and hearty expression of contempt for the popular sense and perspicacity often works wonders.

SOMETHING NEW FROM THE STUMP.

General Howard, in his admirable and instructive address before the Maine Freedmen's Relief Association, a fortnight ago, said, in speaking of the possibility of the white and black races living together at the South in peace and unity:

"Let me tell you my method of solving the problem—how to rid ourselves of this prejudice. It is, get more of the spirit of Christ. That will substitute love for hate in our prejudices. But you will say, 'This is not practical; the love of Christ is not so wide-spread as to render this available.' Well, then, interest will do it."

Commenting on this, the New York Times says, in a spirit not, we admit, characteristic of the paper:

"Very unusual sort of talk, this, for the stump, and calculated, we fear, to be exceedingly distasteful to that wholesome public sentiment which turns with indifference from every species of sectarian shibboleth, and reprobates the needless introduction of religious considerations into secular discussions. If Gen. Howard could be transferred into some terribly-swearing department—some army of Flanders—he might be useful as a missionary. We do not, however, believe that his preaching will solve the great problem involved in the condition of the emancipated negro."

Now, in our opinion, many wise things as General Howard said in the course of his address, this was, perhaps, the wisest, for there is nothing more certain, historically, than that, during the last eighteen hundred years, no other agency has been so potential in enabling men of all races and conditions to dwell peaceably together, in effacing distinctions, and in diffusing the sense of human brotherhood, as this very "spirit of Christ." It overthrew slavery in the Roman Empire; it gave the first great impetus to the abolition of serfdom in modern Europe; and certainly, if it was not to the more general application of Christian teaching to the conduct of political and social life that we owed the commencement and the success of the emancipation movement in our day, we know not to what we did owe it. And, much importance as we attach to wise legislation and vigorous enforcement of the laws, we sincerely believe that the final and complete triumph of order and justice at the South, the general diffusion through the white population of a feeling of respect for the rights of negroes, and the permanent foundation on the ruins of slavery of a stable, orderly, peaceable, and prosperous society, will only come when the Southern people have imbibed more of the "spirit of Christ" than has yet fallen to their lot. Anybody who sets about reorganizing Southern society without recognizing this influence in his calculations, would prove himself not a statesman, but a charlatan. And it is because we desire to see this spirit do its work, and do it as speedily as possible, that we rejoice to see slaveholding brutality and violence restrained in the meantime by the strong arm of the law. No moral agency can act effectively on men who are allowed, day by day, to gratify their devilish passions, their hatred of weakness, their ferocious pride of race and color. Look at the case of the Virginia shoemaker of whom our correspondent speaks, who declares that nothing so moves him to "cut a nigger's throat from ear to ear" as to see him testifying in a court of justice. The first thing to be done with a barbarian of this sort is, of course, to restrain him from the commission of evil by the strong arm of the law, but what, we should like to know, will ever banish the anti-social passions from his heart, and give him a right sense of what he owes to his neighbor, if it be not the spirit of Christianity?

General Howard's language is, we admit, "very unusual sort of talk for the stump," and more is the pity. We dislike as much as anybody the practice of dragging in religious ideas or religious allusions to give weight and éclat to every trumpery proposition that may be propounded on the ordinary topics of the day, in the press or on the platform. But no discussion of the right or wrong of slavery, no inquiry into the claims of men, as men, to equality before the law, in which the teachings of Christianity are not acknowledged to be the final source of instruction and of confidence, can ever bear any real fruit. And no settlement of affairs at the South which is not in the eye of the people clothed with this supreme sanction, will, we fear, ever prove lasting or satisfactory, for no laws which are not supported by the moral sense of the community can ever be thoroughly efficient.

The trouble with Southern society in times past has been that it has been practically a pagan society. The separation between religion and morals in it has been all but complete; the restriction of men to custom as their sole rule of life, all but general. They had borrowed their political and social philosophy from heathen Rome, with simply a little tincture in it of the amenities of modern civilization. Aristotle and Cato furnished the sources from which Southern statesmen and patriarchs drew their social science, and probably nothing in modern times has done so much to shake the hold of the church on what was best amongst the people, as the shameless facility with which she lent her sanction to plantation theories of human relations. So that it is now, and now only, that the social influence of Christian teaching can be fairly tried at the South, and we for our part are satisfied that the final pacification must come from it—from the thorough perception of the equality of men, and the thorough apprehension of the legal consequences which flow from it, which the modern world has derived from the diffusion of the spirit of Christ, and, we might almost say, from this alone.

COOLIE LABOR AT THE SOUTH.

THE World a few days ago made the following announcement:

"If the experiment of free negro labor does not hereafter work well in the cultivation of cotton, sugar, rice, and other staple Southern products, it is inevitable that the owners of large plantations South will try what can be done with coolie or Asiatic labor. It is probably known to many of our readers that, during the past ten years, large numbers of Hindoos and Chinamen have been induced to emigrate to Cuba, Trinidad, and British Guiana, under contracts to work, for a term of years, for stipulated sums. All accounts agree that the experiment has proved successful. The climate does not disagree with the Asiatics, whose labor is far more efficient than that of the freed negro.

"An effort is now making to introduce coolie labor into Jamaica."

The writer then quotes Trollope in proof of the success of the experiments in the British West Indies.

Let us commence by saying that Trollope's work on the West Indies, like his deceased mother's book on the United States, abounds in inaccurate statements, and is consequently very untrustworthy authority. So far as Jamaica is concerned, the writer of this article has had an experience of matters there which entitles him to say that most of the statements in that work should be taken cum grano salis, and that many of them are totally incorrect. Trollope spent only a few weeks in the island, which he visited on official duties in the post-office department of the imperial Government; and he was during the whole of that time engaged in travelling from place to place. He was everywhere the guest of the planters, from whom he derived all his information as to the state of affairs generally, and the character and condition of the blacks in particular. Such information would be of course colored by the peculiar prejudices of the dominant class; and he cannot therefore be regarded as a trustworthy guide in matters relating to Jamaica. We will not however content ourselves with mere assertion, but shall let facts speak.

At the time that Mr. Trollope wrote his book on the West Indies, it is true that strenuous efforts were being made to promote coolie emigration for the cultivation of the Jamaica sugar plantations, and that those efforts were encountering stout opposition both from a certain party in the colony and from another in England composed of the philanthropists of Exeter Hall. In view of the results of such emigration in British Guiana and Trinidad, Mr. Trollope thinks it "singular" that an attempt should be made to prevent it in the case of Jamaica. But he was either ignorant of the fact, or he suppressed it, that the experiment of coolie labor as a substitute for that of the negro had been already tried in Jamaica, and had proved a total and miserable failure. It was not more than three or four years after the emancipation of the blacks that the planters of that island fell upon the expedient of importing coolies to do the work of their plantations. Under legislative enactment an agency was established in India for collecting coolies and shipping them to Jamaica, and over ten thousand of these people were sent to the island and distributed among the planters. But it was soon discovered that most of them were totally unfit for agricultural labor, and upon enquiry it turned out that the majority of them had been hastily taken from the scum of the streets of Calcutta and Madras, and shipped off to the West Indies. All that the agent and his subordinates seemed to have cared about was their head-money; the more coolies they shipped, the more pay they got; and in their greed of gain they foisted upon the colony a lot of worthless people. The planters found that they had committed a great mistake. The coolies were either turned off the plantations or left to wander whithersoever they pleased without any restraint, and to find subsistence as best they might. The consequences were most deplorable. The poor wretches were soon found infesting the streets and the highways, living by mendicancy, and large numbers of them perished miserably.

Meanwhile the island had been burdened, through the experiment, with a debt of nearly two millions of dollars, that became a charge upon the general revenue, to which the freed negroes were compelled to contribute as well as the planters. Undeterred, however, by the bitter experience of the past, at the period when Mr. Trollope visited Jamaica, the planters, still bent upon obtaining cheap labor, were agitating for a renewal of the experiment that had already so lamentably failed. There were those, both in Jamaica and in England, who had not forgotten the upshot of the first trial. They opposed the scheme, but were unsuccessful in their opposition; and it was ultimately decided, after two years of agitation, that the experiment should be again tried, under, professedly, more stringent regulations than at first—provision being made, among other things, that two-thirds of the expense should be borne by the planters. And what has been the result? This time an agent, specially selected with a view to his fitness for the work, was sent out from Jamaica to India; ships were chartered, and about four thousand coolies were sent over to the island in the space of three years. Then the planters suddenly discovered that there was no longer any need of coolie laborers, that the expense attendant upon the scheme was too heavy for them to bear, and that the negro laborers were preferable to the Asiatic. The agent was summarily recalled; and for nearly two years past, not a single coolie emigrant has been landed on the shores of Jamaica. The greater portion of those now on the island will have to be sent back to India, after fulfilling the terms of their indentures; and when the last of them shall have left for his native land, it will be found that the island has incurred a debt little short of four millions of dollars through the twice-repeated experiment, without having reaped any benefit in return for such a large outlay of money.

As to Cuba, we shall say nothing here, for coolie emigration there is, we fear, only another name for slavery; but with regard to Demerara and Trinidad it cannot be denied that in those colonies the experiment has to all appearance worked successfully. But for this two reasons may be assigned, not operating in the case of Jamaica. First, in both of those countries population is much more sparse than in Jamaica. With a territory four or five times as large, Demerara, according to the last census, has little more than one-third the population of Jamaica; and Trinidad, which is about half the size of her sister island, has barely one-fourth the population of Jamaica. In both these colonies, then, labor is scarce; but in Jamaica, with fair wages and regular payments, it can be had in abundance. Second, the experiment has been conducted with a different system of management from that which obtains in Jamaica. Demerara and Trinidad are what are called "crown colonies." Their legislatures are not elective bodies, chosen by suffrage in the colony, but are composed of nominees of the crown; and thus the imperial Government exercises a more direct and influential control over their affairs than is possible in the case of Jamaica, where the popular voice is represented, or supposed to be represented, in the legislature. In those colonies, therefore, the regulations under which coolie emigration is conducted have been framed in strict compliance with the instructions of the Colonial Minister for the time being, and these were of a nature to ensure the most ample protection for the emigrant laborer. In the case of Jamaica, on the contrary, almost everything has been left in the hands of the local legislature, and the planters have resented, as an arbitrary and unjustifiable interference with the authority and power of the employer, and a gross reflection upon their humanity and sense of justice, any attempt on the part of the imperial Government to apply the same rules to them as to the other two colonies. The results have proved that the conduct of such an experiment as the one in question ought never to have been entrusted to them. We have said that the scheme of employing coolie labor has, apparently, succeeded in Demerara and Trinidad; but the fact is, that both those colonies are now burdened with enormous debts incurred for this Asiatic emigration; and it is notorious that since Trollope wrote his book on the West Indies a sad reaction has taken place in the fortunes of the latter. What the end will be of a system of labor so utterly at variance with all known laws of political economy, remains yet to be seen.

In Jamaica, the second trial of the scheme promises to be as disastrous as the first, although it has been made under all the advantages of the experience derived from that by the planters and the legislature. From a recent number of the Falmouth Post, a newspaper published on the north side of the island, we find that vagrancy and destitution are again common among the coolies in Jamaica:

"The parish of St. James is not the only one in the county of Cornwall in which there is a vast amount of destitution among immigrants that have been imported from the East Indies. In the towns and rural districts of Trelawney, Hanover, and Westmoreland, many of these people, covered with sores, almost naked, and apparently in a starving condition, wander about asking for alms. Some of them, it is supposed, are deserters from the properties of their employers, and others, having terminated their contracts of service, depend upon chance for their subsistence. The sub-agent, whose duty it is to look after, neglects them; and we have reason to believe that much of their unserviceableness and vagrancy is the result of this culpable neglect. This is a fact to which we respectfully direct the attention of His Excellency the Governor and the members of the Executive Committee. What is to become of these miserable creatures, who, whatever be their faults, ought not to be left to shift for themselves?"

Commenting on this, the County Union, another Jamaica newspaper, says:

"Let the Governor enquire now, and he will find a miserable coolie in the county jail, sent there for no crime whatever—sent there upon the wanton caprice of Mr. Rawlins (the sub-agent)—sent there without trial or offence—sent there to work out that cold-blooded inhumanity of which every act of his is redolent. This poor wretch is, and has been for some time past, a mere anatomy of bone, covered by as sunken a proportion of skin as the human frame can exist in. He is scarce able to crawl—scarce able to lift hand to mouth to keep himself alive with offal picked up in the streets, or thrown from the yard in which turtle is prepared for exportation. We have seen him contest a meal with the carrion-crows, fighting for the refuse bones with raw flesh on them, and if the police were examined on the man's case, and chose to speak the truth, his sores had maggots on them when he was taken up! This," adds the Union, "shows what can be done in a country where slavery and the whip have been abolished."

PERSONAL CONTROVERSY.

The intermittent disputes of Mr. Thurlow Weed and of Mr. Horace Greeley must be painful to the friends of these gentlemen. Nor are they creditable to the character of the newspaper press. We believe no man who knows him can sincerely doubt the perfect personal integrity, the scrupulous veracity, and the catholic benevolence of the editor of the Tribune. Mr. Weed, during his long career as a political leader, has made many friends and many enemies. Whether deservedly or not, he has the reputation of being a man of intrigue; and if parties are to be managed, as we suppose they must be while parties exist, nobody can bring to the work greater dexterity than Mr. Weed has frequently displayed. Mr. Greeley, on the other hand, is not a good party tactician. Perhaps he is too honest; certainly, he has too little control over a temper naturally violent. When he is angry, and he is often angry, he can no more keep a secret than he can live without breathing. When engaged in a dispute he rarely stops to cull nice phrases, and he has an uncomfortable habit of giving the lie direct, which, if generally adopted in social intercourse, would occasion the breaking of many heads and the blacking of many eyes. In one of his recent replies to Mr. Weed, he speaks of "that shameful, pernicious, systematic traffic in legislation, franchises, grants, and immunities whereby Thurlow Weed has become rich and infamous." This is perfectly plain speaking. Thersites himself could not have improved upon it. Mr. William Cobbett never blackguarded in a more bouncing style. Mr. Weed retorts that Mr. Greeley is "ambitious, selfish, and false," and intimates that he is also "a howling demagogue." We see no end of the controversy, except in the death of one of the combatants; and yet we should be very glad to see it stopped at once. With the private quarrels of men, privately conducted, we have nothing to do; but when they fill up the columns of our newspapers, to the exclusion of much more agreeable and profitable matter, and seek to make every reader a party in the affray, we begin to ask ourselves if these hatreds and misunderstandings are of sufficient consequence to the public to be paraded in large and leaded type and served up to us with the morning muffins. If the public does relish the acrimony of the contest, it is a question whether the relish can be considered a healthy one. We are not aware that literary is any more respectable than physical pugilism; and a scolding match in the newspapers is no better than a scolding match in a fish-market. We may chuckle at the scientific style in which Mr. Greeley belabors Mr. Weed, and at the pluck with which the latter counters the heavy blows; but after all, the spectacle of two such men thus engaged is not a pleasant one. Generally a third and sometimes a fourth party manages to enter the field; the fight becomes more furious as it becomes more extensive, until, after a rainy season of left-handed compliments and of effervescent cards, the "scrimmage" is brought to a welcome conclusion by general consent. It reminds one of the battle royal in poor Kit Smart's play:

> "Thus when a barber and a collier fight,
> The barber beats the luckless collier white;
> The dusty collier heaves his ponderous sack,
> And, big with vengeance, beats the barber black;
> In comes the brick-dust man with grime o'erspread,
> And beats the collier and the barber red;
> Black, red, and white in various clouds are tossed,
> And in the dust they raise the combatants are lost."

It is a curious fact, that for many years the bitterest struggles in this State should have been between members of the same party, who, according to sound policy and the sheerest prudence, should have agreed like Dr. Watts' birds in their little nest. It does not give one a lofty idea of a political organization to hear a moiety of its members calling the other rogues. Family disputes are always scandalous, and there is nothing better settled, as a mere matter of taste, than that people should wash their dirty linen at home. Parties are created for the public benefit; not that this man may be made a governor and the other a senator, not that Mr. Weed may get rich, not that Mr. Greeley may become famous, but that public affairs may be prudently managed and sound legislation promoted. The revelations which are remorselessly made when politicians fall out, only serve to disgust honest men with the whole machinery of party, and to alienate them from that participation in public affairs which is the duty of every citizen. If parties are mainly controlled by the ambitious, the selfish, and the false; if they necessitate corruption and trickery; if they cannot go on without practices of an exceedingly questionable character, then men who wish to keep their hearts from hardening and their hands from uncleanness, will resolutely remain in a private station and leave the country to take care of itself. What, indeed, could give a foreign observer a lower idea of our politics, and of the prospects of the country, than this very quarrel which has just been spicing the New York newspapers? Here are two gentlemen, each of them a prominent Republican, each of them a recognized leader of his party, each of them exercising a great influence in nominations, in elections, and in legislation, and each over his own signature declares the other to be dishonest, ambitious, selfish, and false. It is melancholy to consider.

But we have determined not to interfere with the subject matter of this controversy. It is so literally none of our business, that we feel it to be a point of good breeding to keep scrupulously aloof from it. But with the manner of the battle we have something to do; and we beg leave most seriously and respectfully to suggest to both these gentlemen the propriety of settling their private disputes by a private correspondence. It is true that they have newspapers at command, and the readers of those newspapers are quite at their mercy. But the public, we fancy, will be better satisfied, and the newspapers in the long run quite as prosperous, if their editorial columns are devoted to matter more instructive though not quite so entertaining.

TRAITORS AND TREASON.

Chancellor Oxenstiern's remark as to the small amount of wisdom that goes to the government of men is often quoted, and with effect, there being few things more foolish than most attempts that are made by governments to do good, or to prevent the occurrence of evils. But if the Swedish statesman had seen fit to pursue the subject that was in his mind when he warned his son of the follies of governors, he might have added that the governed were generally as foolish as their governors. There is hardly an error of rulers, or of parties, which is not the reflection of popular sentiment. Were it not so, the history of government would not be the history of blunders diversified by crimes.

If we look at the history of treason, we shall find that the view generally taken of that offence by mankind is scarcely compatible with belief in their sanity. The law visits treason with the severest denunciations, and certainly those who have administered the law have often been severe even to savageness in their treatment of traitors. The sentences passed upon persons guilty of treason in England, down to quite a recent date, were as filthy as they were fierce, and would have disgraced the Aztecs when Cortes first visited them. The object seems to have been to degrade and to insult the condemned, and to cause them to feel, as it were, pain after death. Few men have the indifference of Diogenes to their remains, and most of us love to associate "solemn and lovely images" with the place of our last and long repose. We think of the grave as if we could be conscious of unconsciousness. Taking advantage of this peculiarity, those who have aimed to make the bitterness of death doubly bitter to persons convicted of treason, have accumulated posthumous horrors for their annoyance. One of the charges against Jeffreys is, that he "always appeared to be in a higher state of exhilaration when he explained to Popish priests [convicted of having been concerned in the Popish plot] that they were to be cut down alive, and were to see their own bowels burned, than when he passed ordinary sentences of death." The foulest of murderers was never made to suffer such punishment as was apportioned to traitors, who often have been persons likely to feel insult far more than pain, treason being, so far at least as concerns the leaders in it, the crime of gentlemen. The famous statute adopted in the reign of Henry VII., by which adherents of the king de facto were secured against the pains and penalties of treason, was made necessary by the severity with which the parties to the Wars of the Roses had visited their foes, as each party in its turn became triumphant. Another such generation of civil warfare as that which preceded the decision on Bosworth Field, and the English patriciate would have shared the fate of that of Rome. It would have become an extinct order. And the English lived in constant dread of the renewal of the war for the succession to the throne throughout the entire existence of the Tudor dynasty (1485–1603). This protecting statute was construed so closely that it was not allowed to save the regicides, after the Restoration, though they had adhered to the existing government, and their cases seem fairly to have been within the equity of the act; but as a rule that statute did much to mitigate the evils of the laws against treason, and that it was found necessary to enact it shows not only the profound effect which a long and bloody contest had produced on the English mind, but the extreme severity with which the crime of treason was punished. Executions for treason were numerous under the Tudor dynasty, but they were far less numerous than they would have been had not the law adopted in the reign of the founder of the dynasty confined treason to the adhesion to parties that should seek to overthrow a king in possession. Had Cromwell made himself king, and then caused Charles I. to be put to death, after trial, no member of the High Court of Justice could have been punished legally in England on the restoration of the House of Stuart.

But while the crime of treason has been so severely regarded by the general law, and it has been found necessary to soften that severity by the passage of a statute, the adoption of which makes an era in English history, public sentiment has taken exactly the opposite view of the crime. It is not too much to say that, with the majority of mankind, treason has been in a certain sense a popular crime—that is to say, traitors have never been regarded with that horror in which men hold murderers, fire-raisers, and others who are guilty of great offences against laws that protect life and property. Exceptions there are to this rule, but of the existence of the rule itself there can be no doubt. Some very peculiar specimens of the class of traitors are mostly spoken of with horror, but in every such case there is to be found something exceptional. Catiline is a representative man of these unpopular traitors, but the place he has in history, and in opinion, is owing chiefly to the denunciations of Cicero, whose orations enter so largely into the education of youth, but partly to the mystery that envelops the man and his designs, and which affords room for thinking the worst of him and his aims. Benedict Arnold is another traitor who is almost invariably painted in black; but there was something so very mean in his doings, and André's fate was so affecting, that we are at no loss to fix accurately his unpopularity. Yet even Catiline has found defenders and Arnold apologists. Look at the case of Sir Edward Digby. He was engaged in a conspiracy that had in view the most comprehensive plan of assassination ever formed. A dynasty and a legislature were to be blown out of existence in a moment; and a great revolution, it was hoped by the conspirators, would follow from the success of their plot. That plot came very near being successful. But Sir Edward Digby is seldom spoken of as a great criminal—never, indeed, is he spoken of as he would have been spoken of had he been engaged in a plot to commit murder. The purity of his character, and the unselfishness of his conduct, and the fortitude with which he met his fate, are points on which most writers dwell, while they have little more than matter-of-course condemnation for his crime. It is plain to be seen that his doings excited no horror, and we know that his family did not lose consideration because of his part in a conspiracy that stands quite unrivalled for its comprehensive wickedness, and which might have produced the worst effects on the course of the world for the last two hundred and sixty years. He had, as well was said, aimed to "murder a kingdom in its representatives." Yet he died in the firm conviction that he had done no wrong in the sight of heaven, and was both surprised and grieved when he heard that his conduct was condemned by Catholics. He admitted his offence against human law, but he could not be convinced that he had offended God. Such was the view of treason taken by one of the bravest gentlemen of England, and a man of whose personal purity there is no room to doubt; and public sentiment has substantially sustained his own estimate of his action.

That treason has not usually been considered a disgraceful crime, we see by reference to the history of the British nobility. Leaving aside houses that have been ennobled during the last five generations, there are few noble families in Great Britain that have not contributed victims to the scaffold. Howards, Seymours, Percys, Russells, Sydneys, Capels, Radcliffes, Greys, Campbells, Grahames, Devereux, Courtenays, Boleyns, Stanleys, Dudleys, Elphinstones, Wentworths, Vanes, Coles, Staffords, Douglases, Ruthvens, and many other noble families, have seen some of their number perish by the hand of the headsman. But this has happened without bringing any of the disgrace upon the connexions of the victims. And why the difference? Because the world does not look upon treason as it looks upon other crimes of the first magnitude; and the noble personages alluded to were traitors merely, and not murderers or robbers. There is not an old patrician house in Britain which is not proud of the fact that some of its members died on the scaffold for treason, and this without reference to the motives of the gentlemen who were beheaded. For it is necessary to complete the honor of traitors that they should die by steel, and not by the cord. A rope in the family line would not be colored by "all the blood of all the Howards," but the axe is a welcome weapon to every noble mansion. The slightest touch of the hangman causes degradation. The hardest blow of the headsman is as ennobling as of old was the blow from some knightly sword for good services well rendered on a stricken field. The crime committed is never thought of—the mode of punishment is all that is considered. The sovereign in England has generally, when the criminals have been of noble blood, remitted all the worse penalties of treason, and allowed the traitors to perish by simple decapitation. This he has done from the abundance of his grace, for in law the high-born traitor stands no higher than the lowest of his low-born associates. There has been little of grace exhibited to the herd of traitors, who have stretched hemp, while their instigators and leaders have made the acquaintance of "dull blocks and sharp axes." Both leaders and followers have excited pity, not hatred, and more indignation has often been vented on one murderer than on a score of traitors, whose action had caused ten thousand deaths, and misery incalculable.

It is to be observed, as a sort of commentary on men's lenity in the cases of traitors, that treason mostly includes, because it causes to be committed, all those crimes which men hold in especial abhorrence. Murders, rapes, robberies, arson, theft, and miscellaneous violence, are the accompaniments of treason, if it be committed on a tolerably large scale. It is because treason leads to all these crimes being committed, and to general insecurity, that it is so terrible an offence. Take the grand treason that has been committed in this country by the secessionists: the crime against the republic is of the highest grade, and the highest punishment should be inflicted on those who took the lead in its perpetration. But we could afford to forgive them that offence, were it not for the misery which it has brought on millions of people. The Southern States have been desolated in many parts, and that "section" has been thrown back for years. Sources of wealth that had excited the world's admiration have been dried up, and some of them it will be difficult to open again. An enormous debt—a debt quite unparalleled, when we note the short time of its creation—has been brought upon the country; and to pay that debt will cause the industry of the country to be burdened throughout the present century. The silent misery that is caused by the existence of a great national debt is altogether beyond calculation. It defies the gatherer of statistics to say what evil is done by the gatherer of taxes. Life has been made much harder by the occurrence of the civil war. Thousands of families that lived easily before the war now find it difficult to live at all. The measures which it was found necessary to take to combat the rebels—measures affecting the currency, for example—have prodigiously appreciated the cost of everything, and the change seems to be assuming a permanent character. The evil effect of this may be partially imagined, but it defies description. All feel it, but none can adequately tell the story of their sufferings. And these changes for the worse, and others that have taken place, are all owing to the action of a few men who had no cause to be disaffected with the order of things that existed in 1860, and which had prevailed for seventy years, and under which an amount of prosperity had been enjoyed such as no other country had ever before known.

That treason, the greatest of all crimes, and the cause of most other crimes of violence, should be as lightly regarded as it is by many people here as well as in Europe, is to be attributed to two reasons. In the first place, the law of treasons has been most terribly abused in all old countries. It has been the agency through which bad governments have often rid themselves of inconvenient critics of their proceedings, or by resort to which they have been able to plunder wealthy subjects. Much of that historical literature which forms a portion of our mental food is devoted to the denunciation of tyrants who have employed treason laws to effect the most heinous of purposes. We get many of our notions concerning treason from historians who have written of sovereigns like some of the Roman emperors, who certainly did make a horrible use of the crime of majesty. In England, the history of which country is most familiar to Americans, the abuse of the laws against treason, and their shocking perversion by wicked judges, were as bad as anything that is to be found in the Roman annals. We never think of treason in Rome without also thinking of Tiberius and Sejanus. We never think of treason in England without also thinking of James and Jeffreys. Delation and the Bloody Assize are inextricably associated in our minds with treason; and the conclusion to which this association leads us is prejudicial to the demands of justice. We would rather that all traitors should escape than that our name should be associated with that of bad governments. In the second place, it is not to be disputed that many men who have died on the scaffold as traitors were good men, who sought good ends. They were traitors only in a technical sense, or were condemned to death through the abuse of law by bad tribunals, or through the abuse of power by bad kings or ministers. When such men as Henry Vane, Lord Russell, and Algernon Sydney were condemned as traitors, and suffered accordingly, it is idle to expect that the mere word traitor can be made to move men against the person who bears it; and when they know that if George Washington had failed, and been taken prisoner, he too would have been executed as a traitor, since, technically, though not morally, a traitor he would have been. Were half a dozen good and great men to be executed on the charge of murder, of which it was notorious they were innocent, even the crime of murder would lose much of the horror with which it is now regarded. Doubts would exist in all save the most palpably clear cases of the justice of every conviction for murder that should take place, after such abuses of the law had been witnessed, and convicted persons would be allowed the benefits of all such doubts by the world.

Correspondence.

CLASSICAL EDUCATION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

The remarks of the author of "Classical and Scientific Studies" in your last number seem to me at once sensible and practical. They are directed against an evil which does not exist at Harvard alone. It is a fault at Yale, and it is my impression that it exists to a great degree in nearly every one of our colleges. The course of preparatory study has been too entirely classical, giving young men a distaste for mathematical and scientific studies if they inclined to the classics, and a distaste for all study if they were put exclusively upon the classics, when their tastes were for other studies; so that, beyond the competition for honors, they have no enthusiasm in study. And whatever may be the theories of mental discipline, it is a fact patent to common sense that boys will not study heartily what they are not interested in; but allowing them to begin with studies which they like, under judicious direction, their tastes are enlarged, and by-and-bye they cheerfully engage in studies which at first seemed irksome. The cramming mill through which boys are pushed at the two leading classical academies in Massachusetts (Andover and East Hampton), I can testify from personal observation, does not expand or discipline the mind so generally and so well as those less noted schools where more play and variety are given to individual minds.

I agree, too, most heartily with the writer in his suggestion that the maximum amount of Latin and Greek required for entering college might safely be diminished "by at least one-third," and in place of it there might be "a very stiff examination in physical science." This would engage and interest and develop a larger number of minds. It would give each one who had any aptitude for study a chance to make himself strong in his specialty; it would give all a fairer presentation at the doors of the college. But, further, it would correct a most lamentable failure in college instruction. Boys going in college now are chiefly engaged in Latin, Greek, and mathematics for Freshman and Sophomore year. In this those who like these studies are tolerably successful. But this will comprise hardly more than one-third of the class. Another third will be those who have no special animus for them—but engage in them because it is the only way to a college "sheep-skin." The rest are those who are in danger of being plucked at every examination, and many of whom, with a different arrangement of preparatory and earlier college studies, might have stood respectably. They are the unfortunates of this partial and traditional course of study. But the failure of discipline to these minds is not all. When the junior year arrives, the study of the physical sciences begins. There is a little chemistry, a little astronomy, a great deal of natural philosophy, together with a little French and German by way of variety; and the rest of the study of the physical sciences is accomplished by the lecture system, consisting of elaborate, able, and interesting lectures from such men as Dana, Silliman, Newton, and Loomis at Yale, delivered to a class of young men numbering a hundred perhaps, not twenty-five of whom know more than the A, B, C of the sciences, if they do that. The tutors to whom the care of these physical studies is assigned are men elected to office for their attainments in the classics; they know little more than the students themselves about these studies; they presuppose a knowledge of them in the class before them; they do not, therefore, say a word to interest those who know nothing of the subject in its study; it is a simple recitation of the text-book; and a large part of the class, finding these studies so different from the classics, which they have learned to like, turn from chemistry and astronomy in disgust, making them only memoriter exercises (as the historian Prescott did his mathematics at Harvard), and thus defeating the very object of their study. The tutors are not the men to teach these studies, unless they are those who had an aptness for them in college; the time given to them is inadequate; there are no brief and attractive explanations before entering on the study, such as every true teacher would give his pupils; the students themselves are not prepared in the class-room for receiving in full the rich expositions of the lecture-room; and the final result of the entire study of the physical sciences as at present pursued at Yale is a failure, nay, more, it is a sham. It is a wrong to the students and an insult to the able men who lecture. In the scientific department of the college, these studies are conducted in a rational way. This entire failure might be amended by the study of these branches in the preparatory course, and by placing live, active, healthy, enthusiastic men in the tutorial chairs—men who, first of all, are manly, and, next, who know something besides Latin and Greek—men who can secure the respect and fidelity of the class they instruct at once by their geniality and faithfulness and ability. There are such men in every class, who, though excellent scholars, do not take the valedictory, but with a singular blindness they are seldom chosen to these most important posts.

But I hope the day will soon be gone when such failures as these can be reported in our first literary institutions. The press is doing a noble work in urging on the study of the physical sciences. Herbert Spencer's writings have not been without their effect. The more general attention now paid to these pursuits, and the demand for them now made in educated men, will both hasten the change, and with that change we may reasonably hope for a more successful and no less disciplinary college curriculum.

In this change, however, there is a danger, now increasing at Yale, in crowding the college course with too many branches of study. This might be urged for the exclusion of these physical studies, only they are imperatively demanded by the age. But the difficulty is, that some of our larger institutions are ambitious of loading the simple college system with all the attractions of an English university; and this, so long as the college system is adhered to, may result in so crowding the four years of collegiate study as to turn men out mere smatterers in everything, even as it now turns out (and perhaps ever will) its best scholars excellently furnished in nearly everything but a knowledge of common things. J. H. W.

CHESHIRE, Conn.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

VII.

LIBERTY, VA., Aug. 17, 1865.

THE little village of Appomattox Court-House, distant from Lynchburg about twenty-five miles, is situated on low ground at the source of the Appomattox River, and in a district devoted exclusively to farming. It is, therefore, small even among Virginian towns, containing, besides the court-house and a jail in ruins, only some twenty or thirty buildings, mostly the dwellings of farmers; but small as it is, no other collection of houses in all the county so well merits the name of town. It boasts one hotel and one country store, the stock of goods in the latter sadly needing to be replenished. During the time of my visit, both of these buildings were pretty constantly occupied by men who seemed to have no other business on their hands than to lounge in some easy attitude chewing tobacco and talking to each other, or watching across the muddy road and pools of rain water the movements of the soldiers quartered opposite in the court-house yard. In the country parts of Virginia I have seen at one time and another hundreds of white men, and I doubt if I have seen in all more than ten men engaged in labor of any sort. At the store or tavern of every village just such a group of idlers is sure to be found. In accounting for these assemblages, the fact that apple brandy is always for sale by the glass at such places can hardly be considered a sufficient cause, apple brandy being exceedingly abundant in all this region, as nearly every farmer has a still in operation on his own premises. It is to the custom of the country, which throws all work upon the negroes, that the general idleness must in great part be attributed, and in part also, I suppose, to the unsettled condition of public and private affairs, which furnishes to every man a wide and fertile field for conjecture and conversation.

Within musket-shot of the court-house and the store is the range of low hills where Lee's army was drawn up on the morning of its surrender; on a parallel ridge was the centre of Grant's line of battle; and in the valley between, the town's people point out the spot where the commanders met for conference. It is marked by a deep hole, made by the relic-hunters, who have dug up even the roots of the tree beneath which the generals met. At the invitation of Mr. McLean I visited his house, and sat for a while in the parlor where the articles of capitulation were signed.

Nearly all the furniture which it then contained has been taken away by people anxious to possess some memento of the famous transaction. Tables, chairs, vases, fans, pens, books, everything small and great that could be removed from the room, were eagerly bought, or appropriated without purchase, by enthusiastic visitors. All the movables were exhausted, while yet the demands of the curiosity-seekers were unsatisfied. The standish which the generals used happened to be overturned, and a splash of ink was left upon the window-seat and wall. Urgent requests were repeatedly made for permission to cut out the stained wood and plaster, but this one remembrancer of the event, it having thus become part and parcel of the real estate, Mr. McLean has been able to keep for himself. His other souvenirs of the war are less pleasing, for they consist chiefly of negroes set free, lands abandoned, and houses and barns destroyed in the early campaigns. "Yes, sir," he said to me, "I was the alpha and omega of this contest—the beginning and the end. The first battle of Bull Run, as you call it, was fought on my plantation, and it was in my house that General Lee surrendered his army. But my first state was far worse than my last. At the time of the surrender I escaped all molestation. I could overhear your soldiers saying, 'Well, boys, we can afford to let this old fellow alone; he 's seen about enough of it.' It was true; I had seen plenty to satisfy me, and I may say that I was truly thankful that the thing was all over." So far as I could learn none of the villagers suffered at all in person or property at the hands of the Union army, but, on the contrary, its occupation of their district was an advantage to them; for no fighting of any consequence took place in the neighborhood, and when the soldiers of the two armies marched away, they left behind many cows and horses, which of course came into the possession of the people. The requisitions of rebel collecting agents had left the country almost bare of animals fit for the plough or for carting, and the supply of horses thus obtained was very seasonable. The Government has made known its intention of not calling in these animals, at least for the present; and, furthermore, in pursuance of the same benevolent policy, has recently been selling a large number of mules and cavalry horses at Lynchburg. Some of the animals are nearly worthless, but many of them are valuable, and all are cheap; and these sales will doubtless enable the farmers much more easily to get this year's produce to a market, and to prepare a much greater breadth of land for the new wheat crop than they otherwise could.

The town of Liberty, the county seat of Bedford, lies nearly west of Lynchburg on the line of the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad. I made the journey by rail, and though the iron of the track was much worn, the rolling stock seemed to be in very good order, and we passed over the twenty-four miles between the two towns very comfortably at the rate of ten miles an hour. The fare charged was eight cents a mile. The town, which contains no more than six or seven hundred inhabitants, is very prettily situated on high rolling hills that command fine views in every direction, and particularly where in the north-west, ten miles away, are the blue Peaks of Otter, with the cultivated green slopes at their feet. Half the male population was at the depot to witness the arrival of our train—the one event that breaks the monotony of the day.

In company with an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau I climbed the hill to the main street of the town, and made my way to the court-house. Here are the offices of the provost-marshal of the county and his subordinates, and of the sergeant who acts as local superintendent of freedmen's affairs. The basement of the large court-house is occupied by attorneys' offices, and the first floor is reached by means of a high flight of stone steps. Four stone pillars ornament the front of the building, and are themselves adorned by circulars and printed orders of various Union generals. In one corner of the empty court-room the sergeant had set up his desk, and near it I sat down and watched for an hour the transaction of business. A good many people came in—now it was an old farmer who entered, dressed in an oddly cut, shrunken suit of homespun, wearing a spur on one heel or carrying in his hand a short whip made of leather thongs plaited together; now it was a negro, hat in hand, with a question or a grievance or a request for transportation; now it was a citizen who came in to hear what decision had been made in reference to the case of a friend, or to vouch for the friend's good character, or, more likely, to spend an idle half-hour in a busy place; or a soldier walked listlessly in and out again.

One rough-looking old farmer ties his horse at the foot of the steps and, coming up, enquires for the "provo." His business relates to negroes, and the sergeant tells him that he has charge of all negroes in Bedford County, and will hear what he has to say.

"Two o' my niggers, sir, out thar on my place, are roamin' about and refusin' to work in any shape or manner, and I've come in this mornin' to see if anything kin be done."

"You want to get them back to your farm?"

"Yes, sir; they 'd ought to be thar. Both of 'em 's got a fahmly thar—women and children—and I have to feed 'em reg'lar, and I want the men to come back and work."

"Have they been at work for you?"

"Yes, they begun this spring, but about a fortnight ago they quit; say 'they 'll be dogged if they 'll work for me any mo',' and walked off and left their fahmly with me."

"Are they at work anywhere else?"

"I can't say; reckon not. Oh, no, they a' n't goin' to work; not while their women folks take my corn to feed 'em. The women feed 'em."

"Have you been paying any wages?"

"Well, they get what the other niggers get. I a' n't payin' great wages this year, an' I a' n't doin' any great work—makin' a little corn 's about all. But they 'd ought to be whar their fahmly is. One o' the women's no good to me, and they 've both got children to feed, an' they can't take care of 'em without the men. The men agreed to stay on the place."

"Well, what do you want us to do?"

"Well, I thought like enough you 'd give me a guard to bring 'em back."

"I have n't any horses, and I can't send men out afoot to hunt up your darkies. They ought to be at home supporting their wives and children, of course; but I guess if the truth was known they 've got plenty of wives and children in other places as well as there."

"Like enough they may, but I know these women belong to 'em. They 're hanging round the quarters pretty often, for I've seen 'em, and talked to 'em. 'T a' nt fur out."

"Say, sergeant," said a soldier, "I'll go out with the old man."

"Will you go? All right, you know what to say to them. It 's just a chance if you get hold of them, though."

"Oh, they 'll be thar. They 'll know I'm away from home to-day."

The old man and the soldier walked off together, and probably the negroes are now at work on the plantation, for whenever they are not brought too closely in contact with the soldiers, so as to receive ill treatment from the badly disposed men who are to be found in every company, they pay unhesitating obedience and respect to a soldier's advice and command. Such, at least, is the testimony given by military men quartered in the country places.

Soon a planter of a better class came in to find out if he could not discharge his negroes. Of course they did n't work to his satisfaction, he said; there was nothing to make them work; employers could n't punish their servants, he believed; punish a negro, and he immediately dropped his hoe and set off for the Yankees. He could manage his negroes if he could have leave to punish them, otherwise they managed themselves, and no work was done.

The sergeant informed him that punishment was not permitted, and probably would not be.

"So I supposed. Well, will the Government take them off our hands? I 'm sure I do n't want mine any longer. I can't feed them, and I do n't want to be bothered with them. They are free, and the Government ought to take them, or it ought to give the employers such power as would enable them to control the negroes and make them work. At any rate, a good part of mine are unable to work, and Government ought to take them."

"Were the negroes on your place at work for you this spring?"

"Yes, they are what I owned."

"Did you make any contract with them?"

"No, I told them to stay and keep on with their work. They were there, and there appeared to be nothing else to do with them. I should have been very glad to have had them go; their work has n't paid for their food."

"You 'll have to keep them on the plantation, sir, for the present. We can't take them until we get different orders in reference to this whole matter. The Government has no place for them, and if they 've worked on your crops all the year so far, I guess they 've got a claim on you to keep them a while longer. At any rate, I can't do anything about it. We 'll do what we can to make them work for you while they stay, but they can't be moved."

The planter went out with every appearance of dissatisfaction, and as he passed out of hearing, the sergeant remarked:

"We have lots of those cases now. That man, now, has worked his niggers till he 's made all his crops, and when his year's work 's done he wants to get shut of 'em."

A very good-looking mulatto man had been standing near the desk while this colloquy was going on, and listened to it with a great deal of interest. In dress he was quite a dandy; his waistcoat and trowsers were snow-white, and he wore a long-skirted uniform coat, that had formerly belonged to some Confederate officer, for it was still garnished with the interdicted buttons. When his turn came to speak, he said that he was a deputy from a number of negroes living out in the country, and that he came in to ask two or three questions.

"All right, go ahead, and ask them."

"Is it true, sir, I hear, sir, that all we colored folks is a goin' to be hired out for five years? I said no, I did n't believe it, but I am informed we is; that 's to be the law."

"No, it a' n't true. You can hire yourselves out for as long as you want to —one year or two years. You can hire out for five years if you like, but nobody 's going to make you. If you can get a good place, I recommend you to hire for as long a time as you can."

"Yes, sir. Well, I got the rights of that, anyhow. Now, sir, some of we would wish to hire land to work for ourself, or, perhaps, buy a piece of ground, and we would wish to know, sir, from you, sir, if we can do it."

"Yes, rent or buy. I do n't know why you can't do it if you can find any one that 'll let you have the ground. There 's no objection to it so far as I know."

"Yes, sir. Well, sir, perhaps we can do so, sir. Perhaps we can do so. But we has n't any horses, or mules, or ploughs, and what we would wish to know is, if the Government would help us out after we get the land. We could rent a place up here if we had some horses to plough, and so on."

"No; the Government has n't any ploughs or mules to give you. You must get those things for yourselves. Well, do you want anything else?"

"Yes." He wanted "a paper, a writing," before he went home, that should authorize him to buy or rent land. It was given him, and he went away contented.

A field-hand was the next applicant: a stalwart young fellow, as straight as an arrow, and perfectly black. He complained that his master had been beating him with a stout stick.

"What did you do to him? You 've been sassy?"

"No, boss; never was sassy; never was sassy nigger sence I'se born."

"Well, I suppose you were lazy."

"Boss, I been working all de time; ask any nigger on de plantashn ef I'se ever lazy nigger. Me! me and dem oder boys do all de work on de plantashn same as 'foretime."

"Well, then, what did he strike you for?"

"Dat jest it, sah. Wot 'd he strike me for? Dat ar jest it. I done nothin'."

"How many of you are there on the plantation?"

"Right smart family on de plantashn, sah. Dunno how many."

"Did he strike any other boy but you?"

"No, sah, me one."

"You must have been doing something?"

"No, boss; boss, I tell you; I'se in at de quarters, me and two o' dem boys, and he came in de do', jump on me wid a stick, say 'he teach me.'"

"What did you do then?"

"Run, come yer."

"Well, now you go back home and go to your work again; don't be sassy, don't be lazy when you 've got work to do; and I guess he won't trouble you."

Very reluctantly the man took his departure.

"That's a sassy looking darkey," said the sergeant. I could not deny it; he certainly had a face that would add much to the force of any insolent speech he might make.

In a minute he came back and asked for a letter to carry to his master, enjoining him to keep the peace, as he feared the man would shoot him, he having on two or three occasions threatened to do so.

"Oh, you go on. He won't shoot you. If he does we 'll have him up here. You go back and go to work, and if he do n't use you well come in again and we 'll see about it." "There 's any quantity of those cases," continued he, "and we could n't begin to hear half nor quarter of 'em. When there 's one that looks bad, we investigate it; but most of 'em are trifling."

This jurisdiction of the military authorities over the relations existing between whites and blacks is very distasteful to the former masters. "Last Sunday," said my landlord at dinner, "the captain here sent out more than ten miles and made a gentleman and his wife come into town and appear before him to answer to some charge one of their own niggers had made against them. I tell you, sir, it 's mighty humiliating. The lady did nothing but cry all the way in and out."

"Did the negro prove his charge?"

"I do n't know. Do n't know whether he did or not. But I know if that captain over there is going to do that, if he 's going to listen to nigger evidence, he 'll have his hands full. Why, we 'd never let a nigger give evidence against anybody but people of his own color. They never gave evidence against a white man in no court in Virginia. But this captain lets 'em, and it would make you laugh to see the way they flock in to him with complaints. Always a crowd."

"Nothing would make me cut a nigger's throat from ear to ear so quick," said a shoemaker at whose shop I stopped for a minute the other day, "as having him set up his impudent face to tell that a thing was n't so when I said it was so. The idea of letting one o' them be sworn to give his evidence! But I'm d—d if they did n't convict the man," he said, continuing a conversation that I had interrupted, "and not a word of evidence against him but them blamed niggers."

Just before dinner I took a stroll through the quiet streets of the town, in company with an officer of the little Federal garrison.

"That house," said he, pointing to one at a little distance, "had a win dow or two broken the other evening. I do n't blame the boys much; whenever any of us went past, if any of the women were outside they would go in, banging the door as they went, or perhaps hurry to the piano and strike up some rebel tune. On this particular evening they were singing:

'Farewell for ever to the star-spangled banner,
No more shall it wave o'er the land of the free.'

They stopped when the stones were sent against the shutters, and sent down a complaint to me the next morning. I told them they should n't be molested, and asked if they would please to give up insulting the men by singing disloyal songs. I do n't suppose the men would have cared about the singing so much, but it 's not that alone. They 're very bitter in these little country places where they have n't seen much of the Yankees yet. The women cross the street if they see us on the same side with themselves, they make faces—indeed, I 've been called after—and the men would be just as bad if they were not afraid to make so open a display. I was in one of the churches on the first Sunday that our company spent here, and, as there was n't any sexton, I thought I 'd find a seat for myself. There was one pew a little way down nearly empty—there was one woman sitting in the end of it—so I opened the door and was going to take a seat there. But the lady rose hastily, looking very angry, and showed that she intended to leave the pew if I took a seat in it. I begged her to be seated again, as I would n't enter against her wishes, and kept on my way down the aisle. There was a chair at the end of it, standing back against the wall, and I took that. Nobody offered me a seat. The minister had seen it all, and when he saw me sitting in the aisle alone he came down from the pulpit and insisted on my going into his pew. I had to go at last, and, returning to the pulpit, he laid away his sermon, and lectured the congregation on the folly of cherishing a rebellious spirit, now that the rebellion is dead, and on the duty of showing themselves good citizens of the United States by living in peace and amity with their fellow-citizens of the North."

One of the citizens of Liberty announces himself as a candidate for a seat in Congress, and expresses opinions that, I dare say, will ensure him a strong vote in his native district:

"I shall favor and encourage the emigration and colonization of the negro population as a measure calculated, under present circumstances, to promote the interest of both races, as well as the repeal of all laws for the confiscation of the property of those who co-operated with the South in the late terrible struggle between the two sections of this country. . . . I shall oppose any law or amendment of the Constitution of the United States having a tendency to give to the negro the right of suffrage, or to so change his status as to place him upon terms of equality with the white man." He can see "no necessity for continuing in the limits of the State armed forces of the United States, and will do all he can to effect their removal."

ENGLAND.—INFANTICIDE AMONGST THE POOR.

LONDON, August 12, 1865.

ARE we better or worse than our neighbors? This is a question which all Englishmen, who think at all on such matters, cannot help asking themselves frequently, and especially at such times as the present, when the columns of our newspapers are literally crowded with the reports of atrocious domestic crimes. I am speaking now not of our public or political, but of our moral character as a nation. Now, if there is one belief firmly implanted in the British mind, it is that we are superior to continental nations in our respect for and practice of the family virtues. No doubt our faith in our general superiority is very strong. Only the other day, I happened to remark in the presence of a large company of really very well educated people that I preferred the French practice of breakfasting in the middle of the day to our own English one of early breakfasts. A lady, who certainly was not a foolish person in ordinary matters, remarked seriously she could not believe anything French was ever better than anything English; and none of the company, except myself, appeared to think the remark absurd or foolish. Thackeray remarks somewhere or other that a Frenchman always thinks it incumbent on him to assert his belief in the pre-eminence of "La France" because he is not quite certain in his own heart that the assertion is just; but that an Englishman is so absolutely confident of his own superiority, he assumes it as a recognized fact. Of course, this exaggerated self-esteem is not found to any great extent among Englishmen of the world; but even men who are very sceptical as to our transcendent merits in other respects, cherish a deep-rooted conviction that our private life is more moral and virtuous than that of other nations. Now a dispassionate observer will not, I think, disregard the weight of this testimony, interested though it may be. There is always some foundation of truth both for an individual's and a nation's estimate of his or its character; and I believe, without national vanity, that, subject to certain very grave qualifications, our opinion of our own virtue rests on a ground-work of fact. I have lived so much of my life out of England that I am well aware there are other virtues in the world besides conjugal fidelity, and other duties besides the family affections, and therefore I do not consider that we are a wonder to gods and men because, on the whole, our educated classes supply a greater proportion of good husbands and wives, good fathers and mothers, than can be found amongst similar classes on the Continent. What may be the value of this fact I do not propose to argue; but I do believe, from considerable experience, that the fact is as I have stated it.

An objector might urge that my theory is upset by the revelations of our divorce court. My answer is, that the importance of these revelations is immensely exaggerated. In the course of a year we have, perhaps, some couple of hundred gross exposures of conjugal vice and domestic misery. It is sad enough this should be the case; but, after all, the proportion of these ill-assorted unions to the total of marriages is infinitesimally small. Having myself long passed the age at which the model citizen ought to marry, and being still a bachelor, I may safely say that I am not prejudiced in favor of matrimony. Yet I can truly say that, as a rule, the married lives of my fellow-countrymen are happy ones, and that people who judge of English life by the disclosures which take place before Sir James Wilde, the successor of the late Sir Cresswell Cresswell, are arguing from the exception to the rule. So far I can speak confidently; as to the wider question, how far this assertion is true of other than the well-to-do classes, I must speak with some hesitation. My own opinion, however, and that of those who have studied the subject far more deeply than myself, is that the English middle class down to its lowest gradation is, on the whole, a very moral one. Clerks, petty shopkeepers, and skilled mechanics are, I should say, quite as moral in their domestic relations as the higher grades of society, if not more so. The real doubt in my mind is about the working classes, especially in the agricultural districts. The habits of life amongst the rural poor are not favorable to morality, and the cost of supporting children is a burden which laboring men, who find life a hard struggle at the best, are unwilling to undergo. In parts of England I am acquainted with, the ceremony of marriage is habitually deferred amongst farm servants till the woman is far gone in pregnancy. As a rule, I should say the standard of morality was low amongst English peasant girls; but, on the other hand, the wives of the same class are commonly virtuous. In fact, in this, as in almost every grade of our society, prostitution is unusually prevalent, but adultery is unusually rare.

The consideration, how far the reputation of morality on which we pride ourselves as a nation is justified by facts, is forced upon us by the repeated instances of child-murder which have lately been brought before the public notice. The other day a mother was tried at Exeter, in company with another woman, on a charge of having murdered her illegitimate child. The suspicion against both prisoners was grave; but there was not proof enough to convict either; when the mother turned "king's evidence," and was placed in the dock as a witness against her accomplice, a Mrs. Winsor, the wife of a Devonshire laborer. The story, as she told it, was a revolting one: this Mrs. Winsor seems to have been a professional murderess, who contrived to let all the girls in the neighborhood who, according to the local phrase, had got into trouble, know that she would make away with their babies for a few shillings. The wretched girl who told the story was a maid-of-all-work, who had been seduced by a man in her own rank of life, too poor to do much for her child. In order to get rid of a burden she could ill support, she, according to her own story, availed herself of the services of Mrs. Winsor, and by her desire was present in the room while the baby was being "smothered between the mattresses." The story, strange as it was, bore the stamp of truth; and Mrs. Winsor was sentenced to death, without hope of pardon, though there is some reason to expect she may be reprieved on account of a technical irregularity in her indictment. Monsters are to be found in every country; and the remarkable feature in this case was not the atrocity of this woman's crime, but the general demoralization which, if the evidence could be credited, was shown to have prevailed in the neighborhood where she lived. By some strange law of causation, which appears to cause crime to come in batches, we have had since this Exeter trial one case of infanticide after the other occurring in different parts of the country. There being a general dearth of news, these exposures attract, perhaps, more notice than they would do otherwise; but the subject is alarming enough in itself to demand grave attention.

As usual, statistical authorities are found ready to explain that the percentage of illegitimate births and the rate of mortality amongst babies not born in wedlock are lower in England than in continental countries. But to do ourselves justice, we care very little about statistics; and the national conscience is not satisfied by learning that infanticide is more common in China or Chili than in Great Britain. Of course, too, there is immense difference of opinion as to the extent to which the practice is carried in England; but there can, I think, be no moral doubt that amidst the needy classes of the community infanticide is what the French call a "cas prévu"—a recognized eventuality. It is much more easy, however, to acknowledge the evil than to suggest a remedy. Our present system, by which mothers are expected to be deterred from killing their children by fear of the gallows, is an utter failure. The practical good sense of the country knows so much allowance must be made for the temptations of shame, distress, and poverty, which cause ninety-nine child-murders out of a hundred, that this crime cannot justly be treated as equivalent to homicide. The consequence is, that our juries will resort to almost any quibble sooner than bring in a woman guilty of wilful murder in cases of the kind alluded to. Unquestionably a diminution of the nominal penalty for infanticide would render its punishment much more certain, and therefore more powerful as a deterrent; but then public sentiment cannot endure to admit formally that child-killing is not murder. Much in the same way, any sensible man knows that foundling hospitals would do a great deal to lessen the number of children killed by their mothers. Whether this advantage would not be counterbalanced by an immense increase in the number of children deserted, is of course an open question. But the fatal objection to the proposal does not consist in its intrinsic merits or demerits, but in the fact that our public cannot tolerate the idea of encouraging the status of illegitimacy. We can never legislate about a subject which we insist on ignoring wilfully. Meanwhile, the sentimental portion of our public critics writes diatribes on the heartlessness of men, and calls for increased severity towards the seducer. The plight of a mother without a husband or protector is sad enough in all conscience, without investing it with artificial colors. As a matter of fact, seduction in the ordinary sense of the word has nothing whatever to do with infanticide in this country. Save in some very exceptional case, the fathers of the wretched little beings who are stifled or strangled by their mothers are poor working-men, who find the bastardy tax of half-a-crown a week impossible or difficult to pay. The absurdity of our system is that this fixed charge, which tells most cruelly on a man earning ten to twenty shillings a week, is a bagatelle to the wealthy profligate; but then, as the late Justice Maule once said in commenting on our fixed tariff of fines for certain offences, "it is the beauty of the law of England that it is the same for the rich and the poor."

For the present, however, nothing will be done. Every now and then we are subject to spasms of public virtue, during which society is called upon to put down immorality by imposing legal and social penalties on the men who take advantage of female frailty; but when once the spasm is over, we relapse to our normal tolerance for all male breaches of morality which do not interfere with matrimonial relations. My own belief is, the only real remedies for infanticide are of a social character. To a household servant in a respectable family, or to an unmarried woman in any employment, out of the fields or the factories, it is almost ruin to be known to have an illegitimate child. If ever there should be such a change in English feeling that the fact of being an unmarried mother should not tell against a girl's chance of getting a situation, servant-maids and shop-girls will have far less temptation to conceal the fact of pregnancy. But, as I have said before, the vast majority of English women who get rid of their children do so not from shame or fear of losing caste, but simply from the difficulty of supporting them—because, in fact, they are too poor to be mothers; and for this evil the only possible remedy lies in the increased prosperity of the working classes. Want is at the bottom of infanticide, as of almost every sin and evil in this country, and I am not sanguine enough to have much faith in political changes removing poverty. After all, the purest democratic government in the world could not supply England with your Western prairies. The presence of sordid, lifelong want amidst vast masses of our population is a fact which any honest foreign critic of England ought to bear constantly in mind, if he would judge us justly; and it is one which Americans, if you will excuse my saying so, are too apt to forget. It is a dark aspect of our social condition this on which I have touched; but my wish is in these letters to give you, as far as I can, an understanding of all questions which agitate the mind of Englishmen.

Ever since I last wrote to you, on Wednesday week, extreme anxiety has been felt with reference to the fate of the Atlantic cable. It is possible you may already have received direct tidings as to the nature of the disaster which has befallen this great international enterprise; but, up to this moment, we are altogether in the dark. That Wednesday appears to have been the crisis of the undertaking. At last the speculating public had, for the first time, begun to believe in the success of the cable; and when the news came early in the morning that some twelve hundred miles had been laid down successfully, the new shares of the Atlantic Telegraph Company were quoted at a small premium on the Stock Exchange. Before the day was over, a telegram was forwarded from Valentia announcing that there was a loss of insulation, or, in plain English, that communication between the shore and the ship had ceased; and since that date we have received no intelligence whatever of other than a speculative kind. It seems that about the time that the accident occurred there was a magnetic storm in the atmosphere of unusual violence, and a number of letters were published in the London papers from high scientific authorities, declaring that in such a storm it was unreasonable to expect messages could possibly be forwarded by the Atlantic cable. The argument was excellent in theory, but its practical value was injured by the fact that throughout the whole of this storm the European submarine telegraphs worked without interruption. But, somehow or other, my experience has been that whatever scientific thesis anybody chooses to propound, he will always find some high authority in science to endorse it with the weight of his opinion. For a day or two the public were pacified with this explanation; but the magnetic storm spent its fury, if the observations of the Greenwich Observatory are to be believed, and still there was no renewal of communication with the Great Eastern. Meanwhile experiments were made, and the electricians came to the conclusion that the break had occurred exactly 1,250 miles from the shore: one authority fixed the point where the solution of continuity took place at 1,175 miles; but the former calculation appears to be the correct one. When it became evident that the accident was not of a temporary character, it was supposed the Great Eastern would return home at once, and it was calculated she would arrive off Valentia by Tuesday last, at the latest. Her lengthened delay, however, somewhat revived the hopes of the shareholders, as it was thought she must be trying to recover the cable and repair the flaw. Then again a despondent fit fell on the public, and there was a rumor, which of course could be traced to no reliable source, that the Great Eastern herself had met with some serious accident. All this, however, is mere guess-work. The only honest critic who ever wrote a life of Shakespeare, remarked that all we knew about him was that there was such a man, and that he had something to do with Stratford-on-Avon. In much the same way, all I, or anybody, can honestly say about the cable is, that we have heard nothing of it since Wednesday week.

There is, I am afraid, far less uncertainty about the approach of the cholera. It is obviously marching westwards—is encamped, if I may use the metaphor, in European Turkey, and has thrown out its outposts into Greece and Italy. In the course of a period more or less short, we must expect it in England. The best feature of the case is that the summer is far advanced, and that before next summer comes the disease, if it reaches us, must have spent its force. Still we have had all the usual atmospheric symptoms which are thought to prognosticate the approach of epidemic maladies; and already we have raging amongst our cattle a strange murrain of an unknown description. It is supposed to come from Russia, where it has almost devastated the herds of the Ukraine; and, oddly enough, like the cholera, it appears to march westwards. There is quite a panic amongst our breeders and graziers on the subject of this plague; but nobody seems yet to know what ought to be done; and while veterinary authorities are quarrelling as to whether the disease is endemic or epidemic, it is spreading rapidly.

The Queen has gone to Germany to be present at the inauguration of a memorial at Cobourg to the late Prince Consort—about the hundredth ceremony of the kind which has taken place. The public are becoming heartily weary of this perpetual glorification of a worthy but commonplace man; and the continued retirement of the Queen tells very much against her personal popularity.

OUT-OF-TOWN SUMMER LIFE.

THE impudent and amusing Sala, in his last very impudent and amusing book, which our publishers did n't republish, and are supposed to have sold him by not selling, among other valuable dicta concerning us, declared that we were "a barbarous people." Sometimes he qualified the disparaging epithet by a prefix, such as "half" or "semi." Of course we repudiate with scorn the general application of the adjective, but there are occasions when a saucy traveller might use it with plausibility at least, for instance, if he had been in Washington the other day at the Harris trial, or had made a brief investigation of our fashionable watering-places. The miserable accommodations at most of the large hotels, the menagerie-like way in which the guests are crowded together at all times, as much from choice apparently as from necessity, the absurd displays of finery in the most inappropriate places, above all and through all the inevitable, irrepressible Jenkins, taking down for publication not only every man's name, but every man's horse—an uncharitable foreigner might say that all these things betokened a thin veneer of doubtful elegance, imperfectly concealing a very imperfect civilization. Not the least unpleasant feature of the whole is, that when real "swells" turn up at these caravanserais, they act as weakly and unintelligently as the rest. All their little absurdities—and a man may be a little absurd within his own four walls, it is a privilege of the individual even in countries not otherwise free—are magnified and exaggerated by the eternal publicity of their sayings and doings.

In two things there is a slight improvement within our recollection. First, free speech has got the better of the hotel-keepers. Twenty years ago the landlords had so "subventioned" the press and bullied individuals that no complaint or exposure of their misdoings could reach the general ear. But now, instead of the reporters being all on the side of the publicans, some of them are on the side of the public. Jenkins is divided against himself. Secondly, it is possible to obtain (which it was not under the old system) a slight portion of privacy, provided you have Fortunatus' purse. You may then procure a parlor to yourself by paying for a single room the hire of an Italian palazzo or a Parisian suite of apartments. Let these small favors be thankfully received. In all other respects, to judge from oral as well as written reports this summer, our fashionable watering-place life seems to be growing more extravagant, uncomfortable, and absurd than ever.

But you are not obliged to go to a fashionable watering-place. Of course not. If you have that purse, you can build your body a lordly pleasure-house or a "chaste cottage." You may even, with proper pains, find a mosquitoless site for it, and thus avoid improper pains. (If you take our advice, you will make sure of this first before landscape-gardening half a mountain, as an enterprising speculator has done not far from this city.) Then you may fill your house with good company, and settle yourself therein at ease for aye to dwell, defying Landlord Grabster and all his works. Or if you are a clever, agreeable, popular man, or a witty and fascinating woman, you may pay Fortunatus a visit. But this latter class is limited enough, and so is the class able to provide for it. It costs no trifling sum to keep up a country house of even very moderate pretensions, the original price of building or purchase being but a small part of the necessary outlay. For persons of moderate means who eschew the fashionable watering-place, the usual alternative is to "board in the country." Having collated the experiences of many persons who underwent this operation in various places, our astonishment has been great that they ever repeated the experiment. It is not so much that your established hours of doing everything are turned upside down, and your provender undergoes a decided change for the worse. These may be accepted as usual results of travelling or any displacement. The great annoyance is that you are obliged to make intimate associates of people with whom, most probably, you have nothing in common. The head of the house will interest himself in your biography and genealogy, and if your grandfather had a second cousin tried for forgery will be sure to find it out. Sairey Jane and Jemimar Ann will insist on sororizing with your daughters. You must either let your standard of propriety and refinement down to that of the family, or be at perpetual feud with them. To be sure, there are lucky exceptions. The land does contain poor gentlemen and ladies, sundry travellers to the contrary notwithstanding, and you may have the fortune to light on a lady in reduced circumstances keeping a country boarding-house. But it is a rare piece of good luck.

In view of these and other drawbacks, it is not surprising that many should advocate and some adopt the plan of passing the summer in town. And a single man who has his club for refuge and consolation might often do much worse. But a summer in town is very hard upon women and children. Indeed, the lord of creation has a double advantage here. If the veriest "pillar" of the club (as the French would call him) feels the brick and mortar enter into his soul and pines for a bit of "greenery," he may rush off to the Adirondacks or some still wilder region, camp out, and snap his fingers equally at Grabster Jenkins and Jemimar Ann. But camp life, like a French novel, was not made virginibus puerisque.

And now, if asked what remedies we have to suggest for this state of things, we candidly confess our inability to think of any. The intense heat and the very imperfect sanitary system of our cities drive pretty much every one out of town who can possibly go. Such inconveniences as are not of climatic origin, may usually be traced to some national foible. Take Jenkins, for instance. In his American development (the animal exists to some extent throughout all the tin region of the world) he is certainly a nuisance; but, nuisance or not, he has come to be a fixed "institution" of the country. Not even another civil war could rid us of him. We are as yet too excitable and sensation-loving a people to take our ease in our own inns or anywhere else, and one of our prime motives for ruralizing, like Pat's for marrying, must be to make ourselves "unasy."

THE COMPETITIVE ELEMENT IN EDUCATION.

The summer season, with its long series of college commencements, naturally calls up before the public mind various questions connected with education. Foremost among these is the great dispute of the humanities and the positive sciences—formation versus information. There are others which recur less frequently, but still crop up every now and then; for instance, the possibility or desirableness of dispensing with the competitive element. Many good men and women certainly believe the suppression of all emulative stimulus both desirable and feasible. Some have said as much in print, and the idea must have been tolerably prevalent last year in Boston, or Mr. Everett would hardly have felt bound to notice it so particularly in his lectures on "University Life."

The principal ground taken by these reformers may briefly be stated thus: "Emulation is a low motive. It corrupts and poisons the minds of youth, introducing jealousies and hatreds." Mr. Everett's answer to this is the obvious one which would occur to most persons of reflection—that emulation is not a bad motive; that it is not to be confounded with envy any more than economy with parsimony, courage with rashness, or any virtue with its resembling vice. Also (though this he rather hints at than fully expresses) that the enlarged application of the principle would bring society to a reductio ad absurdum in a dozen ways; for instance, that no moral and conscientious man could become a candidate for office!

Thus far, however, the case is only half stated. Not only is competition not dangerous to the morality of youth, but it involves a valuable moral lesson. It is no small matter to know how to be beaten gracefully. It is a knowledge that cannot be acquired too soon, and which is in constant demand. Probably the most successful men, taking their whole lives through, fail in more things than they succeed in. Certainly it is the case with the majority of mankind. How frail and hot-house a virtue must that be which is only preserved till manhood by utter ignorance of the temptation which it must encounter at once on its entrance into active life! It is justly considered the extreme of maternal folly to refuse to contradict a child for fear of spoiling its temper; yet the banishment of emulation is advocated for a similar reason, and differs more in degree than in kind.

The argument of the anti-emulationists seems to imply the independent theory of morals as a basis, and on that basis it is thus successfully met. But should any one wish to change the venue, and admit the utilitarian theory, our answer will then be more manifold and even more complete. We may positively begin by admitting their major premise. Suppose emulation is a low motive. What then? Are we not constantly obliged to appeal to low motives? In this very matter of education, has it been found possible to dispense entirely with that very low motive, fear? The difficulty of making all students work fairly, owing to natural indolence and other causes, is such that we must call in the aid of all incentives not actually dishonest on the one hand or cruel on the other. Besides, as the non-competition principle must in consistency also proscribe most branches of gymnastics and nearly all juvenile sports (since competition enters largely into these), it would damage pupils physically even more than intellectually. Some extremists may indeed say that no intellectual or physical development will compensate for a danger incurred by the moral nature. To such persons schools and colleges are altogether superfluous. If they only want their children to learn morality, surely they can teach them that at home. There is, however, a quasi system of morality which is neither independent nor utilitarian, though it sometimes pretends to be one or the other, or both. What to call it we hardly know, whether the negative, the accidental, or the ultra-subjective. It makes every man a measure of all things unto himself, has a radical dislike to any objective rule of action, and specially objects to retribution either in the sense of reward or punishment. It will admit the name of law out of deference to popular prejudice, but the sanctions of law it always dispenses with when it can. This peculiar scheme of morals, which has some prominent and easily recognized representatives among us, is the only one on which the non-emulationists can justly found their theory.

Of course, we do not mean to say that schools and colleges may not be carried out for a certain time with a certain degree of success upon the principle of suppressing competition. The permutations and combinations of circumstances are such that it is hazardous to predict impossibility of any conceivable system. Grote observes that if the Spartan polity had never existed except in philosophical treatises, no one would have admitted the possibility of its existence in fact. A priori reasoning would probably reject as incredible the formation of a polygamous community out of perverted Christians, had we not the living example of the Mormons before us. Large academies and small schools on the non-emulation principle have existed here and in other countries, but they have generally depended for what success they had on the character of their founders, and have not survived them.

Fourierite and Shaker communities can maintain themselves under favorable circumstances for more or less time, but this does not prove the general propriety and expediency of Fourierism or Shakerism.

NEW YORK STATE INEBRIATE ASYLUM.

THE public interest, so strong and prevalent, in the great hygienic and humane experiment which this institution was founded and endowed to realize, as a matter of course languished when a great civil war diverted the charities of the people to the sufferings incident to battle. Now that the war-cloud has passed away, we know of no philanthropic object which has more stringent claims on the liberality and sympathy of our wealthy citizens and all public-spirited friends of social order. The war has vastly increased the victims of intemperance. In thousands of families the inebriate is a source of perpetual anxiety; he is a dangerous inmate, and yet an object of love; his personal safety and that of those who surround him is in constant jeopardy; he needs to be taken care of, and yet cannot be subjected to the requisite guardianship, while his fatal habit may be a disease capable of cure. All these and many other obvious considerations point to the necessity of a safe, healthful, convenient, and comfortable home, where the poor slave to alcoholic stimulants may be cut off from temptation, enjoy salubrious influences, build up his strength, recover his moral tone, and thus be restored to society, a useful, temperate, cheerful man. Such is the aim and object of the New York State Inebriate Asylum. It is at once protective, curative, and reformatory. The enterprise has attracted the earnest attention of physicians and humanitarians at home and abroad. It was ushered into existence under the most auspicious circumstances, and the magnificent edifice that crowns the hill near Binghamton, in the very heart of this State, is the best monument and memorial of the zeal and liberality of those who, ten years ago, began the noble work. But, as we have intimated, the war, and within a few weeks a conflagration—which half destroyed one unfinished wing of the building—have retarded the consummation of a work destined to mark a new era in the annals of science and charity. A recent visit to the institution renewed our confidence in its ultimate and absolute success. One ward being finished, the indefatigable superintendent determined to receive patients at once. Some have been inmates of the asylum for more than a year; and the result is most satisfactory. Brought to this home of the unfortunate—in many instances so shattered in nerve as to be unable to walk from the carriage to the portal—with minds weakened, and limbs quivering, and soul and body degraded—they are now vigorous, cheerful, intelligent men; their families and friends rejoice in their safety and improvement, and they acknowledge that such treatment as they have received could alone have saved them. By a judicious tonic course in the beginning, the physicians ward off the worst immediate effects of sudden abstinence from accustomed stimulants; then wholesome food, judicious exercise, air, and recreation, complete the cure. The library, bowling alley, billiard room, conservatory, chapel, and garden, each furnish enjoyable and salubrious occupation and elevating influences to the recovering body and awakening mind. Gradually the absence of temptation, the quiet and regular life, bring back health and peace of mind; and meantime those who love the unfortunate victim know and feel he is safe, well cared for, and on the road to reform and restoration.

With such objects and results, shall this great charity languish for want of financial or moral support? The establishment is but half completed; the chapel and library, the extensive grounds, the unfinished wings, can advance but slowly towards completion, unless the generous and humane expedite the process by contributing of their substance. It is a sure opportunity for the rich and liberal to connect their names honorably with a great cause and a noble monument, by finishing and endowing the chapel or the library. Meantime, it is pleasant to see how instantly the claims of the institution are recognized the moment they are understood. We noticed between six and seven hundred fruit trees and shrubs—the gift of Ellwanger & Barry, the eminent nurserymen of Rochester; other plants were sent from Mount Hope nurseries; a splendid Alderney bull and fine mare are among other recent donations; and we doubt not the institution will be the recipient of innumerable like favors, to say nothing of special endowments and bequests on the part of those who have had benign experience of its safeguards and reformations. We hope the history, aims, and system of this new, needed, and most effective charity will be examined by our wealthy and benevolent citizens. Let them visit the institution, when passing over the Erie Road; let them consult any of the trustees they know (and the board includes some of the best known and most esteemed persons in every part of the State); let them read the appeals of such men as Everett, or the late Doctors Mott and Francis, and especially the several reports of the Secretary to the Legislature, and they will learn to estimate this institution not only as an honor to the State, but as a blessing to society and a hope for humanity.

PRE-RAPHAELITISM.

THE word printed above has for several years very much annoyed the art-loving public of New York. The customary use of it is one of the most vexatious pieces of art-slang we have. The word has a definite and a very exact meaning, but it is used as if it had twenty meanings, or were a generic term of wide application. Firstly, every odd-looking picture is called, in popular language, "Pre-Raphaelite," especially if the color is at all vivid, or the shadows of unusual sharpness or definiteness. So, secondly, is every work of art in which figures appear, if they assume attitudes less studied in appearance, or more real and less academical than usual. Thirdly, minuteness of detail, especially the careful painting or drawing of foreground objects. Fourthly, every word of criticism which is discriminating, that is, which gives praise here and censure there, with reasons for each. And if this were all, and if pictures and criticism only were so entitled, it would not be so bad. The sale of a bad picture would not be helped nor that of a good one hindered by being called a Pre-Raphaelite picture; and a sound criticism is pretty sure of a hearing and of having something like its due weight, and a foolish one is forgotten while the eyes still rest on the page, and the calling either of them by an arbitrary name will not change the reader's mind. But the unfortunate word is made a slogan, a sort of battle-cry. It is used, as we have said, generically, and in that sense cuts off discussion, removes all chance of a rational opinion being formed, prejudices the hearer of it at once for or against the work in question, and, worst of all, prejudices the hearer for or against a whole class of artists and writers on art. These convenient nicknames and christenings are so convenient for the smart talker! They save so much thought—they enable the uninformed of good memory to appear so much at his ease—they carry a gay party from end to end of a long gallery so smoothly!

It would be well to ascertain how many persons in this city know what the term Pre-Raphaelite means. There cannot be a great many, for, amid all the gossip of the drawing-rooms, chat of the picture-galleries, and smart sayings of the newspapers, we remember but two instances in which the word was appropriately used. The other instances are thousands. One popular supposition is that there are two great schools of painters—the Idealists, who feel and imagine; the Pre-Raphaelites, who see and copy. According to this, Mr. Church has been called a Pre-Raphaelite, and Mr. Palmer is called so every day; a critique on the last Academy of Design Exhibition boldly classed Mr. Griswold's work and Mr. Vedder's together as Pre-Raphaelite. Another conviction, held by people who are thought well informed, is that the Pre-Raphaelites are an American club, or rather a New York City club, who paint and write according to certain principles of their own. Accordingly we were told once, in a grave rebuke of some painter supposed to belong to this supposed club, that "no European community would endure the existence in its midst of so false a school of art." Indeed, it is quite generally supposed that the word at the head of this article is of American devising, and belongs to an American school of art. Another notion, prevailing among those who have travelled abroad, or who have once or twice visited Mr. Jarves' gallery, is this: that the real Pre-Raphaelites were the painters before Raphael, and that there are certain base modern imitators who assume the same name. Thus we have heard Giotto called by the useful name in question; and we once heard a lady say, speaking of a picture by Mr. Eugene Benson, "Yes, very nice; but it is n't as good as the real Pre-Raphaelite pictures I used to see in Italy."

The real Pre-Raphaelites, our readers will agree with us in assuming, are those who invented the name and applied it to themselves—the only school of artists that ever were so self-styled. What this school was, and where located, and whence arising, we shall show. But first it should be stated that, so far as we know, there has never been a Pre-Raphaelite picture painted by any American-born artist; there has never been a Pre-Raphaelite picture in any exhibition of the Academy of Design, except on one occasion, nor elsewhere in New York at all, except in the exhibitions of British Art in 1859 and 1860. There is no modern school of art so little known in this country as this. There is no European school of art which has so few followers in this country. There is no modern school of art of such strongly marked and individual character, and so impossible to be confounded with others. There is only one painter whose work is at all known in the Eastern cities of America who has ever been under the influence of the Pre-Raphaelite school, and he has long ago ceased to show sign of this training. Whether the Pre-Raphaelite influence is a good one or not, whether we regret the fact or not, the fact remains. American art has not as yet been influenced by that famous school, except so far as the immediate personal weight of this one or that one of its more powerful members has made itself felt.

Changes in the feeling and thought of a people come slowly, are not foreseen by the people itself, but suddenly are found to exist. The growth of a popular regard for art or literature is unseen, until it is found to have grown to strength and permanent importance. Thus the modern revival of art begins with the quieting of Europe after the wars with Napoleon; as early as 1815 there were some signs of the new feeling in England, but it was 1840 before its existence could have been plainly perceived by those who watched. By this time its value and strength were made certain. The revival of the mediæval spirit in architecture proved successful. All over Europe people began to care for their Gothic cathedrals and churches. Repairs and restorations, often the most foolish and destructive, it is true, were begun. New ecclesiastical buildings, by a sort of tacit agreement, were built in this style, particularly in the Protestant countries of Europe, the revived classic styles being abandoned to domestic and civil buildings. A course of study of mediæval decoration, and, with this, of the whole subject of ornament, began, which has since led to the happiest results. In painting, the reaction against academic laws and the disposition to study nature and paint honestly for love of nature, though less defined than the moving of the spirit in architecture, was yet clearly to be discerned, even before the year we have named. It is necessary to look at the state of the arts in Europe just before the turning point, and to feel the falseness of aim and feebleness of purpose with which architects and painters were working, with public approval, that the full importance of the change may be felt.

Our present enquiry leads us particularly to England. In England, in 1840, Turner was at the zenith of his power. English popular judgment, though strongly and cruelly pronounced against the rarest and loftiest qualities of his work, was given in favor of its truth and power. English society, while refusing to receive the whole of his message, praised him and approved of the fortune he won by pencil and graver. His contemporaries, with far less power and with but little concentration and definiteness of aim, were under the influence of the growing taste for naturalistic landscape. De Wint, David Cox, Constable, Copley Fielding, Edwin Landseer, and Clarkson Stanfield—probably the six most popular painters of the twenty years between 1830 and 1850—were all landscape painters of avowed naturalistic tendency, quite reversing, by their practice, whatever was taught by the art-writers of the time concerning the greatness of the classical landscape of Claude and his followers. And, at the same time, the course of the architectural revival was steadily pursued by a host of hard students and by an army of designers not often very graceful in design, but nearly always very much in earnest. Begun by Rickman, Willis, Blore, and A. W. Pugin, it was still but a feeble and meaningless art, this new Gothic, when their efforts ceased. But by 1850 it was proved capable of greatness, proved fit to be a complete and rounded art, subduing to itself every material and ornament of every kind.

And it is in 1850 that we first hear of the Pre-Raphaelites. We have dwelt upon the state of architecture as well as the condition of painting at the time, to illustrate the fact that the whole spirit of art was changing at the time. For it is this change in the spirit of art, and not only carefulness and truthfulness, that the new reformers represented. A few young painters formed a society which they called the "Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood," and which was generally denoted by the well known letters "P.R.B." Among them were Dante G. Rossetti, John Everett Millais, W. Holman Hunt, Thomas Seddon, Arthur Hughes, painters, and Thomas Woolner, the sculptor. Their brotherhood was very dear to them, they mentioned it with affection; Millais worked or carved P.R.B. into a chair in one celebrated picture; Rossetti's poems pleasantly allude to it; William B. Scott, brother of the famous David Scott, and a later member of the brotherhood, wrote his loving sonnet "To the Artists called P.R.B.;" Thomas Seddon's delightful letters are full of gratitude and kind thoughts of work and fellow-workmen. At one time a little journal was published called The Germ. It was in this that some of Dante Rossetti's poems first appeared; and in this was the first sketch of Woolner's "My Beautiful Lady," published in 1863 in book form. These poems, like their principal pictures, were full of the loftiest sentiment and pathos. It is clear that the feeling of their work was more to these men than the mechanical excellence of their work, even when they were thought to be principally devoted to faithful copying of nature. Their principles of art may be estimated from their works of art, and may briefly and not unjustly be summed up as follows:

(1.) Religious feeling was a controlling influence over all their actions. The name they chose for their school illustrates this. Had it been faithful and skilful workmanship only or chiefly that they wished to attain to, the name would have been absurd. They looked back to Giotto, Cimabue, Perugino, Angelico; they saw that the art of these men was religious; they saw that with these men skill was secondary, thought and holiness primary; they saw that great art was only possible to artists who cared more to worship than to please the multitude, more to be right than to be praised. They thought that Raphael's influence was of great weight in changing this, and introducing the art which, however great technically, was as indifferent as the other was intense, the art which enthroned Venus beside the Madonna, and painted the legends of mythology as gladly as the scenes of sacred history. They saw that the turning point was Raphael's life and painting at Rome. And they allied themselves to their admired teachers, the early Italian painters, in feeling as well as in name.

(2.) With this came naturally a great respect for the beauty and sentiment of the Middle Ages, for chivalry and chivalric customs, for splendor of dress, ornament, and architecture. In this they were heartily at one with the new Gothic architects and archæologists, whom they helped, and who generally sympathized with and aided them. The Christian Middle Ages, a time most interesting to all students of art, was particularly so to these passionate lovers of the spirit of early Christian art.

(3.) They were deeply in sympathy with the modern respect for quiet domestic feeling and simple incident. In this they are with the poets. Much of the best known work of this school is of the nature of Coventry Patmore's poems and Tennyson's idyls.

(4.) They were unreservedly for faithful representation of nature, and as nearly perfect representation as possible. It was thought, but probably wrongly, that they bound themselves to paint nothing except from the object. It is certainly true that their landscapes were studies of real scenes, and their figures portraits of real people. Different members of the brotherhood, however, were not equally strict in carrying out the principles which governed them all in their course as painters.

Like most important reformatory movements, and quite unlike the contemporary struggle for reform in architecture, the Pre-Raphaelite enterprise was supported by very powerful advocates. The greatest imaginative painters of England were and still are Rossetti, Hunt, and Millais, and of all modern sculptors Thos. Woolner is the most original in his general treatment of subjects. Founded by such mighty men and their diligent and devoted seconders, the new school rapidly gained power and influence over the whole art of England. The names of the confessed adherents of the cause alone make a great list, even taking those which are most salient and at once occur to the memory. We have mentioned six—Rossetti, Millais, Hunt, Seddon, Hughes, and Woolner; there follow T. C. Dobson, H. Wallis, William B. Scott, W. Dyce, John Brett, J. C. Hook, J. Wolf, J. D. Watson, F. R. Pickersgill, C. Keene, E. Byrne Jones, Calderon, and Collins. These are the names that first occur, but the list might be much longer and yet include only honorable and distinguished names. The better and truer artists who had already grown to reputation before Pre-Raphaelitism was heard of, were either influenced by the energy and power of the new men, or else were already working so well up to the limit of their powers that there could have been no change but for the worse. Such were Mulready, J. T. Lewis, William Hunt, John Gilbert, John Leech, Landseer, and Stanfield. The works of these artists would have been solitary among such pictures as filled the halls of the Royal Academy of Arts before the Pre-Raphaelite movement began. Among the pictures of the last ten years they are more at home. For Pre-Raphaelitism has gone through the first phase of its life and has entered on its second. It is hard now to distinguish and draw a line between the new school and the old. Under the strong and self-confident teaching of the reformers, the art of England has changed its nature, and to-day, in England, it is inaccurate to call any painter a Pre-Raphaelite, unless the word is used to denote a member of the original P.R.B. For between the crowd of well meaning and hard working artists and the great chief Dante Rossetti himself, there is no gulf or visible separation. Realistic, pains-taking, purposeful work is the rule with so many painters that they set the fashion. Pre-Raphaelitism as it once was exists no longer, having done its work.

GOLDEN-HAIRED GERTRUDE,

THE CHOICEST OF JUVENILE BOOKS.

BY

THEODORE TILTON,

Editor of The Independent.

Illustrated from original drawings by H. L. Stephens. Printed on heavy tinted paper of finest finish. Nearly ready.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 Park Row, N. Y.

NEW BOOKS

JUST PUBLISHED BY

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

LIFE AND GENIUS OF SHAKESPEARE.

By RICHARD GRANT WHITE.

Crown 8vo, $2 50.

VOL. I., SHAKESPEARE.

This volume completes the Works of Shakespeare, edited by RICHARD GRANT WHITE, in 12 vols.

THE SPEECHES OF JOHN BRIGHT OF THE AMERICAN QUESTION.

Crown 8vo, $2 00.

BOOKS IN PRESS.

L., B. & CO. will publish, September 2,

PIONEERS OF FRANCE IN THE NEW WORLD.

By FRANCIS PARKMAN, author of the "History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac," etc., etc. Small 8vo. Being the first volume of a Historical Series, entitled FRANCE AND ENGLAND IN NORTH AMERICA, and consisting of a succession of Histories and Memoirs relating to the conflict of the leading European Powers for the possession of this Continent. (Part II.—THE JESUIT IN THE WILDERNESS, in preparation.)

September 5,

THE LIFE AND SPEECHES OF ANDREW JOHNSON,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Edited by FRANK MOORE.

GRIMM'S LIFE OF MICHAEL ANGELO.

Translated by F. E. BUNNETT.

2 vols. crown 8vo.

September 9,

EPICTETUS.

Translated by ELIZABETH CARTER, and edited by T. W. HIGGINSON.

Ready in December,

THE LIFE AND PUBLIC SERVICES OF SAMUEL ADAMS.

By his Great-grandson, WILLIAM V. WELLS.

3 vols. 8vo.

IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

In Twelve Monthly Volumes, crown 8vo, price $2 25 each,

THE WORKS OF THE RIGHT HON. EDMUND BURKE.

REVISED EDITION.

Volume I. now ready.

The publishers will send the volumes as issued, free of expense to Subscribers, upon the receipt of $2 25.

UNITED STATES CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

TO ALL WHO HAVE PARTICIPATED IN ITS WORK.

It is the purpose of the Executive Committee to publish a HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN COMMISSION, and also a COLLECTION OF AUTHENTIC AND VALUABLE INCIDENTS—such as will prove a worthy Memorial of its work. The Secretaries have been instructed to enter at once upon the preparation of these volumes, and to complete them as soon as may be consistent with fulness and thoroughness.

We would respectfully ask all who have wrought in the service of the Commission, and all who have witnessed its operations, to forward any materials that will assist in giving value and completeness to these Memorial Records. Ladies who have been connected with Ladies' Commissions and Aid Societies; Gentlemen of Auxiliary Societies and Army Committees; Agents, Delegates, Diet-Kitchen Managers, and Missionaries of the Commission and its Branches; Chaplains, Officers and Men in the Army and Navy, and in the Civil Service; Officers and Members of Co-operating Societies; Pastors, Editors, Publishers, and other friends of the Commission;—all who can furnish reminiscences, facts, and incidents that will illustrate the spirit and method of the Christian Commission, at home and in the field, will please communicate them at their earliest convenience.

We are especially anxious to obtain any and all notices of labors similar to those of the Commission prior to its organization. Such labors were performed in the home-camps and gathering places of the early troops, and several deputations of Christian men visited the early battle-fields and posts of occupation to minister among the men. We wish the facts from those who best know them. We desire also the reports of personal enterprises and local associations that preceded the formation of the Commission and afterwards became identified with it.

If any one can point us to a similar organization or a similar work in the wars of previous ages and other countries,—thus furnishing historical parallels or illustrations,—we shall esteem it a very great favor.

The History will be prepared by Rev. LEMUEL MOSS, Home Secretary.

The Volume of Incidents by Rev. E. P. SMITH, Field Secretary.

Communications may be sent to either of the Secretaries above named at the rooms of U. S. Christian Commission, 13 Bank Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

GEO. H. STUART, Chairman.

July 28, 1865.

EVERETT MEMORIAL,

Containing the action of the different societies of which he was a member, and the

EULOGIES OF HIS MOST EMINENT COMPEERS,

embracing in all forty-two

ADDRESSES BY DISTINGUISHED MEN.

1 vol. royal 8vo, tinted paper, 315 pp.; two steel plates; morocco cloth, green and gold. Price $5 00.

ONLY 100 COPIES FOR SALE.

A HISTORY OF WILLIAMS COLLEGE.

BY REV. CALVIN DURFEE,

Assisted by Hon. Joseph White, Professor Hopkins, Professor Tutlock, D. A. Wells, A.M., and others.

1 vol. 8vo, 429 pp.; two steel portraits, three wood-cuts. Price $2 50.

JAQUES' RULES FOR CROQUET.

THE MOST COMPLETE AND ELEGANT EDITION OF THE RULES YET PUBLISHED.

8vo; 16 plates and diagrams; morocco cloth, green and gold. Price 75 cents.

N.B.—The attention of the trade is called to this edition of the Rules of Croquet, which, from its elegant style and clear illustrations, meets with the most ready sale.

AN ATTRACTIVE JUVENILE.

EDITH PRESCOTT;

OR,

LESSONS OF LOVE,

BEING

AUNT BERTHA'S VISIT TO THE ELMS.

BY EMMA MARSHALL.

16mo, cloth, all bright colors; 251 pp.; illustration on tinted paper. Price $1 25.

"It is a tale of English life, very engagingly told, and superior in style and treatment to most of the juveniles of the day."—DR. HOLLAND ("Timothy Titcomb").

A. WILLIAMS & CO., PUBLISHERS,

100 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

OUR MARTYR PRESIDENT.

Now Ready, Price $2,

AGENTS WANTED.

STIER'S WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

HEARTHSTONE SERIES.

SCHÖNBERG-COTTA WORKS.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL BOOKS.

A complete library can be made up from our stock, which includes the lists of all the societies of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.

Terms as low as can be had of the publishing houses.

BOOKS FOR SALE BY

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus,	Barnes' Notes,
Lange's Commentary on Matthew,	Bush's "
Knapp's Christian Theology,	Jacobus' "
McKnight on the Epistles,	Edwards' Works,
Home's Introduction,	Woods' "
Alexander's Commentary,	Kitto's "
Hodge's "	Shedd's Christian Doctrine,
Olshausen's "	Schaff's Church History,
Henry's "	Mosheim's " "
Benson's "	Eusebius' " "
Clark's "

Also, a great variety of Theological Works, Sermons, etc. A liberal discount to ministers.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 PARK ROW, New York.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen,
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

THE

ATLANTIC MONTHLY

FOR

SEPTEMBER, 1865,

IS NOW READY.

The Table of Contents is as follows:

Coupon Bonds, I.; Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship; Needle and Garden, IX.; Scientific Farming; Dr. Johns, VIII.; Natural History of the Peacock; Up the St. Johns River; A New Art Critic; The Luck of Abel Steadman; Sonnet; The Capture of Jeff. Davis; The Chimney Corner, IX.; A Visit to the Edgeworths; On a Pair of Old Shoes; Commemoration Ode; Our Militia System.

The following writers contribute to this number: Prof. J. R. LOWELL, Mrs. H. B. STOWE, GAIL HAMILTON, author of "Life in the Iron Mills," T. W. PARSONS, C. J. SPRAGUE, T. W. HIGGINSON, J. T. TROWBRIDGE, DONALD G. MITCHELL, T. B. ALDRICH, D. A. WASSON, Mrs. FARRAR, EUGENE BENSON.

OUR YOUNG FOLKS

FOR

SEPTEMBER, 1865,

IS PUBLISHED THIS DAY.

The Articles and Writers in this number are as follows:

The Lights on the Bridge, by Lucy Larcom; Apologizing, by Gail Hamilton; Margery Grey, by Julia C. R. Dorr; The Cloud with the Silver Lining, by Mary N. Prescott; Farming for Boys, VIII., by the Author of "Ten Acres Enough;" The Swallow, by Charlotte Kingsley Chanter: Lessons in Magic, V., by P. H. C.; Winning His Way, by Carleton; A Few Plain Words to My Little Pale-faced Friends, by Dio Lewis; Half-hours with Father Brighthopes, II., by J. T. Trowbridge; Aunt Esther's Ruler, by Harriet Beecher Stowe; Among the Studios, I., by T. B. Aldrich; The Boy of Chancellorsville, by Edmund Kirke; Stars at Bed-time, by Mrs. Anna M. Wells; Round the Evening Lamp.

TERMS OF THE MAGAZINES:

THE ATLANTIC. Four Dollars per year for single subscriptions.

CLUB RATES.—Two Copies for Seven Dollars; Five Copies for Sixteen Dollars; Ten Copies for Thirty Dollars, and each additional copy Three Dollars. For every Club of Twenty Subscribers an extra copy will be furnished gratis, or Twenty-one Copies for Sixty Dollars.

OUR YOUNG FOLKS. Two Dollars per year for single subscriptions.

CLUBS.—Three Copies for Five Dollars; Five Copies for Eight Dollars; Ten Copies for Fifteen Dollars; Twenty Copies for Thirty Dollars, and an extra copy gratis to the person forming the Club of Twenty.

THE TWO MAGAZINES—the Atlantic and Our Young Folks—will be sent to one address for Five Dollars.

Postage must be paid at the office where the Magazines are received.

☞ All subscriptions are payable in advance.

All letters respecting the Magazines should be addressed to the Publishers,

TICKNOR & FIELDS,

Boston, Mass.

For sale by AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, Wholesale Agents, and by B. H. TICKNOR, Retail Agent for the sale of Ticknor & Fields' Publications, 823 Broadway, New York.

VALUABLE STANDARD WORKS

PUBLISHED BY

D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 BROADWAY.

JOMINI'S LIFE OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON I. Translated from the French, with notes by Maj.-Gen. H. W. HALLECK, LL.D. 4 vols. 8vo, with an Atlas; cloth, $25; half morocco, $35.

JOMINI'S GRAND MILITARY OPERATIONS; or, History of the Wars of Frederick the Great. Translated from the French by Col. S. B. HOLABIRD, U.S.A. 2 vols. 8vo, with an Atlas; cloth, $15; half morocco, $21.

BOYNTON'S HISTORY OF WEST POINT. With maps and illustrations. 1 vol. 8vo; cloth, $6; half calf, $7 50.

ROEMER'S CAVALRY. Its History, Management, and Uses in War. By J. ROEMER, LL.D. With illustrations. 1 vol. 8vo; cloth, $6; half calf, $7 50.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE well known conservatism and adherence to established custom that forms so striking an element in English character receives marked illustration from the habitudes of the publishing business in London. Readers of the memoirs and diaries of Byron, Walter Scott, or Moore, will not need to be reminded of the continual reference made in them to Mr. Murray and Messrs. Longman. In plain prose or jocose rhyme these gentlemen are constantly apostrophized or animadverted on, and they have been so long near the immortals that they seem to share in their perennial youth. What was true in 1815 is now pretty exactly reproduced fifty years later in 1865, as regards the relative position of the two firms to each other and to the book trade of England. Stars have risen and set in the interval—houses have been established and dissolved. Some have made fortunes, like Mr. Colburn and Mr. H. G. Bohn—others failures, and many important concerns flourish collaterally; but still the chief literary interest of the season concentrates around the lists of announcements put forth from Albemarle Street and Paternoster Row. Though similar in the position they maintain before the public, there are remarkable differences between the two houses. The present and third John Murray bears "no brother near his throne"—like his father and grandfather, he reigns alone, and deals in no books but those bearing his own imprint. Messrs. Longmans' firm, on the contrary, though with a hereditary backbone of "Longman" (since the first of that name came up a boy from Bristol about 130 years since), has always comprised many partners, so as to keep up a steady influx of mercantile ability. They also, besides selling their own books, do what is called here a large "jobbing business" in the publications of other houses; and since the conflagration that destroyed the stores, dating from the fire of London, in which they used to burrow, are the best lodged bookselling firm in England. Though business still seeks the channels it did fifty years since, its character has remarkably changed. Then it was poetry that offered the chief prizes of authorship and publication. The names of poets then living and writing will occur to every one. Now, as a commercial interest, it is utterly dead. Classical literature, history, biography, and travels retain about the same hold on the public that they then possessed. The departments where the greatest accession of activity is visible, and for which a new world of readers has sprung up, are natural and physical science, theological criticism, the fine arts, and prose fiction. Darwin, the naturalist, has beaten his grandfather, the poet, out of the field—practical interests prevail, even romance grows tame—and Thos. Moore, Rogers, and Campbell might sing in vain to the audience who gather round Dr. Colenso, Ruskin, and Anthony Trollope.

Mr. Murray's last list of books, announced to appear in the fall, or some more distant season, is rather a meagre one. A book that will attract notice in this country is "The Correspondence of King George III. with Lord North during the American War." Portions of these letters have appeared in Lord Brougham's "Sketches of Statesmen," but the present publication of them "from the originals in her Majesty's Library, printed by Royal permission," and edited by Mr. Bonham Donne, will be undoubtedly more complete and attractive. Dr. Livingston's "Narrative of his Exploration of the Zambezi" may be speedily looked for. Mr. Smiles' "Lives of Boulton and Watt, comprising a History of the Invention and Introduction of the Steam Engine," is promised, copiously illustrated in the elegant style of the "Lives of the Engineers," of which it will make a fourth volume. Mr. Charles Darwin's scientific work, "Domesticated Animals and Cultivated Plants, or Principles of Variation, Inheritance, Reversion, Crossing, Inter-Breeding, and Selection under Domestication," in illustration of the views he has heretofore defended, will be looked for with interest. Dr. William Smith's "Concise Dictionary of the Bible" aims at popularizing, in one volume of 1,008 pages, the results of study and investigation that fill the three ponderous royal octavos of the original work. A new series of popular books, to be called "Choice Travels," will commence with Hon. Robert Curzon's well known "Visits to the Monasteries of the Levant," and for the succeeding volumes Mr. Murray will have an ample store of material at command from the number of books of travel originally published by him in expensive forms. One series of the "Wellington Despatches" is no sooner completed by the publication of the twelfth volume—relating to the occupation of France by the allied armies under command of the Duke, and his measures for settling that kingdom—than another is announced to begin, extending from 1819 to the termination of the Wellington administration in 1830, adding probably some twenty solid octavos to the materials of the future heavily tasked historian. "Chinese Miscellanics," by Sir John Davis; "Notes on the Battle of Waterloo," by Lieut.-General Shaw Kennedy; an illustrated work by L. Gruner on the "Brick and Marble Polychromatic Architecture of Italy;" a translation of Prof. von Sybel's "History of the French Revolution;" and a few others of less importance, nearly exhaust a list not rich in promise.

—The entire history of letters contains no sadder chapter than that unfolded in the "Life of John Clare," who was known some fifty years ago as the "English Burns" and the "Northamptonshire Poet." His origin was socially lower than that of Burns—he sprang from the humblest stratum of agricultural laborers. Gifted with a tremulous sensibility of the beauties of nature, and acquiring unconsciously a power of expression delicate, refined, and picturesque, that placed him high among the poets of the time, every step he took forward, every new acquisition, only added to his distresses and more deeply branded his misery. Coarse even in their kindness, the country gentry who gazed at him as a phenomenon (happily a rare one), thought he was well rewarded for his verses by a dinner with their servants in the kitchen. Would-be patrons were offended at his sensitive feeling of independence. The literary world to which he was introduced, by a kindly notice by Gifford in the "Quarterly Review," had more admiration for him than solid reward; and at last the acute struggle for bare existence ended with his being consigned to the County Lunatic Asylum, where he remained forgotten and unvisited, even by his wife and children. The last verses he ever wrote, shortly before his death, after twenty-two years' confinement, were these—solemn and fitting finale to such a career:

"I am! yet what I am, who cares or knows?
My friends forsake me like a memory lost;
I am the self-consumer of my woes,
They rise and vanish, an oblivious host—
Shadows of life whose very soul is lost;
And yet I am—I live—though I am tossed

"Into the nothingness of scorn and noise,
Into the living sea of waking dream,
Where there is neither sense of life nor joys,
But the huge shipwreck of my own esteem,
And all that's dear. Even those I loved the best
Are strange—nay, they are stranger than the rest.

"I long for scenes where man has never trod,
For scenes where woman never smiled or wept,
There to abide with my creator, God,
And sleep as I in childhood sweetly slept:
Full of high thoughts unborn. So let me lie
The grass below; above, the vaulted sky."

They are given by Mr. Frederick Martin in his lately published memoir, and we see that a complete edition of Clare's Poems is announced for the benefit of his widow and children.

—Mr. Howard Staunton's "Great Schools of England" is one of the books that perform an acceptable service creditably and satisfactorily. When a gentleman figures in such diverse lines of employment as editing Shakespeare and compiling manuals and hand-books for chess-players, it throws a suspicion of "job work" on his literary undertakings; but whether just or not, and to whatever inspiration its appearance is owing, "The Great Schools of England" is a welcome addition to our stock of information. It is said, and correctly, of the English endowed school: "No original, no counterpart, no copy of it is to be found abroad, and it bears no resemblance to any foreign institution, under whatever denomination, where boys are assembled for educational purposes." At once so peculiar and so influential—so general in their broad characteristics, so varying and diversified among themselves in the special features of each—it is not surprising that curiosity should be felt respecting these establishments. Their "foundation, endowments, and discipline" are copiously described in Mr. Staunton's book. He also gives a topographical account, with drawings, of each locality, and a glimpse of the eminent masters and scholars that have been connected with each school. Though rarely visited by American tourists, there is much to reward inspection in these unique institutions. Some, as Eton and Harrow, are remarkable for beauty of site; others, as Rugby, Winchester, and Westminster, for association with eminent men. This, indeed, attaches to all of them, and is one of the most powerful links that connect the England of past days with the actual life of the present.

—The revival of metaphysical studies lately alluded to is not to proceed unmolested. A warning voice issues from Philadelphia, where Messrs. Lippincott announce, by an author whose family name is known to science, James Rush, M.D., a work with this trenchant title: "Brief Outline of an Analysis of the Human Intellect, intended to rectify the scholastic and vulgar perversions of the natural purpose and method of thinking, by rejecting altogether the theoretic confusion, the unmeaning arrangement, and indefinite nomenclature of the metaphysicians." This "brief outline" will form two volumes octavo. "Forewarned is forearmed," and we trust that Messrs. Mansel, Mill, Grote, etc., will be prepared for the threatened attack that is to dissipate their science into thin air. Messrs. Lippincott's list of forthcoming books contains the names of others well worthy of notice. Among them are "Inner Rome: Political, Religious, and Social," by Dr. Butler, professor of ecclesiastical history in the Divinity School, Philadelphia; "Bracton, and his relation to Roman Law," a contribution to the history of Roman law in the Middle Ages, translated by Brinton Coxe from the German of Prof. Carl Guterbrock, of Königsberg; "Curious Facts in the History of Insects, including Spiders and Scorpions: a Complete Collection of the Legends, Superstitious Beliefs, and Ominous Signs connected with Insects, together with their uses in Medicine, Art, and as Food, and a Summary of their remarkable Injuries and Appearances," by Frank Cowan: this must be a curious book, more resembling some of the German collections of "Folk Lore" than anything we have in America; "The Western Orator," exemplifying popular parliamentary, forensic, and dramatic eloquence, dialogue, poetry, humor, and burlesque, by Prof. Edgarton, of Ohio State Law College.

—When the edition of his works now in preparation has appeared, James Madison will take his place on the literary shelf alongside of Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, Franklin, Samuel and John Adams, Clay,

Webster, and their fellows. The production of good editions is the best sign of appreciation that can be given, and any American should be proud to own the noble series of books, which may easily be brought up to over one hundred volumes in number, where lie enshrined the undying remains of the fathers of their country's greatness. As long ago as 1848, the papers of Mr. Madison were purchased by Congress from his widow for the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars. It is from these papers, under the direction of the joint Library Committee of Congress, that the present impression is derived. It will contain Mr. Madison's correspondence from 1769 to 1836—his famous pamphlets, "Examination of the British Doctrines" (1806), "Political Observations" (1795), and other political essays, and also his lighter productions, as the apologue of "Jonathan and Mary Bull," his "Letter on Napoleon's Return from Elba," his "Note for the Princess" (now Queen Victoria), and his "Advice to my Country," etc. It is expected the whole will be included in four volumes octavo. There is one other work necessary to complete this political and historical series that we hope some day will see published. We allude to the papers of Albert Gallatin. From his exact and critical habits of accuracy, the copious MSS. he left cannot fail to be of great value. They are still, we believe, in the possession of his family, who have not the same motive for parting with them that have operated in many similar cases. Still, the nation is the best guardian of such material for its history, and a Congressional edition of them is a national tribute and an enduring monument of past services rendered to a grateful country.

—Unwritten chapters of the world's history crowd upon us from all quarters. The truth illustrated by Mrs. Barbauld's familiar story, "Eyes and no Eyes, or the Art of Seeing," was never better exemplified than by modern archæological discoveries. The faculty of sight grows with the knowledge of the thing worthy of being seen, as every day's experience proves. "Lake Habitations and Pre-historic Remains of Northern and Central Italy," by Prof. Gastbaldi of Turin, a translation of which forms the last published of the Anthropological Society's volumes, extends to a new field the area of the phenomena now familiar to us on the northern side of the Alps. The relics found in the turbaries that fill the dry lake-basins on the southern slope of the mountains that bound the valley of the Po resemble in general character the pile-founded villages and dwellings on the Swiss lakes, and show the prevalence in both countries of a civilization existing under similar physical conditions. In the early marl beds of Central Italy relics of man are traced as elsewhere in connection with the remains of fossil and extinct animals, while in the later deposited strata of the same composition these evidences of man's occupation continue and increase in variety and skill of workmanship, till at last they are found contemporaneously with objects that unquestionably date from the Roman era. This synchronism is a point of great interest, and has nowhere else occurred. From the north of Scotland comes a note of similar researches—Mr. Samuel Laing, M.P. for the Wick Burghs, being about to publish a work on the recently discovered "Pre-historic Remains of Caithness," including a memoir by Prof. Huxley on the skulls and other human remains. This will doubtless revive the controversy commenced with some acrimony last autumn on the question whether the ancient inhabitants of Scotland were cannibals. It may be remembered that the evidence on which Prof. Owen decided for the affirmative was the scientific skill shown in cracking the jaw-bones of some youthful crania found in Caithness, for the evident purpose of getting at the medullary deposit within. The suggestion, however, excited a storm of indignation, and Prof. Huxley's testimony will be eagerly looked for.

—The election for Westminster is scarcely over when the death is announced of the unsuccessful candidate, Mr. W. H. Smith. He was at an advanced age to seek for Parliamentary honors, being in his seventy-fourth year. The particular talent that brought fame and fortune to him was a quick apprehension of the possible bearing of the railway system of transit on the circulation of newspapers, and the foresight that the railway stations throughout the country would in future form the great markets for light and current literature. By contracts on most of the great trunk lines, he secured within his control both of these great levers of business, and was able to dictate his own terms to the Times and other morning papers, and to make or mar the fortune of any enterprise in cheap literature by the power of granting or refusing its admission to his railway book-stalls. He possessed great power of organization, and commanded respect from those he came in contact with. The large supplies of the Illustrated London News, Punch, etc., called for in America previous to the war, reached the distributing agents in New York through his establishment.

—By the recent death of Professor Aytoun, Scotland has lost one who did good service to the land of his nativity, and kept up the traditions of Scottish Toryism with somewhat of the old spirit displayed in its triumphant days of George IV.'s reign, ere reform was. He belonged to the school of Scott, Wilson, and Lockhart, and inherited the tastes of a past generation from them. He is rather conspicuous for a general sense of cleverness (in the English sense) apparent in what he undertook, than for anything actually achieved. His "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers" so well imitate poetry that the Tory part of the nation accepted them as such. His "Firmilian, a Spasmodic Tragedy," is that tedious thing, an overdone joke. "Bothwell" is never heard of now. "Bon Gaultier's Ballads" are good specimens of parody, the lowest kind of wit. Some comic prose sketches in "Blackwood's Magazine," "The Glenmutchkin Railway," etc., have more real vitality than any other of his writings, though he failed signally as a novelist with "Norman Sinclair." The Professor was born in 1813; brought up to the Scotch bar; and in 1845 he received the appointment of professor of rhetoric and belles-lettres in the University of Edinburgh; he married the youngest daughter of Professor Wilson; in 1852 was made sheriff and vice-admiral of Orkney (which would seem to show that jobbing was not yet extinct in Scotland), and had been for some years in a failing state of health.

—The great national work in French literature, "Histoire Littéraire de la France," commenced by the Benedictines, and now being continued by a commission of the Institute which includes the names of Guingené, Daunou, Renan, etc., is being reprinted at Paris, the early volumes in particular having become very scarce. The new edition is supervised by M. Paulin Paris, and is brought out in royal octavo at twenty francs per volume. The work reaches at present the fourteenth century in 23 volumes quarto. The demand for substantial books in France is evidenced by the reprint of many other important works of the last century, the existing copies of which are insufficient to supply the demand. Among them are Ceillier's standard "Histoire des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques," in 21 volumes quarto, and the great "Acta Sanctorum," the famous collection of lives of the saints by the Bollandists, in fifty or sixty folios. Some years since copies of this work were of little more value than waste paper, but now such is the eagerness shown in mediæval studies that one if not two reprints of the entire work, also in folio, are now in progress. On a smaller scale, the same kind of demand will tend to the same results in England and America. The existing stock of English books on the early literature of the country is entirely insufficient to satisfy the constantly increasing American demand. An ample subscription list might now be got for really good and handsome reprints of Sir Egerton Brydges' "Censura Literature," "Restituta," and "British Bibliographer," the "Retrospective Review," Dibdin's "Typographical Antiquities," Ritson's various works, "The Harleian Miscellany," "Dodsley's Old Plays," etc., books that are rapidly becoming unfindable in England (where, when they were made, nothing but the small local demand was calculated on), and wanted for every American library of any pretensions. Mr. Francis's edition of John Payne Collier's "Account of the Rarest Books in the English Language," now in progress at Cambridge, is a first step in this direction, and some of our astute publishers will not be slow to follow it up.

MILL ON HAMILTON.*

THE subject of this work "is not Sir William Hamilton, but the questions which Sir William Hamilton discussed." Many of these, though originating in the school of philosophy of which Sir William Hamilton is the most eminent representative of the present generation, and though often ignored under the general designation of metaphysics by the school to which Mr. Mill belongs, are questions which he regards as important enough to justify his elaborate work. "A true psychology," he says, "is the indispensable scientific basis of morals, of politics, of the science and art of education," and "the difficulties of metaphysics lie at the root of all science." In his work on logic, and in many of his shorter essays, there is manifested the same appreciation of metaphysical studies, with which, however, he always deals warily, and he has reserved as the work of his maturest powers the complete definition and defence of his metaphysical opinions. Questions which often engage the attention and tempt the powers of immature thought Mr. Mill has reserved for his latest work, and he has thereby contributed to philosophy most important additions.

Much more space is given, it is true, to dissecting and estimating Sir William Hamilton's special opinions and characteristics than the proposed design of the work seems to warrant, but this does not diminish in the least its interest, nor in fact its positive value as an exposition of the opinions it advocates. A master in the tactics of philosophical polemics, Mr. Mill strikes very effective blows for his own opinions, and builds on the ruin he makes of the best accredited rival philosophy. Disciples of this philosophy may justly object, however, that the opinions they hold are not responsible for the defects of a teacher, even of so unquestionable a master as Sir William Hamilton; and his very excellences seem to us to furnish the vantage ground from which his critic makes so effective an assault on the opinions of his school. Few writers of this school present so clearly and distinctly the fundamental questions of metaphysics as Hamilton. His statements have such precision and scientific distinctness that his critic is able to exhibit even in his own words the contradictions and inconsistencies which abound in his writings.

* "An Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy, and of the principal Philosophical Questions discussed in his writings. By John Stuart Mill." Boston: William V. Spencer. 1865. 2 vols., pp. 330 and 354.

Many of these, however, are, we think, apparent rather than real, and are explicable from the metaphysician's point of view, which Mr. Mill does not appear to us to have clearly comprehended. We willingly concede that so far as perfect candor, most patient study, and an earnest desire to ascertain Sir William Hamilton's opinions could avail, Mr. Mill's examination is all that could be desired. But something more than justice is required of a critic in matters so difficult and profound. Sympathy—a certain degree of sympathy—is essential to supply the links and concordances of thoughts, which were never reduced to a coherent system, but were scattered through the writings of many years, and stand much in need of a commentary—not by an opponent, but by an admiring and competent disciple. It is not less true of a philosophical system than of a religious creed, that to judge it competently one must first believe in it, and then, perhaps, cease to believe in it—at least lose the ardor of the disciple.

Although Mr. Mill is by no means so far removed in opinion from the school of philosophy which Hamilton represents as many of his own school are, he is none the less separated from it by that fundamental division which has maintained two great schools throughout the whole history of speculative thought; a division which is at bottom one of feeling and mental character, and one in which no love is lost. No philosopher has had the genius to arbitrate between them. Not even Mr. Mill, sagacious and just as he is, is generous enough to catch the spirit and point of view of his opponents in speculative matters.

We cannot give an adequate illustration of this defect from the topics of Mr. Mill's book without exceeding the limits of this article. It may suffice to point out one misinterpretation of Hamilton's doctrines, as we conceive them, which is fundamental, and plays an important part in the "Examination." Mr. Mill attempts to prove that the doctrine of "the relativity of human knowledge as held by Sir William Hamilton" is in direct conflict with Hamilton's doctrine of the perception of the primary qualities of matter, two doctrines on which his fame as a philosopher chiefly rests. Nothing could be more damaging to Hamilton's reputation than this criticism, if it be true. Minor defects and inconsistencies in his writings might be accounted for on grounds not dishonorable to his character as a philosopher; but if the two principal doctrines, on which he has expended so much learning and labor, are incompatible with each other, then indeed his sagacity was much at fault.

After an introduction, in which Mr. Mill sets forth the scope of his work, he discusses in the second chapter the authentic meanings of the phrase "relativity of knowledge," and the varieties of the doctrine as held by different philosophers. In its simplest form the doctrine is this, that we know only our sensations, and know not any other things save as existences which, in themselves unknown, produce sensations in us. Other things are only supposed, not known; and are only supposed as powers to produce sensations, not as reasons or inmost natures, which might explain the phenomena of sensation. They are as inmost natures inexplicable, and cannot be described in known terms, but only as the unknowable. This doctrine is fundamental in one of the two great systems of metaphysics, but can be understood in a less definite sense. If a philosopher should hold that some properties of things are not powers to produce sensations in us, but existences, which like our sensations are immediately known, he would not hold, our author thinks, to the relativity of knowledge in a perfectly definite sense. He might mean that all knowledge is a mixture of the relative and absolute kinds, but he ought not to affirm that all knowledge is relative.

The author then comes to the discussion of the meaning in which Hamilton taught the relativity of knowledge. Hamilton affirms the complete relativity of human knowledge, but in his doctrine of natural realism he appears to deny it. He affirms it of the secondary qualities of matter, such as colors, odors, tastes, etc., but denies it of the primary qualities, such as extension, figure, resistance, etc. The existence of matter as the cause of sensations can only be affirmed, Hamilton thinks, by being known immediately and in itself as extended. An extended something is immediately known, the property of extension not being a power to produce a sensation or a group of sensations, but an existence known as immediately as our sensations are. By "immediate" Hamilton does not mean non-relative to us, but without the intervention of a representative object or sensation. The knowledge is immediate, though the thing is related to us in the act of knowledge. But Mr. Mill enquires whether this knowledge is supposed to involve more than exists in this relation; that is, whether this immediate knowledge is of anything non-relative to us. Hamilton appears to think that it is, and he therefore appears to hold that the knowledge is not wholly relative to us. Hamilton asserts in the plainest terms, says Mr. Mill, that this immediate knowledge of things "is a knowledge of somewhat in the thing ulterior to any effect on us;" but in his doctrine of the relativity of knowledge he asserts that neither matter nor mind are known in themselves as substances or subjects of the phenomena. Matter is known "only in its effects." "The existence of an unknown substance is only an inference we are compelled to make from the existence of known phenomena." In such words Hamilton lays down the doctrine of the relativity of human knowledge in an exposition which, Mr. Mills says, "would have satisfied Hartley, Brown, and even Comte." The doctrine that we know matter "only in its effects," and that "its existence is only an inference we are compelled to make" from phenomena, is the doctrine, however, says Mr. Mill, "which, under the name of cosmothetic idealism, is elsewhere the object of some of Hamilton's most cutting attacks."

We have dwelt somewhat at length on this topic, since it illustrates very completely how much a philosopher's comprehension may be limited by his creed. Even with the words before his eyes, Mr. Mill appears to have overlooked, or else rejected as trivial, a distinction of great consequence in Hamilton's philosophy—the distinction between "effects on us" and effects in general, or those relative phenomenal existences of which unknown substances, matter or mind, are the causes. In this is all the difference between Hamilton's doctrine of the relativity of knowledge, and that doctrine of cosmothetic idealism which he attacks. That a knowledge should be of effects, and yet not of effects on us, does not appear to have occurred to Mr. Mill; but this is briefly Hamilton's doctrine. Mr. Mill and Sir William Hamilton (in his metaphysics) use the words "cause and effect," however, in different senses; but Mr. Mill does not appear to be aware of this, else his chapter on Hamilton's "Theory of Causation" would, we think, have been made less severe.

The division of existences into phenomenal and real (the always becoming, the never being, and permanent real existences) is made in the school to which Hamilton belongs, irrespective of any theory of perception. This Platonic distinction is as fundamental in the older metaphysics as the simpler doctrine of relative knowledge is in Mr. Mill's, but has no reference to the distinction of subject and object in knowledge. Draw the line where we will between the ego and the non-ego; include all cognizable being in the ego, or exclude a part—whether all cognizable modes of existences are sensations and groups of sensation in us, or whether other modes of existence form a part of the phenomena of knowledge—it is in either case true that particular and passing modes of existence, not their substances, are the objects of knowledge. All that Hamilton in his "Theory of Perception" contends for is, that we have a knowledge of modes of the non-ego as immediate as our knowledge of our own sensations; that our consciousness in presentative knowledge is composed of phenomena or modes, which are referable immediately some to a substance ego and some to a non-ego; but that it is only through these phenomena that either ego or non-ego is known, and the knowledge of both is therefore relative. The subjects of phenomena are still unknown in themselves, though the primary qualities of matter be as immediately known as sensations are. The relations involved in the phenomena of knowledge are, according to Hamilton, sui generis, and cannot be explained, he thinks, as relations of attributes to a single subject, but they are explained to the common sense of mankind by the doctrine which Hamilton calls natural dualism. According to this, a real or immediate knowledge is no more a mode of the ego than of the non-ego, but is a phenomenon, a mode of being, by which two substances manifest themselves equally and in contrast as two substances. When Hamilton speaks of our "knowing nothing absolute, nothing existing absolutely, that is, in and for itself, and without relation to us and to our faculties," he does not contradict his doctrine of real presentationism. Though things do produce effects on us—namely, sensations—it is not these which constitute knowledge of things. Real knowledge, as a phenomenon, is the joint result of two real causes, neither of which is known in itself, but both are equally known as the necessary substrata of the phenomenal elements of knowledge. Those elements which are immediately referred to the non-ego are not "a knowledge of somewhat in the thing ulterior to any effect on us," as Mr. Mill interprets them, but at the same time they are no mere modes of the self. They are the modes of a self and a not-self in union and equipoise. When Hamilton contends that we know the primary qualities of matter as they exist in things, he does not assert that we know things in themselves—that is, the noumena or things independently of us. We only know them as independent of any affections of us. We know them by affections of themselves on the occasions of their mysterious union with us in our intuitions of them.

That this doctrine is a genuine product of the old metaphysical mode of philosophizing, and is exposed to the gravest objections, we willingly admit. It is really an attempt to explain a phenomenon by describing it in terms which imply that it is ultimate and inexplicable. Like much beside in metaphysical philosophy, this doctrine attempts to justify the common opinions and natural prejudices of the undisciplined mind, instead of attempting to account for them. Very profound in appearance, it rests on the most superficial evidence, and does not bear examination. But while we admit all this, we are unwilling that the really strong points of Hamilton's metaphysical genius should be underestimated. His theories really fit each other much better than they do the more recondite facts of experience. Between this doctrine and the psychological explanations which Mr. Mill gives in Chapter XI. and the two following ones, there is a difference as important as that between the astronomical theories of Plato and those of Newton. We regard Mr. Mill's definition of substances as "the permanent possibilities of sensation," and the interpretations of the facts of consciousness which he makes in accordance with it, as among the most important contributions to psychology which have been made in modern times. The chapters devoted to his psychological theory of the belief in an external world, in matter and mind as substances, and the psychological theory of the primary qualities of matter, are the most valuable in the book, and comprise the maturest and most defensible views on these difficult subjects which have been reached.

In the chapter on Sir William Hamilton's theory of causation, Mr. Mill retorts with great effect the criticism of Hamilton on Brown, but, as we have intimated, this severity could have been spared, if instead of aiming at a polemical success our author had attempted to realize what the metaphysical idea of cause is, and what precisely Hamilton meant in his charge against Brown that "he professes to explain the phenomena of causality, but previously to explanation, evacuates the phenomenon of all that desiderates explanation." Misled, we suppose, by what must be allowed to be a very faulty account of the principle of causality, in which Hamilton gives a precise scientific explanation of the metaphysical idea of cause, while in fact the idea has only a vague unprecise import, Mr. Mill thinks that Hamilton has confounded the notion of efficient cause with that of substance, the causa efficiens with the materia, and that when Hamilton speaks of the complement of existence always remaining unchanged, and of the impossibility of conceiving any change in it, he has in mind the permanence of material substances, which, as Mr. Mill justly says, is not a necessary conception, such as the principle of causality is supposed to be. Doubtless this conception furnished Hamilton the faulty metaphor under which he describes the principle of causality, but it should have been interpreted like Plato's archetypal world—that permanent existence which is supposed necessary to account for the changes as well as the apparent permanences in the world of phenomena. Mr. Mill, following Brown, is quite as far from defining, in his law of causation, the metaphysical efficiens as he supposes Hamilton to be. His idea of cause is the scientific one, which is more properly named physical cause. It is the most general law of the successions of phenomena, and is derived from the total results of experience, whereas the principle of causality is supposed to be implied in the very beginnings and elements of experience. The law affirms that all successions are made up of invariable and unconditional sequences, but the metaphysical cause is the supposed real substratum of the unconditionality of a sequence. This principle is a genuine product of the metaphysical mode of philosophizing, and on close examination does not yield much meaning, but such as it is was Hamilton's meaning. Phenomena change. What makes them change? Not themselves. Not their regularity, which is expressed by the law of causation. "That which can produce changes must itself be permanent" is the metaphysical postulate called the principle of causality. For if it also changes, then something else must make it change, and this something else must either be permanent or the effect of some still more remote unchangeable existence. Such we conceive to be the notion of causality as held by Sir William Hamilton. Doubtless, if Mr. Mill had so comprehended it, and applied to its explanation his psychological method, he would have resolved it into a mere crudity of undisciplined thought—into anything but a necessary principle. This, however, would have been better than misunderstanding it, to the apparent detriment of his author's reputation.

In respect to one of the principal topics of Mr. Mill's book, the position of Sir William Hamilton is quite anomalous. Though belonging to the school to which Mr. Mill is opposed, Hamilton, it is well known, agrees in one of his most important opinions with his opponents. This has caused a great quarrel in the family. The absolutists and the quasi absolutists among religious thinkers have found in him a formidable antagonist; but this wins for him no sympathy from his critic of the opposite school, but rather subjects him to a severer condemnation. He is discovered in his lion's skin. He is not genuinely unorthodox, but, by what appears to his critic to be a subterfuge, retreats from his position on the incognizable and inconceivable character of the infinite and the absolute, by affirming that, though these cannot be known or conceived, they may yet be believed in. "What is rejected as knowledge by Sir William Hamilton, brought back under the name of belief," is the topic of Chapter V., in which Mr. Mill disposes somewhat summarily of a distinction of great consequence with theological writers, and one which also plays so important a part in Hamilton's philosophy, that a more careful and sympathetic study of it would have saved Mr. Mill, we think, much perplexity in his interpretations of Hamilton's opinions, especially in a later chapter on the doctrine of Judgment.

"Belief without knowledge" seems to our author an absurdity, and though the antithesis and the frequent antagonism of faith and science have rendered the distinction a familiar one, it must be confessed that there are few psychological matters more difficult than the discrimination of a faculty of faith from our general faculties of knowledge. But that there is more than a simple difference of degree between knowledge and belief, even in the common acceptation of the terms, seems to us obvious. Hamilton uses the word "belief" in a somewhat technical sense, to express a simple and elementary form of consciousness, which he supposes to underlie every cognitive act, and to take part in the formation of notions as well as of judgments and reasonings. That Mr. Mill is not fully apprized of this use of the word appears when he says that, "according to Sir William Hamilton, we believe premises, but know the conclusions from them," and adds, "but if we know the theorems of Euclid, and do not know the definitions and axioms on which they rest, the word knowledge, thus singularly applied, must be taken in a merely technical sense." But really, according to Sir William Hamilton, we not only know these theorems by means of the axioms and definitions, but we also know the axioms, though in a different manner. Though proposed in the form of cognitions, they rest, he thinks, on an instinctive apprehension of certain universal facts, which may govern our actions and even our judgments without passing themselves into the distinct consciousness of knowledge. Expressed in language they may be known, but independently of this they are believed and acted on. They exist and are originally given in the form of "simple feelings or beliefs." Mr. Mill, of course, gives a different and, we think, a better account of the origin of universal truths, but this is no reason why he should not comprehend and correctly state the real opinions of his author, though it may serve to explain why he does not do so. His own opinions are so different from Hamilton's that he is very likely to mistake him.

Among the many confusions, real and apparent, which Mr. Mill finds in Hamilton's writings, the most perplexing belong to this subject. Hamilton appears to our author to propose, at a distance of exactly three pages, two different theories of judgment "without the smallest suspicion on his part that they are not one and the same." But, in reality, though Mr. Mill does not appear to be aware of it, the first of these theories is a definition of the act of judging in its simplest form the element, which, according to Hamilton, is common to all the products of the understanding or the elaborative faculty, while the second theory defines the special product called specifically a judgment, in which, in addition to the common principle of comparison, there is apprehended and expressed the relation of subject and predicate. It is this relation which, according to Hamilton, distinguishes the logical judgment from a complex concept, and not the element of belief, which, according to Mr. Mill and others, belongs only to the judgment. This difference of opinion and nomenclature occasions Mr. Mill much perplexity. His author seems to him to reach in this matter "the very crown of the self-contradictions which we have found to be sown so thickly in Sir William Hamilton's speculations. Coming from a writer of such ability, it almost makes one despair," he adds, "of one's own intellect and that of mankind, and feel as if the attainment of truth on any of the more complicated subjects of thought were impossible."

Mr. Mill makes small account, as we have said, of the distinction of knowledge and belief. They differ, he thinks, only in the degree of the conviction with which they are held, or else in the degree of simplicity and directnesss in the evidence on which they rest. But if we examine them through their correlative ignorance and doubt, an important difference in kind becomes apparent, at least in their psychological relations. Knowledge and ignorance are wholly beyond the immediate influence of the will. They depend only indirectly on feelings and motives. Belief and doubt, on the other hand, involve volition and depend on feelings and motives. That which Hamilton calls belief, the simple elementary sense we have—from whatever source—of a congruence or conflict among objects and ideas, is that which governs our attention and determines our cognitive acts. Such beliefs control one another like other motives to action, so long as any conflict can arise among them, and it is only when such conflict ceases or is supposed to cease that we attain to knowledge, or suppose ourselves to have attained to it; for much which is called knowledge is only supposed, not real—is a contingent knowledge, held without any actual doubt, but not without a recognized possibility of doubt. Knowledge, then, according to this theory, is not a single simple act of our cognitive faculties, but a harmonious action of all concerned, in which no opposing motive to action exists or is operative; so that what we know, we know without consciousness of choice. In the same way we are ignorant without choice. Conflicting beliefs are not only absent, but all beliefs are absent. Conflict among our elementary beliefs or judgments of agreement and disagreement ceases in two ways, by the discipline of our cognitive objective experiences, and by the discipline of our wills in the formation of character—by submitting our thoughts to the influence of scientific studies, and by submitting them to the control of a restraining culture. Hence the antithesis of the results, science and faith.

This account of the distinction between knowledge and belief is independent of the doctrine, which Hamilton holds in common with his school, that some of our universal beliefs are original and independent of experience; and it is perfectly consistent with what we regard as the truer doctrine of the other school, namely, that there are no postulates in real science—nothing requiring to be admitted beforehand. It is a doctrine, however, associated so strongly with the à priori theory, that it appears to have prejudiced Mr. Mill against it.

In Mr. Mill's examination of Hamilton's review of Cousin, in spite of certain important agreements in opinion with his author, he is not disposed, as we have said, to grant him any favor. He even seems inclined to charge him with the absurdities involved in "the senseless abstractions," "the infinite," and "the absolute," and to make out as good a case as possible for those who think they attach significance to them. He goes so far as to say that though "the infinite" (what is infinite in all respects) is not merely a "fasciculus of negations," but, what is worse, a "fasciculus of contradictions," yet if in place of "the infinite" we put the idea of something infinite, Hamilton's idea collapses at once. "Something infinite is a conception, which, like most of our complex ideas, contains a negative element, but which contains positive elements also. Infinite space, for instance; is there nothing positive in that? The negative part of this conception is the absence of bounds. The positive are, the idea of space, and of space greater than any finite space. So of infinite duration; so far as it signifies 'without end' it is only known or conceived negatively; but in so far as it means time, and time longer than any given time, the conception is positive. The existence of a negative element in a conception does not make the conception itself negative, and a nonentity." True, if "infinite space" be a conception, and not a mere juxtaposition of words or incompatible ideas, then space is a positive part of it. But the question is whether the judgment, "Space is infinite," can be made, so as to bring the ideas together. Mr. Mill simply assumes that it can, and this too by a mistake of the meaning of the term "infinite," which Hamilton took much pains to guard against. He confounds the "infinite" of the metaphysician with the improper use of the word by mathematicians. In itself and with the metaphysician, this word is simply the negative of the finite; and as such is entirely incomparable with the finite in respect to magnitude or in any other respect. How does Mr. Mill know that the infinite is greater than any finite? Only by substituting for it a false representation of it. "True," he says, "we cannot have an adequate conception of space or duration as infinite, but between a conception which, though inadequate, is real, and correct as far as it goes, and the impossibility of any conception, there is a wide difference." But the conception which Mr. Mill puts forward as the "infinite" is not only inadequate, it is a false conception; arising very naturally, it is true, from an association in our minds between the indefinite and the incognizable. Very large magnitudes are the least definitely or adequately conceived, and we therefore attempt, but wrongly and confusedly, to represent infinite space by putting for it an indefinitely great extension. But this indefinitely great does not contradict or exclude the finite. "Greater than any finite" does exclude the finite, it is true, but so does "less than any finite" exclude it, and both are equally entitled to be called the infinite, yet neither of them is conceivable—neither can be judged to exist.

Mr. Mill appeals for the reality of the conception of the infinite to the results of mathematical calculations. "Considering," he says, "how many recondite laws of physical nature, afterwards verified by experience, have been arrived at by trains of mathematical reasoning, grounded on what, if Sir William Hamilton's doctrine be correct, is a non-existent conception, one would be obliged to suppose that conjuring is a highly successful mode of the investigation of nature." When we consider the reproaches which our author heaps upon Hamilton in a later chapter on the "Study of Mathematics" for his presuming to write about a subject of which he knew so little, we are tempted to respond in the same kind. Hamilton was at least fortunate in not knowing just enough of mathematics to be misled by a loose technical term, or else in knowing enough to be aware that mathematicians can afford to be careless about the etymologies and the strict connotations of the terms they employ. Mr. Mill is not given to superstitions, but if he supposes that mathematicians ever drew any conclusions in regard to physical nature involving in the premises a negation of the finite, he should look again to the works of his philosophical mathematician, Mr. De Morgan, for a correction of his error. The conclusions of the calculus are founded, not on a consideration of quantities really infinite, but of those which by the conditions of its problems may be regarded as indefinitely great—or, more correctly, incalculably great and incalculably small; and the conclusions drawn with their aid are proved to differ from the truth by incalculably small amounts—that is, by as little as we please. This is all that mathematicians have to do with the infinite, and this is just nothing at all.

Of the metaphysical infinite and absolute, and the simple feeling or belief, and the religious sentiment through which Sir William Hamilton and Mr. Mansel think these can be regarded as existing, Mr. Mill washes his hands. Rather than worship a being such as Mr. Mansel presents, of which no real conception, however inadequate, can be formed, he is ready to suffer the worst possible fate. Perhaps those among Mr. Mill's opponents who are more familiar than he with religious æsthetics, would deny the name of worship to the sentiment he is capable of feeling toward a being whose government of the world receives his unqualified support and approbation, with the sanction of "the highest human morality which we are capable of conceiving."

In spite, however, of Mr. Mill's incapacity to enter into a requisite degree of sympathy with his opponent's point of view, his eminent justness of thought and feeling give his criticisms great weight and value. There is much of interest in his book which we cannot even mention in this brief notice, but we earnestly recommend the whole to our philosophical readers.

DE TOCQUEVILLE ON THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.*

[SECOND NOTICE.]

ABOUT half of the contents of the eighth volume of the "Works" of De Tocqueville is devoted to the history of the French Revolution, in the widest sense of this term. We find there an article on the "Social and Political State of France before and after 1789," published in English, in the "London and Westminster Review," in 1836, and now for the first time in the original French; seven chapters of an unpublished work destined to serve as a continuation of "The Ancient Régime and the Revolution;" an essay "On the Marquis de Mirabeau;" another on "Turgot and his Writings;" and "Notes and Thoughts" relative to a work on the Revolution (including the Empire), the title of which the author had not yet determined upon. Scanty as these latter are, we find them the most interesting of the collection, not only on account of the surpassing greatness of the subject, but also because we see in them fragments of the thoughts of the distinguished writer on the first Revolution of France and the first Napoleon, as conceived or shaped in his logical mind, in its maturest age, when the third Revolution had passed over that country before his eyes, and Napoleon III. had established a new imperial throne on the ruins of the republic. The quantitively little before us reflects sufficient light upon the vast subject of De Tocqueville's last studies and meditations to enable us to discern its principal features, its most striking characteristics, as viewed by an eye as well prepared for observation by study and experience and as unbiased as any that ever examined the past. In the following lines we shall try to construct those unconnected remarks and notes, some of which are no more than headings of chapters to be written, or notations of problems to be solved, into an embryo review of the French Revolution, fragmentary and devoid of details, but Tocquevillean.

The tableau opens with the taking of the Bastile—to the contemporary witnesses the great victory of the Revolution of 1789; "to us, who see the event at a distance of seventy years, the first manifestation in history of the dictatorship of Paris, already established in popular and administrative habits: a dictatorship productive of future revolutions." The behavior of the people—a name for the first time applied to the populace—of Paris, on that occasion, so full of confusion was astonishing on account of the consistent severity with which common crime and licentiousness were banished from the stage of political commotion. It made enthusiastic observers believe that the character of the people was changed, "a mirage which appears at every revolution." Abroad the éclat of the event was immense. It was hailed as the dawn of a new era for mankind. It was not the beginning of a French, but of a European revolution. The victory of the people was complete; it produced no civil war, not because the enemies of the Revolution were not sufficiently numerous, or lacking in moral courage to struggle against it, but because there were neither men nor local administrations capable of forming centres of resistance. And then, it is in the nature of revolutions to be all-powerful and to baffle all individual influences as long as their first impulse lasts; a grand and terrible spectacle!

* "Œuvres complètes d'Alexis de Tocqueville." VIII. ["Complete Works of Alexis de Tocqueville." Vol. VIII.] Paris, 1865.

On the 14th of July, 1789, when the Bastile fell, the Constituent Assembly became the Government. Replacing the executive, it received deputations, addresses; it demanded the dismissal of the ministers, the reappointment of Necker; to it Marshal de Broglie reported the retirement of the army; all the bodies of the state appeared before it to render homage. All this was not novel. The history of French assemblies, estates, and parlements offered numerous precedents. What was new was the result attained. Those who looked at what passed before them without knowing the future, could not perceive the revolutionary character of the acts of the Assembly; many things now generally regarded as infallible signs of anarchy were at that time not yet known as such. But this Assembly, victorious by the people, was exceedingly feeble when it had to face it. It was elected to combat aristocracy and despotism, and its action against them was full of vigor. It had no energy at the sight of popular crimes and anarchy. The greatest popular excesses could not arouse it to do its duty. It wasted its time in debates and votes. A timid address to the people recommending moderation could not be passed in ten days. This was the great fault of the Assembly; from that day it was doomed to obey; the people of Paris became the sovereign. And yet the Assembly was then possessed of an immense moral prestige; it appeared unanimous; was strong enough to face at the same time both royalty and the people, and to preserve in its hands the direction of the Revolution. But it lacked a clear insight into the consequences of events, which only revolutionary experience could give, and that steadfastness which is acquired only from a practical familiarity with public affairs. It also lacked organization. It was entirely unlike that English Parliament which deposed James II., but solved every question itself, without or in spite of the populace. The general views of the French Assembly were just, its designs grand, its sentiments generous and exalted; it admirably united the love of liberty with love of equality; but its practical maladroitness and ignorance made all its good intentions end in a powerless, anarchical administration, and finally in a general disorganization, from which sprang the Reign of Terror. The current of the Revolution carried the Constituent Assembly, its child, one way; the latter did not try to stem that current. It is rarely given to individuals or assemblies to make violent efforts in opposite directions. The force that impels them towards one side makes them powerless on the other.

The tendency towards equality was in all minds, even in those of the privileged. The idea of universal suffrage was shared by all, being favored by the old divisions of the people, which attached inequality and inabilities to classes or estates, but knew none within these limits. With the barriers that divided the classes, all inequalities were to break down. But while the bourgeois were ardent to conquer political rights, the people of the villages gave vent to their desire for material welfare, and to their impatience of feudal burdens and restrictions, in an almost universal rising against the chateaux. The wildest anarchy prevailed all over France, fear and disorder in the National Assembly. But fear pushed all spirits in the direction of the then dominant opinions. Fear and enthusiasm combined—it is impossible to state precisely in what proportions—produced the night of August 4, when nobles, clergymen, representatives of provinces, all burning with impatience to sacrifice their respective prerogatives and privileges on the altar of a united and reconciled country, pressed, pushed, or succeeded each other around the tribune, which resembled a besieged place. The nobility and the clergy were the actors in that extraordinary scene, which is unsurpassed by anything recorded in history, and which more than anything shows the French character in full relief. "The third estate remained in the position of a chorus, supporting the speakers by involuntary cries expressive of their emotions."

La Fayette proposed the declaration of the rights of man; Mirabeau reported on it. A fortnight of brilliant oratorical debates, characterized by a singular confusion of ideas, followed, which, however, was not fruitless, Europe listening attentively, and thus imbibing the spirit of the Revolution But while the Assembly deliberated, the treasury was empty, Paris famished, the press frantic, the court plotting, the king wavering, the work of the constitution hardly progressing. A tempest was slowly gathering. The 5th and 6th of October saw it burst over Versailles. Only a combined effort of the victorious middle class and the Assembly could have prevented this new victory of the Parisian populace. This effort was not made, from a common fear of the court. Both the middle class and the Assembly accepted, if they did not invoke, the aid of the populace, and henceforward bore its sway. Mirabeau, who for a time during the debates on the constitution had been more conservative than his party, was now again the man of July, and again showed himself the master genius of the Revolution. Was it because he had lost the hope of leading and governing for the king, or because he was anxious for the Revolution, or carried off by the current of its passions?

However, this Constituent Assembly, now in Paris, resumed its labors, which resulted in a system of institutions unequivocally marked with the double character of liberalism and democracy. The French nobility, seeing itself suddenly deprived of all its roots in a soil where it had been planted for more than a thousand years, finding in no other class of the nation any force of resistance which it could join, and nowhere either sympathy or common interests, emigrated en masse. They resembled a body of officers fleeing before the fire of their soldiers, who have all turned their guns against them. This isolation condemned them, but, at the given moment, it was also their excuse.

The new political faith, preached by the Revolution, followed in the wake of the emigration, if it did not precede it. It is wonderful to observe how easily most of the European nations were persuaded to make those novel ideas, apparently French, their own. General causes had prepared them for it.

But the terror which reigned in France was a peculiar offspring of its time and place. It could nowhere else have the character it there bore. It was the product, it is true, of general causes, but which local causes forced beyond all limits; it was the product of the French manners, character, and habits, of French centralization, of the sudden destruction of all hierarchy. Its force lay in powerful organization, in its crushing unity. It could nowhere be imitated with success. To have set a pernicious example to other times and nations is an evil done to posterity by the Convention, which by its ravings did so much evil to the men of its time. Its triumph was made possible by particular domestic and foreign circumstances, which are generally overlooked. It will not always be enough to attempt with violence and temerity what appears impossible. "The Convention created the policy of the impossible, the theory of raving madness, the worship of blind temerity."

Neither could the wars of the French Revolution be imitated and victory organized accordingly. The circumstances will find no parallel. Democratic armies fought kings, when a democratic revolution was sweeping over Europe. The new world fought the old. Victory was carried by surprise; everything was novel. The spirit of the revolution marched before its martial banners. Devastated Europe aided its ravagers. The new faith, as once Islamism, swept on, ravaging and converting at the same time. Imbecile princes were broken before they knew what was passing around them. A stupefied, servile diplomacy, without unity or harmony, made futile attempts to oppose an unparalleled centralization. An equally servile strategy could as little cope with democratic boldness and impetuosity, which were, besides, revolutionary and French. The defects as well as the good qualities of the French co-operated alike in making them triumphant. Their principal constitutional defect, that concentration of power and violent amalgamation of all parties which carried them through revolution into servitude, was equally momentous in bringing about their military successes. "For the same reasons which render states unstable make them strong at a given moment. The same government which does not allow peace to bear all its fruits, and liberty quietly to establish itself, is, on a certain day, highly effective in war; and a power which wields that force has an immense advantage over all others. The same reason produced the greatness of Louis XIV. and of the Revolution." England alone was able to defend herself against the latter, "because she opposed to the French force a similar force, a centralized government and an erect nation. It is not the sea that saves her: it is her spirit, her constitution, and especially her liberty. A grand spectacle · liberty alone able to struggle against revolution."

The Revolution continued to advance, to complete its course, after the fall of Robespierre, in spite of reaction, of the successive vanishing of illusions, of the exhaustion of the assemblies, and of the drooping of the spirit of freedom, amidst the growing preponderance of military power; but it more and more assumed a military character. The armies remained energetic when the nation ceased to be so. The war power of France survived the decline and degradation of the civil government, even when the latter had fallen into the contemptible hands of the Directory. However, it would be an error to believe that in the period following the Reign of Terror the people of France fell into a languid state of enervation. On the contrary, we learn from enlightened eye-witnesses "how far that time, amid all its incoherences, its vices, and its chaos, was superior in one point to our own. People entertained true convictions; everybody followed the one he cherished courageously and passionately, occupied with it and not with the part it made him play; and thus doing the most eccentric, the queerest, and often the most ridiculous things without any desire of appearing singular." Business affairs were frequently secondary things—ideas and intellectual enjoyments the leading objects. Never was there more true equality, founded on the power of intellect, between men of different conditions.

Abroad, France ceased to be victorious for a moment, only when the Russians, in the spring of 1799, entered the lists against it together with Austria. She had been regarded as invincible, the vanquished continent despairing of resisting her forces, and fear suppressing in the enemies of the Revolution the abhorrence and contempt with which its follies inspired them. Her first reverses changed these sentiments into an equally exaggerated feeling of exultation and contempt. Tired of French oppression, which deadened their revolutionary sympathies, the nations commenced voluntarily offering their arms to their sovereigns. However, all this was of short duration. The ridiculed Revolutionary Government reorganized its armies, crushed the Russians in Switzerland, and again carried the war into Germany. Soon after, the greatest master of war held both the civil and military power of France in his hands.

At the beginning of the Revolution its course was at every moment expected to be stopped by this man or by that. Towards its close it was not believed any more that it could be checked by anything. A double error. There are times when a giant is not strong enough to check the course of a revolution; at others, a pigmy can do it. It is not the intrinsic force of the obstacle to be conquered that must be considered, but the ensemble of the circumstances. In this light we must look at the coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire.

The Revolution had spent its force. France was tired of convulsions and revulsions, all of which ended in a tyranny of one kind or other. It had suffered reverses in war. It despised its government, the Directory. One strong hand was desired. Even abroad, Bonaparte, who had "astonished the world before his name was known," was pointed out by thinking men as the one. He was adored by the army and the peasantry. He came and conquered. Withal, "the 18th Brumaire is one of the worst conceived and worst conducted coups d'état that can be imagined. It succeeded through the omnipotence of the causes which brought it about, the state of the public mind, and the disposition of the army, probably more through the first cause than the second." The part which Bonaparte personally played in its execution was ludicrously paltry. Ill-disguised republican hypocrisy marked the whole action; perjury, as usual in such cases, was not wanting. Some of the actors, however, were themselves deceived.

When Napoleon entered the Tuileries as first consul, Roederer remarked: "This abode is sad." "Like greatness," answered the other. But good fortune entered with him, "the good fortune of neutral powers that succeed long and violent revolutions. All the hatreds of parties are for them changed into toleration. They are loved not for what they do, but on account of what they prevent being done by others." Napoleon was to the Jacobins an adversary of royalist restoration; to the royalists an obstacle in the way of terrorism, should it attempt to return. The people liked his usurpation.

We shall not follow the writer into the examination of the single phases of the reign of Napoleon, as he sketched them out to himself in brief outlines and half intelligible notes. The following passages will suffice to show how he judged that extraordinary man, and how he purposed to treat the history of France under him:

"What I should like to depict, is less the facts in themselves, however surprising and grand they be, than the spirit of the facts; less the various acts in the life of Napoleon, than Napoleon himself; that singular, incomplete, but marvellous being, whom we cannot attentively observe without beholding one of the strangest and most curious spectacles that can be met with in the world.

"I should like to show what, in his prodigious enterprise, he drew from his own genius, and what facilities were offered to him by the condition of the country and the spirit of the time; to make known how and why that indocile nation then ran, of its own accord, to meet servitude, and with what incomparable skill he discovered in the work of the most demagogical of revolutions, and how he naturally extracted from it, all that was useful to despotism.

"Speaking of his internal administration, I intend to contemplate the efforts of that almost divine intellect grossly bent on the repression of human liberty; the organization of force carried to a perfection such as only the greatest genius in the middle of the most enlightened and civilized age could conceive; the drooping movement of the intellect; the languishing of the human mind; the shrinking of souls; the disappearing of great men; an immense but flat horizon, on which, whithersoever you may turn, nothing else is to be seen but the colossal figure of the emperor himself.

"Coming to his external policy and conquests, I should try to describe that impetuous course of his across nations and realms; here, too, I should like to show how far the strange grandeur of his warlike genius was aided by the strange and eccentric grandeur of the time. What an extraordinary tableau, if it could be executed, of both human power and weakness, would be the picture of that impatient and mobile genius incessantly making and unmaking his works, incessantly tearing down and replacing the boundaries of empires, and distressing nations as well as monarchs, less by the sufferings he inflicts on them than by the eternal uncertainty in which he leaves them about what they have still to fear!

"Finally, I should like to point out by what a series of excesses and errors he hurled himself to his fall, and also to point out the trace which, in spite of his excesses and errors, he has left behind him in the world, not only as a remembrance, but as a lasting influence and action; to show what died with him and what remains. And in completing that lengthy picture, to show what is the meaning of the Empire in the French Revolution; the place which this singular act ought to occupy in that strange drama the dénouement of which is still hidden from us."

AFFIXES TO ENGLISH WORDS.*

WE can imagine a good reason for writing this book, but we can think of none so good for its publication. There was need for one on this subject, one which would treat it exhaustively and completely, which would tell us all that was known with regard to the prefixes and suffixes, which would show us the way in which the present forms of words came about—the way in which the Latin supines became English infinitives, and in which other infinitives were formed by dropping the verbal ending in whole or in part, which would teach us something more than we now can get with difficulty from various dictionaries and foreign grammars. Such a treatise we unquestionably want, and not only a treatise on this subject, but a whole grammar. Such, no doubt, was the kind of work which this author had in mind to write. But such he has not given. We take it for granted that he has not fully carried out the idea which he proposed to himself, for he certainly has not written such a book as will satisfy any person who has given ordinary thought to the subject. It is not as good as the succinct statement of the prefixes and suffixes in Bain's little English grammar, and by no means equal to the treatment of the same subject in Mätzner's larger work. Why, then, should Mr. Haldeman have published his book? The stock of poor and mediocre books is already so large that we need no additions to it. But it is one of the signs of hasty scholarship to be eager to get into print. Were Americans taught in the same thorough and careful manner as the Germans, that portion of our best intellect which will here devote itself to study, and resist the attractions of outside life, would probably produce as good fruits as any in Germany or France. We first are half-taught, and after that half-study. We lack thoroughness and completeness. But in philology we are no worse than the English. Their system of education is as vicious in this direction as our own. The making of Latin verse and the study of quantity help very little to make thorough scholars or anything more than dilettanti; and it is of English scholars this author has taken counsel. We augur no good to a book from its being inspected and annotated by a member of the Philological Society of London; for its chief leaders and most prolific writers have brought all its members into discredit, and, except its reprints of early English texts, we place little value on any of its lucubrations.

Mr. Haldeman's book is not critical enough for the scholar, and for the student, for whom it seems intended, it is marred by confusion, useless and false learning. Many things, indeed, might be learned here, but much wrongly, and it would require a teacher of great accuracy himself to point out and guard the learner from the numerous errors, and from making false inferences from what is right in itself, but badly stated.

Mr. Haldeman we believe to be right in the title to his book. An affix means, etymologically, something fastened to, and would therefore include syllables placed at either end of the word—both prefixes and suffixes. We have already two words, suffix and postfix, with the same meaning, and it would be better to agree with Mr. Haldeman's definition, and use affix in a comprehensive sense; at the same time, it must be admitted that in general an affix is equivalent to suffix only, and that there will be a slight danger of ambiguity. No such advantage, however, will justify the spelling hibrid for hybrid, or altho for although. In fact, Mr. Haldeman is a little apt to use such singularities in a very ordinary way, as if there were no doubt of their correctness.

* "Affixes in their Origin and Application, exhibiting the Etymologic Structure of English Words. By S. S. Haldeman, A.M." Philadelphia: published by E. H. Butler & Co. 1865. 12mo, pp. 271.

The first thing which will be noticed in going over the lists of prefixes and suffixes which are given in this volume is that that they are not sufficiently discriminated. Those derived from the Anglo-Saxon and the Romanic originals are placed side by side, with no attempt at marked separation, except by difference of type. An alphabetical arrangement is on some accounts convenient, but neither on the whole as convenient nor as useful as two distinct lists would have been, one of the Anglo-Saxon and the other of the Romanic prefixes, with all those of similar derivation arranged under the same head, and then an index, so as to be able to turn at once to any special form. Let us look for instance at the prefix a. This is both Anglo-Saxon and Romanic. In Anglo-Saxon it has a variety of meanings, and is variously derived. Some of them are here stated at length, some are slurred over, and some entirely omitted. Thus the fifteenth class is called "verbal or redundant"—giving no special derivation to the prefix in this one. Among the examples are arise, arouse, awake, alight, when a is the O. H. Ger. ur, ar, er, ir, Goth. us, A.-S., â, with a meaning of up, out of. Also abide, when a is the Goth. and, Ger. eut, A.-S. and on, as andbidaw, onbidaw, being the same prefix that is seen in acknowledge, adread, and answer. The a or ac of acknowledge is nowhere given, while the an of answer is considered to be Latin, and the same as anti. The af in affright, which is the same as the a in awake, is not given at all, or else either as from Lat ex, where afraid is the example, or from Lat. ad, when the form af is given. Now take the Romanic prefix. We have it given thus:

"A–, AB, ABS—from. [Lat. A–, AB, ABS. from; Sanscrit APA, AP-, AVA, far; ἀπὸ, ἀπ-, ἀφ-, ἀ-, from; Russian, Polish, Bohemian ob-; Irish as; (Aztec accidental), Irish, Gaelic a-; Welsh af- (negative), o from, aw a flow; eb, wff motion from or out; ob a going from, if that is impelled; wy that proceeds from. Gothic af, abu, German ab; Anglish af-, of-, a-; English of, off. Sanscrit root AB, AMB, to go, to move.]

This is a specimen of the etymological treatment of all the prefixes and suffixes. Here is a little of everything except what is wanted. What Mr. Haldeman should have given us was the Latin prefix or its meaning, with possibly a reference to the Greek and Sanskrit (though in a book of this kind rather useless), with the forms which the prefix had taken in French or Italian or any other language from which any word beginning thus might have come to us. Why give us all this display of learning, which is, to say the least, useless to a boy trying to make out the meaning or trace the origin of an English word? What does "Aztec accidental" mean? Are both Aztec and accidental compounded with the Irish as; or is the prefix ab accidental in Aztec; and if so, what is the authority for, and what the pertinence of, the statement? We only wonder that we were not given also the Finnish congener, it being well proved—to the Philological Society—that the Finnish is the great original of English.

On the prefix ad we are favored with another equally interesting piece of philology. It is remarkable for the juxtaposition of languages, whether rising in hierarchical order or on the footing of mere consanguinity is uncertain:

"AD, Welsh at, idd to; Ss. ADHI, A, towards, at; Fr. à; Go. at; Ang. at; Isl. ad, at. Gaelic ath- very. (Heb. ἠθ, ἐθ-.) Ss. root AT to move; Welsh eth, s. what is in motion; add, s. a laying upon; idd, to, into; eto, yet, also; Gr. ἔτι yet."

The prefix out, A.-S. ut, Ger. aus, was originally the preposition out in its usual meaning, as outpour, then outside or outside of, as outpost, outlaw. Then it gained the idea of extending, as outspread; and of lasting to the end, as outwear; and, finally, of lasting beyond something else, or of excess, as outlive, outlast, outdrink. Yet from this signification Mr. Haldeman argues that out in such pure Anglo-Saxon words as these, is derived from the Latin ultra, in the same manner as outrage, of which there is no doubt.

Mis under the word is referred to its proper originals, though elsewhere the author evidently derives it from the Latin mittere to send, for he speaks of the position of the affix being changed in *mis*take and re*miss,* p. 36.

Some common prefixes are omitted, such as forth and wel, which are fully as important as many given, and others are given which are in no proper sense English prefixes, or prefixes at all, as bu in the Greek word bulimy, or nun in enunciation, nuncupative, which is a part of a compound root. Considerable space is given to examples of prefixes of single letters, such as b, c, d, f, fe, gr, pe, etc., but very little attention is paid to their explanation. All these, we think, are hardly to be regarded as prefixes in the usual sense; they are rather modifications of the root, and it is very difficult to trace their origin or their signification. Some of the cases given are, without doubt, instances of such altered roots; others and most are doubtful. We always understand a prefix to be the remnant of some word, and thus a word with a prefix is really a compound word; but these words which are formed by adding another letter to the root, undergo no change different from those that have a vowel in the root changed, or some intermediate letter altered. Nor are d in dicere and docere and t in teach prefixes, but an integral part of the root. A specimen of these so-called prefixes can be seen under the letter m.

"Welsh my—that is, that is in agency; ma, what is produced; mw, that is forward or about. . . . W, mus (from mw that is forward, and ws that is impulsive), that starts out, an effluvium, hence mu-s-k and mu-s-tard, tardd, issue."

The probability of these derivations is apparent to any one who remembers that long before the perfume was ever known to Welsh or Celts, there was a Latin muscus, a Greek μόσχος, an Arabic musk, and a Sanskrit mushka; and that we can trace mustard through the French, Italian, and all the Romanic languages, till we come to the Latin mustum.

We have no space to enter into a detailed examination of the suffixes, and merely call attention to the very undiscriminating and unsatisfactory treatment of ow, ew, er, and that old, as seen in threshold and cuckold, is omitted as well as numerous others. We also say to Mr. Haldeman, that whatever barren may be from, it certainly is not the A.-S. unberende, and is not a present participle.

At the end of the book are some examples of the analysis of words, where the author's partiality for the Welsh appears very plainly. Witness especially the labored derivation of buckler from bug, a scarecrow, and cledr, a board—a board which shelters from scarecrows. Mr. Haldeman ought to pay a little more attention to French and Latin before he writes again.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

AMERICAN SCHOOL QUARTO GEOGRAPHY. By J. H. Colton. Ivison, Phinney, Blakeman & Co., New York.

A TREATISE ON MILITARY SURGERY AND HYGIENE. By Frank Hastings Hamilton, M.D. Baillière Brothers, New York.

THE HERO'S OWN STORY. General Sherman's Official Account of his Great March through Georgia and the Carolinas, etc., etc. Bunce & Huntington, New York.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

THE

MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY,

COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.

JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.

CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE.

Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

B. C. MORRIS, President.

WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary.

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
OF NEW YORK.

Assets, July 1, 1865, over - - - - - - $13,000,000
Cash Income, 1864, nearly . - - - - - 3,000,000

FREDERICK S. WINSTON, PRESIDENT.

Offices, 144 and 146 Broadway, cor. Liberty St.

Endowment Policies, Ten-year Policies, and Life Policies are issued by this Company on the most favorable terms.

ALL THE POLICIES OF THIS COMPANY PARTICIPATE IN THE SURPLUS, THE WHOLE OF WHICH IS DIVIDED ANNUALLY IN THE MOST EQUITABLE MANNER AMONG THE POLICY-HOLDERS.

Dividends of return premiums will be paid in CASH, or may be used if preferred in the form of additional insurance.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

FREDERICK S. WINSTON,	HENRY E. DAVIES,	ALEX. W. BRADFORD,
JOHN V. L. PRUYN,	OLIVER H. PALMER,	DAVID HOADLEY,
WILLIAM MOORE,	SAM'L E. SPROULLS,	HENRY A. SMYTHE,
ROBERT H. MCCURDY,	SAM'L M. CORNELL,	WILLIAM V. BRADY,
ISAAC GREEN PEARSON,	LUCIUS ROBINSON,	W. E. DODGE,
MARTIN BATES, JR.,	W. SMITH BROWN,	GEORGE S. COE,
WILLIAM BETTS,	RICHARD PATRICK,	WM. K. STRONG,
JOHN P. YELVERTON,	WILLIAM H. POPHAM,	WM. M. VERMILYE,
JOHN WADSWORTH,	WILLIAM A. HAINES,	JOHN E. DEVELIN,
ALFRED EDWARDS,	EZRA WHEELER,	WELLINGTON CLAPP,
NATHANIEL HAYDEN,	SEYMOUR L. HUSTED,	M. M. FREEMAN,
JOHN M. STUART,	SAMUEL D. BABCOCK,	ALONZO CHILD.

Secretaries, { ISAAC ABBATT, THEO. W. MORRIS. } Actuary, SHEPPARD HOMANS. Cashier, FRED. M. WINSTON.

Medical Examiners, { MINTURN POST, M.D., ISAAC L. KIP, M.D. }

Counsel, { WILLIAM BETTS, LL.D., Hon. LUCIUS ROBINSON. } Attorney, RICHARD A. MCCURDY.

Applications and communications from persons in the undermentioned States to be through General Agents in their respective districts.

F. RATCHFORD STARR, General Agent at Philadelphia, for the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Delaware.

HALE REMINGTON, General Agent at Fall River, for the New England States.

H. B. MERRELL, General Agent at Detroit, Michigan, for the States of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota.

L. SPENCER GOBLE, General Agent at Newark, for the State of New Jersey.

J. A. RHODES, General Agent for New York and vicinity, office, 5 Wall Street.

H. S. HOMANS, General Agent at San Francisco, for California and Oregon.

AETNA INSURANCE COMPANY, OF HARTFORD,

INCORPORATED 1819. CHARTER PERPETUAL.

Paid up Capital, - - $2,250,000 00
Assets, July 1, 1865, - - 3,850,351 78

Losses Paid in 45 Years, - $17,485,894 71

T. A. ALEXANDER, Pres't. L. J. HENDEE, Sec'y.
JONA. GOODWIN, Jr., A. Sec'y.

Insurance against loss and damage by Fire, and of Inland Navigation.

NEW YORK AGENCY, 62 WALL STREET.
JAS. A. ALEXANDER, AGENT.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.
" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL - - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000 00
ASSETS - - - - - - - - - - - - - 1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.
PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,

108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000
Surplus, over - - - - - - - - - - - - 400,000

This Company insures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND INLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

IF PREMIUMS ARE PAID IN GOLD, LOSSES WILL BE PAID IN GOLD.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
EDWARD A. STANSBURY, 2d Vice-President.
JOHN C. GOODRIDGE, Secretary.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,
46 PINE STREET, NEW YORK,
BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

F. W. WORTH. LOOMIS L. WHITE. H. B. KEEN.

WORTH, WHITE & KEEN,

BANKERS,

47 WALL STREET,

(Offices formerly occupied by Messrs. W. C. Pickersgill & Co.)

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES
BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Orders executed in Gold, Railway Stocks, and Bonds, at the Stock Exchange.

Four per Cent. Interest allowed on all deposits.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.
JOSEPH W. WILDEY, Secretary.

VERMILYE & CO.,

BANKERS,

44 Wall Street, N. Y.,

GOVERNMENT LOAN AGENTS,

KEEP ON HAND, FOR

IMMEDIATE DELIVERY,

THE ISSUES OF

7.30 TREASURY NOTES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS.

We BUY and SELL all classes of GOVERNMENT SECURITIES at market rates ORDERS from BANKS and BANKERS executed on favorable terms, and with dispatch.

Also, receive DEPOSITS, and ALLOW INTEREST on current balances.

VERMILYE & CO.

E. W. CLARK & CO.,

BANKERS AND BROKERS,

35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS,

COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

FIRST CLASS FIRE INSURANCE

ON THE PARTICIPATION PLAN.

MARKET FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

37 WALL STREET, CORNER OF JAUNCEY COURT.

CONDITION OF THE COMPANY.

ABSTRACT OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF DEC. 31, 1864.

TOTAL ASSETS	$414,729 18
Viz.—Bonds and Mortgages		$134,672 00
Temporary Loans		92,630 00
Real Estate		10,000 00
100 Shares Mer. Ex. Bank		5,000 00
Government Sec., value		144,514 00
Cash on hand		18,042 34
Interest due		3,085 58
Premiums due		6,785 26
PRESENT LIABILITIES		$15,995 92
NET SURPLUS		198,733 26

This Company will continue, as heretofore, to insure respectable parties against DISASTER BY FIRE

At fair and remunerating rates; extending, according to the terms on its Policies, the advantage of the

PARTICIPATION PLAN OF THE COMPANY,

pursued by it for several years past, with such great success and popularity, and profit to its customers: whereby

(75) SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT. (75)

of the Profits, instead of being withdrawn from the Company in Dividends to Stockholders, is invested as a "SCRIP FUND," and held for greater protection of its Policyholders; and Scrip, bearing interest, is issued to Customers therefor: thus, IN THIS COMPANY, those who furnish the business, AND PAY THE PREMIUMS, derive the largest share of advantages; and when the accumulations of the SCRIP FUND shall exceed

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,

the excess will be applied to PAY OFF the Scrip IN CASH in the order of its issue.

☞ The liberal and prompt adjustment of Claims for Loss, WHEN FAIR AND SQUARE, is a specialty with this Company.

NOTE.—This Company does not insure on the hazards of RIVER, LAKE, or INLAND NAVIGATION; confining itself strictly to a legitimate FIRE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

ASHER TAYLOR, President.

H. P. FREEMAN, Secretary.

BILLS ON LONDON

At Sixty Days' Sight and at Three Days' Sight, for sale by

WARD, CAMPBELL & CO.,

56 Wall Street, New York.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,

56 WALL STREET,

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY, A.M.

THERE is a sudden fall of 2 per cent. in the value of money employed by the brokers this week, as compared with the previous fortnight or three weeks. The rate on call is now more generally 5 per cent. on large temporary balances left with the brokers than any higher rate. Business paper is also salable at lower rates, say 6 to 8 per cent. per annum for prime names, in place of 7½ to 10 per cent. early in the month. The cause of this change is traceable in a good measure to the explosion of the gold and stock gambling operations of young Ketchum and other desperate operators like Mumford, last week. Their loans on gold have been liquidated, and such loans have become unpopular; so that the gold arena is tamer than for many months past, and although the Custom House has absorbed about three millions for duties this week, the price has scarcely varied one-half of 1 per cent. Part of this steadiness, in the face of an unusually heavy customs demand, is due to the circumstance that the Government continues to sell a portion of its surplus, the Treasury having no other use for it, beyond about four millions of September gold interest, until November.

There is a supply of $960,000 of California gold, mostly in bar gold, suitable for export, this week, and our steamers to-day will take nearly this amount to Europe. The exports of produce for the week are $3,300,000; the imports of dry goods, $2,010,000; and of general foreign merchandise (not yet made up), probably over $3,000,000. Exchange, notwithstanding these free importations and very active sales making by the importers, is scarcely so firm as this day week.

Business is remarkably active and prosperous among nearly all the merchant classes. The importers and jobbers of foreign dry goods are fully employed; the domestic commission houses are selling heavily of cotton and woollen goods of the New England and other mills; the receipts of cotton are 21,000 bales, and the outward trade by coast steamers to New Orleans and other Southern ports on the increase. The receipts of breadstuffs by canal are somewhat irregular, which is to be regretted in view of better orders from England for grain and flour. The harvest weather in Great Britain generally is reported unfavorable, and the potato crop in Ireland not so good as promised earlier in the season.

The estimates of the old cotton in the South when the war ceased are still the subject of much controversy, but the accumulation of the stocks of cotton, here and at New Orleans and Mobile, about two hundred thousand bales at the three ports, is against the low estimates indulged early in July. The new crop is estimated at from 600,000 to 800,000 bales. Prices are steady in this market, however, as, in addition to a fair export demand, the New England mills are again increasing their supplies.

The affairs of Ketchum, Son & Co., promise to liquidate about 70 cents on the dollar of their indebtedness; the affairs of their broker, Mr. Graham, about 40 cents. The sum of $50,000 which Mumford attempted to secrete from his defrauded creditors, has been brought to light, and ordered by the courts into one of the trust companies to await the litigation of his creditors. This is equal to about 25 or 30 cents on the dollar of his deficiencies. No other difficulties have occurred to the brokers, and their losses in the instances above referred to will scarcely exceed $250,000, distributed among ten or fifteen sufferers.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The U. S. 5-20s of the original issue have advanced from 106⅛ to 106¼ to 106⅜ to 106⅞ per cent. The new issue, not so scarce on the Street, remain steady, closing at 104⅜ to 104⅞ per cent. The 6 per cents of 1881 are the same as last week, 106¾ to 107 per cent. The 10-40 5 per cents have advanced from 97 to 98 per cent., owing to the close approach of the 1st September dividend, which, with gold at 143¾ to 144 per cent., will give $3 60 currency to each 2½ per cent. gold coupon. The 7.30 currency loans are all in request, at 99⅝ to 99½ per cent. and accrued interest. The certificates of indebtedness have advanced to 98¼ per cent.

STATE SECURITIES.

Tennessees are 72½ per cent., including 27½ per cent. arrearage of interest. Missouris, 71 to 72 per cent. The War Department has directed General Thomas to surrender all the Tennessee railroads to the charge of their owners, but with the condition that no dividends shall be paid on their capital until all the arrearages of interest on the State of Tennessee bonds and on mortgage bonds endorsed by the State, originally issued for the construction of these roads, are paid up.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

There is no important change in railway bonds. The shares have generally advanced on a rumored upward speculation at the gold exchange, which is favored by cheap money and the position, as a leader in Erie, of one of the wealthiest speculators on the Street. Erie has advanced from 82½ to 87; Central, 91 to 92½; Reading, 102¾ to 105¾; Michigan Southern, 62¾ to 63¾; Pittsburg, 66¾ to 70½; North-west, steady at 27½; North-west Preferred, 61 to 62¾; Fort Wayne, 94 to 95½; Rock Island, 105½ to 106½. The market steady at the close of the week.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

The bank stocks have recovered from the decline of last week. The Fourth National makes a dividend of 4 per cent. (half yearly) for September, notwithstanding some loss by Ketchum. The Pacific Mail Company have made the usual quarterly cash dividend of 5 per cent., and an extra dividend in scrip of 25 per cent. Atlantic Mail has further recovered to 150; Canton, Cumberland, and Quicksilver are 1 to 2 per cent. higher than last week.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Bills on London, 109⅝ to 109⅞ for gold. The price of gold, 143¾.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

TERMS:—Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER,
130 Nassau street, N. Y.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

GRAND, Celebrated Gold Medal SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,
AND
CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL.

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,

1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of GIFFARD'S INJECTOR, For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

Great Improvements in Sewing Machines.

EMPIRE SHUTTLE MACHINE!

Salesrooms, 536 Broadway, N. Y.,
250 Washington Street, Boston.

This Machine is constructed on entirely new principles of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements, having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION COMBINED.

It has a straight needle perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither RIP nor RAVEL, and is alike on both sides, performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nansook Muslin, with cotton, linen, or sik thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is

EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE!

AGENTS WANTED where none are established, to whom a liberal discount will be given.

T. J. McARTHUR & CO.,
Manufacturers and Proprietors,
536 Broadway, N. Y.

To Library Committees and Others.

An Englishman with some experience as a librarian desires employment in a first-class library or book-store. Address GEO. FEWTRELL, Manchester Post-Office, Allegheny, Pa.

GREAT CENTRAL ROUTE

TO THE WEST AND NORTH-WEST.

MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILROAD,

BETWEEN DETROIT AND CHICAGO, 284 MILES,

is one of the connecting links in the direct and shortest line of rail communication between the Atlantic seaboard and the Mississippi and the Northwest, and, with its connections, forming a through route unequalled for speed, safety, and comfort.

WESTERN CONNECTIONS.

At CHICAGO (at the GREAT CENTRAL DEPOT, with the advantages of transfer of passengers and baggage within the same building) with the ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD, to all Central and Southern Illinois, Cairo, and lower Mississippi River points.

With the CHICAGO, BURLINGTON & QUINCY RAILROAD, to Galesburg, Burlington, and Quincy, and thence by the Burlington and Missouri Road to Southern Iowa, Council Bluffs, and Omaha City; and with the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, to St. Joseph, Leavenworth, Lawrence, Kansas City, etc.

Also, convenient connection with the CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN, the CHICAGO & ROCK ISLAND, and the ST. LOUIS, ALTON & CHICAGO RAILROADS.

Luxurious Sleeping Cars accompany each Night Train.

RUTTANS' PATENT VENTILATING AND ANTI-DUST ARRANGEMENT ON ALL DAY TRAINS.

OFFICERS:

J. W. BROOKS, President, Boston.
R. N. RICE, General Superintendent, Detroit.
C. H. HURD, Assistant Superintendent, "
H. E. SARGEANT, General Agent, Chicago.
THOS. FRAZER, General Ticket Agent, Detroit.
H. C. WENTWORTH, General Western Passenger Agent, Chicago.

☞ Freight Contracts, Bills of Lading, and information furnished at the offices of the Company in the following places:

NEW YORK—Office 173 Broadway, C. E. Noble, Agent.
BOSTON—Office 21 State Street, P. K. Randall, Agent.
BUFFALO—Office Western opposite Mansion House, J. D. Hayes, Agent.
ST. LOUIS—Office 11 City Building, Commercial Street, James Smith, Agent.

WHEELER & WILSON'S

LOCK-STITCH SEWING MACHINES,

625 BROADWAY.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

THE HOWE SEWING MACHINE CO.

ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,

629 BROADWAY.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH

B. T. BABBITT'S

Pure Concentrated Potash,

OR READY SOAP-MAKER.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.

B. T. BABBITT,

64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. 42 JOHN STREET, New York.

Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.

CAUTION.

These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

Hudson River Institute

Affords the very best advantages for a Classical, Scientific, Commercial, and Musical education. French Conversation and Lewis's Gymnastics for Ladies, and Military Drill for Gentlemen daily, without extra charge. A new Gymnasium, costing $6,000. Eighteen Instructors. Term opens September 11.

REV. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Principal.

Claverack, Col. Co., N. Y.

T. C. SELLEW,

MANUFACTURER OF DESKS AND OFFICE FURNITURE,

107 FULTON ST., near NASSAU ST., N. Y.

LIBRARY AND SCHOOL FURNITURE MADE TO ORDER.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!

Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees

IN EVERY STYLE,

MANUFACTURED BY

ROBERT PATON,

24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

GARDEN & CEMETERY ADORNMENTS.

FOUNTAINS, VASES, ETC., ETC.

SUMMER HOUSES,

ARBORS, CHAIRS, SETTEES, ETC.

Wire Trellises and Arches

FOR VINES, FLOWERS, ETC.

IRON FURNITURE,

Bedsteads of every description

For Dwellings, Public Institutions, Hospitals, Prisons, etc.

Patent Spring Beds, Mattresses, etc.

STABLE FIXTURES,

Hay Racks, Mangers, Stall Divisions, etc.

IRON RAILING,

For enclosing Cemetery Plots, Offices, Dwellings, Public Squares, etc.

Having purchased the business of the New York Wire Railing Company, HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM late Agents, we are now the exclusive Owners and Manufacturers of

Patent Wire Railing & Farm Fencing, Window Guards, etc.,

And we offer to the public the largest variety of ORNAMENTAL IRON GOODS to be found in the United States.

Particular attention given to Export trade.

CHASE & CO.,

Warerooms 524 Broadway,

OPPOSITE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, NEW YORK.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,

Importers and Dealers in

TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;

Manufacturers of

COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,

19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

DECKER BROTHERS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PIANO-FORTES.

FACTORY AND WAREROOMS,

91 BLEECKER STREET,

(MARBLE BUILDING,)

One block west from Broadway,

NEW YORK.

MARVIN'S

PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.

Superior to any others in the following particulars:
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by

MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.

Send for a descriptive Circular.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

DEMULCENT SOAP,

FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,

FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.

MANUFACTURED ONLY BY

J. C. HULL'S SON,

32 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Benedict's Time,

171 BROADWAY, COR. CORTLANDT ST., NEW YORK.

TO SOLDIERS.

AMERICAN (WALTHAM) WATCHES.

Let every soldier, before he returns home, provide himself with an AMERICAN WATCH; no better use can be made of money than to invest it in one of these durable and accurate time-pieces. It is a kind of property that constantly returns good interest, and its money value is so well-known that a pocket full of silver dollars wouldn't be as useful.

For sale and warranted by
BENEDICT BROTHERS, Jewelers,
Keepers of the City Time, and Agents for the sale of the American (Waltham) Watches,
171 Broadway, cor. Cortlandt St.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,

STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,

45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS,

AND

BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

STATIONERY.

TO STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS, AND NOTION DEALERS.—The undersigned, being the oldest envelope manufacturers in this country, and having the amplest facilities, are always ready to supply, by the thousand or by the million, envelopes of every variety of size, pattern, and color, at the lowest prices.

Samples furnished when called for.

WM. P. LYON & WHITTEMORE,
537 Pearl St., New York.

W. H. Schieffelin & Co.,

SUCCESSORS TO

SCHIEFFELIN BROTHERS & CO.,

Importers and Jobbers of

DRUGS,

Indigo, Corks, Sponges,

FANCY GOODS, PERFUMERY, ETC., ETC.,
170 and 172 William Street, N. Y.

CARTER, KIRTLAND & CO.,

Manufacturers and Jobbers of

CLOTHING,

340 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK,

OFFER TO FIRST-CLASS BUYERS A LARGE AND VERY COMPLETE STOCK OF

FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING

OF ALL GRADES,

EMBRACING FINE, MEDIUM, AND LOW-PRICED GOODS.

Having made extensive purchases at a time when all were sellers and very few were buyers, we are in a position to supply our customers upon the most favorable and advantageous terms.

Jobbers, Merchant Tailors, and Dealers generally will find it to their advantage to call and examine our stock before purchasing.

Particular attention paid to the execution of orders.

SAM'L CARTER, WM. H. KIRTLAND,
JOHN ROSE, CHAS. B. PEET,
JOHN H. WERTS, Special.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.
New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by
JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

FINKLE & LYON'S

IMPROVED

LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

Economical Housekeepers Use

PYLE'S SALERATUS. | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.

Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

Archer & Pancoast,

9, 11, 13, 15, AND 17 MERCER STREET, NEW YORK,

Manufacturers of Gas and Coal Oil Fixtures, Chandeliers, Pendants, Brackets, Lamps, etc., etc., for home trade or exportation, as also the Patent Convex and other Lanterns for burning coal oil without a chimney.

Dealers are respectfully invited to examine our goods. Warerooms and Manufactory, 9, 11, 13, 15, and 17 Mercer Street, New York.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.

ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.

"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.
"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.
"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.
"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.

Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.

WM. B. BRADBURY,
425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 10. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1865. $3 PER ANNUM

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK..... 289

The Richmond Protest..... 293
Democratic Distresses..... 293
Cotton Culture..... 294
Judge Edmonds on "Spiritualism"... 295
The Progress of National Wealth..... 296
The Income Tax.—A Contrast..... 297

CORRESPONDENCE:
The "Grate Easturn"..... 298

The South as It Is..... 298
England.—The Five-Fold Murder..... 300
France and the United States..... 302
Legal Memoranda..... 303
The Break Up..... 304
A Few Words about Cholera..... 306

LITERATURE:
Literary Notes..... 310
Two Lectures by Mr. Ruskin..... 313
Persian Characteristics..... 314

Current Literature..... 316

FINANCIAL REVIEW..... 318

Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

THIS week has much resembled that which preceded it, if its "sensational" features are alone regarded. The disasters by rail have continued, and have been brought home to this community by a shocking collision on the Long Island road, the result of heinous recklessness, aggravated by the parsimony of a corporation which forced its passengers upon the platforms, rather than provide them with accommodations inside. The verdict of "somebody to blame" in the Housatonic "accident," has been followed even more pointedly by the jury which sat upon the smash-up on the Oil Creek road. They not only indicate the guilty parties, but request the coroner to issue his warrant for their apprehension and trial. Wirtz's case still proceeds. His counsel deserted him for one day in a huff with the court, but were induced to return on the next. The evidence against him is most positive, and equally sickening. Edward Ketchum has been arrested in this city, which he not only did not leave, but scarcely skulked in. At the request of Ketchum, Son & Co., their inventory was examined by a committee of gentlemen not interested in their solvency, and a careful valuation of their assets made. Their liabilities amount to $3,985,608 35 against $3,093,639 63 of assets, and they were advised to offer fifty per cent. in cash and ten per cent. in notes at twelve months. This report was adopted by the creditors at a meeting on Friday. Mr. P. R. Mumford was discharged on the admission of the prosecution that there was no ground to convict him of fraud, since the bank had been in the habit of honoring his checks even when he was known to have no deposit.

ON and after Friday, by previous proclamation of the President, the last restrictions upon trade with the South were removed. The necessity having in a great measure ceased, those articles which, in the proclamation of June, were prohibited from importation as contraband of war, are now released, subject only to such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. If the faith of our British cousins is still strong in the invincible spirit of the Southern people, they may embrace this opportunity to renew their traffic in Whitworths, Blakelys, and the lesser munitions of war.

GOVERNOR HOLDEN asks General Ruger, commanding the Department of North Carolina, for what purpose he, the said governor, is clothed with power to appoint judges of the civil courts; and General Ruger negatively responds that it is not for the purpose of preserving the peace, which is solely the business of the military. These troublesome men of war, it seems, had arrested three citizens of the County of Person, upon the charge of an assault made by them upon the body of a freedman named Currie. The governor objects to the jurisdiction, and says he has "every confidence that strict and impartial justice will be administered" by the magistrates of his appointment. The general manifests a decided lack of confidence in the justice, but no doubt whatever about the jurisdiction. He says that he has never heard of any official notice being taken of acts of unlawful violence towards freedmen, and that, at the time of the arrest, no civil court had taken cognizance of the disorder in question. The governor replies that the old Carolina way is good enough for him and (constructively) for the negro, and that the delays complained of "have been tolerated for ages." Moreover, the free blacks have always been treated fairly in the State courts, and he cannot suspect "as honest a people as exist anywhere"—meaning the citizens of North Carolina—of any disposition to deal unjustly with the same class at the present time. The general remains firm, and the difference has been referred to the President for settlement.

OUR law correspondent, in number five of THE NATION, alluded to the very gradual melioration of the treatment of the accused in criminal cases. Spite of the maxim that a defendant is assumed to be innocent until proved to be guilty, he has been treated so, in British courts, only in the matter of evidence. Thus, to quote from our correspondent, "till very recently, the prisoner or his defender was not permitted to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution; and it was not till the year 1836 that the persons on trial for felonies were allowed personally or by counsel to address juries in defence." This last July a still further concession was made, under a recent act of Parliament, by which criminal advocates now have a right to sum up the evidence before the reply of the prosecution. In France, the practice is for the magistrate to cross-examine the defendant, as if his word were not to be trusted. A State which has more than once been a pioneer in our American legislation, again excites our interest and, we cannot err in saying, secures our commendation by a novel experiment in criminal procedure. The Legislature of Maine, at its last session, passed an act which permits a prisoner arraigned for murder to testify in his own behalf. It has just been applied in a case of which it is reported:

"The testimony of witnesses left no doubt that the prisoner killed the person alleged; but as the deed was done in the dark, no one but himself could know whether it was in self-defence or not. The remarkable simplicity and apparent truthfulness of the prisoner, his prompt and ready answers, freedom from all contradiction and equivocation, and in fact every test of truth, were so striking, that the court, jury, and the crowd of listeners were all convinced that he was fully justified in the killing. Without his own testimony, however, he would probably have been severely dealt with by the law."

THE politics of the week find their main interest in the doings of the Jersey Democracy at Trenton, on Wednesday, the 30th ult. So distinguished a party hulk might have been looked to for something original in its bill of complaints and charges against its opponents, but the convention's resolutions were hardly more than a repetition of what we have been hearing all summer. The little character which they have is entirely in keeping with New Jersey's reputation for liberality in money matters. There must be a return, say they, to a gold and silver currency; it is unequal to exempt Government bonds from taxation; the soldiers must be paid the full bounty promised them by Government; the national debt is "onerous and improperly managed." The Democratic game of selecting candidates from the army, as shown in Ohio and Pennsylvania, was confirmed by the assembly at Trenton.

Major-General Runyon was nominated for Governor. It is touching to observe with what magnanimity our conservative friends overlook participation in the "cruel war" brought on by the radicals. The official returns of the Kentucky election divide the House into 58 Opposition and 42 Union, while the Senate has a tie of 18 to 18. Lieut.-Gov. Jacobs is said to favor the Constitutional Amendment, and his vote would then decide for it in the upper chamber. Gen. Cox made a speech at Oberlin on the 21st ult. A colored member of his audience rose to ask him if he would, when elected Governor of Ohio, advocate bestowing the suffrage upon the colored people of the State. The General's reply was received "with enthusiastic applause," if we may credit the report, but it hardly seems to us to have called for such a demonstration from the class most interested in it. The speaker "believed the question must be decided for the black men as a unit, and that the duty of the colored man here was to connect his destiny with those of the South." Still, if there was to be a separate decision, he should be for the full application of the rights of man. The "Worcester Freedom Club" is alarmed at the wooing of the President by every Democratic convention, and warns the Republican party against "Tylerization." They see in negro suffrage the only assurance that the disloyal element when returned to office will not join the Democracy in demanding the assumption of the rebel debt and indemnification for the loss of their slaves. That these fears are not visionary may be inferred from the advertisement of David Miller, who wishes to represent in Congress the Eighth District of Virginia. He publishes in the Lynchburg Republican his political confession, and says, apropos of the debt created by the United States in prosecuting the war against rebellion:

"I am opposed to the Southern States being taxed at all for the redemption of this debt, either directly or indirectly, and if elected to Congress I will oppose all such measures, and I will vote to repeal all laws that have heretofore been passed for that purpose. And in doing so I do not consider that I violate any obligation to which the South was a party (!) We have never plighted our faith for the redemption of the war debt. (!) The people will be borne down with taxes for years to come, even if the war debt is repudiated. It will be the duty of the Government to support the maimed and disabled soldiers, and this will be a great expense; and if the United States Government requires the South to be taxed for the support of the Union soldiers, we should insist that all disabled soldiers should be maintained by the United States Government, without regard to the side they had taken in the war. (!)"

The eighth annual report of the Central Park Commissioners shows that little was done during the past year beyond completing structures already in progress and extending the drive. Remains of fortifications thrown up in 1812 on the brow of the hills forming the southern boundary of the Harlem plains, and traces of a Revolutionary encampment, will be preserved as far as possible. The practice of transplanting trees of large size is abandoned as unsuccessful. The visitors to the Park have increased largely since 1861, and the vehicles more than doubled. In 1864 there flocked thither 2,295,199 pedestrians, 100,397 equestrians, and 1,148,161 vehicles, the greatest numbers of each being recorded in January, June, and May respectively. About $1,000 profit was derived from boat service. The police have few, and these mostly trifling, charges to make against the multitude.

It appears strange, at first sight, that the freedmen of Maryland, a self-emancipated State, should need the protection of the Bureau at Washington. The report of Lieut. G. A. Clark, who has been visiting Prince George, St. Charles, and St. Mary's Counties, makes the necessity plain, however. He found the spirit of slavery and the spirit of disloyalty unabated, the accomplished fact of negro liberty accepted only in bitterness, and the relations between employers and laborers of the most uncomfortable character. Yet labor is scarce, and but half the usual amount of land is under cultivation. The witnesses against North Carolina are too numerous to sustain the pretence of a conspiracy against her reputation. Lieut. A. W. Hahn, passing through the northeastern portion of the State, where there is no military force, reports the shooting of three negroes in Northampton county, by the Home Guard, because they accepted employment away from their former masters and refused to return. The freedom of the colored population is not admitted, and a disposition on their part to assert it is met with torture and death. A Union man in Hertford County was hunted for his life for hiring a negro girl without consulting her master. Col. Whittlesey, the commissioner at Raleigh, informs the freedmen by circular that if any refuse to enter into contracts because they expect the Government to give them farms, they will be disappointed. They will own land when they have earned it by diligent industry. Offices of the Bureau have been established in South Carolina, at Orangeburg, Spartansburg, Winnsboro', Camden, and Austin; at all which points the planters are said to be readily embracing the contract system. At Columbia alone over six hundred contracts have been made since July 1st. Gen. Ely, the commissioner at that place, has prohibited the discharge or driving off of the freedmen from the plantations upon which they are engaged without permission from the Bureau, as has been done in several instances on insufficient grounds. Gen. Swayne, at Montgomery, Alabama, states that many cases of violence now bruited really date back to the occupation of the State, but there are still frequent murders of whites and blacks, chiefly owing to cotton stealing and indiscriminate robberies. An abstract of the report of Col. Samuel Thomas, assistant commissioner at Vicksburg, dated Aug. 15, is worth reproducing. After mentioning the speedy repairs of railroads, bridges, and highways, and the extension of the telegraph to the interior of the State, he says:

"The colonies of freedmen working the land assigned them at Davis Bend, Camp Hawley, near Vicksburg, De Soto Point, opposite, and at Washington, near Natchez, are all doing well; their crops are maturing fast; as harvest time approaches, the number of rations issued is reduced, and they are compelled to rely on their own resources. At least ten thousand bales of cotton will be raised by these people, who are raising crops on their own account. The number of idle people around them is constantly declining, as labor is abundant, and good prices are offered for all kinds of work. The Treasury Department has turned over to the Bureau all lands, houses, and tenements held by them. This included houses in Vicksburg and Natchez, which were being rented from month to month, and plantations leased Jan. 1, 1865. This property is a source of considerable revenue to the Bureau. The amount of rations issued to whites is about the same as issued to freedmen. Not less than 5,000 people are cutting wood for steamers on the Mississippi River, and more people are engaged in this business than ever, but they support themselves. The total number of freedmen in the State is estimated at 346,600, of whom only 3,000 are receiving assistance from Government."

The lot of the people of color in the parishes of Louisiana is hard enough. The ordinances of Opelousas afford an example of the general treatment of the despised race. The freedmen cannot hold meetings, move about or come to town without passes and permits from their employers, be found in the streets at night after ten o'clock, keep or rent a house within the limits of the town, engage in traffic without written leave, nor even reside in town, unless in the regular service of some white person. It is small compensation that the colored citizens of New Orleans, under the protecting wing of "headquarters," have just overcome the prejudice which confined them to certain "star cars" on the horse rail-roads. At Chattanooga, 904 whites receive rations, and only 43 negroes. Gen. Fiske has broken up every contraband camp in East Tennessee, and intends doing the same with all that remain in his department. The Bureau at Washington has received an application for one hundred freedmen, to be employed at fair wages in coal-mining on the James River.

On Monday, August 28, the Volunteer Refreshment Saloon in Philadelphia was closed, after having performed its beneficent mission of nourishing our defenders on their way to and from the battle-fields of the South. In four years twelve hundred thousand soldiers have been fed and cared for by the quiet, regular, unostentatious contributions and personal attendance of the good women of the Quaker City. This gigantic charity, local only in its scene of operations, deserves to rank with the widespread labors of the Sanitary and Christian Commissions, and reflects as much honor upon Philadelphia as the latter upon the nation at large.

We omitted to mention, last week, that the clause whereby the Mississippi Convention amended their constitution in favor of emancipa-tion also directed the legislature, at its next session, to "provide by law for the protection and security of the persons and property of the freedmen of the State, and guard them and the State against any evil that may arise from their sudden emancipation." This sounds well enough, but we venture to predict that the protection afforded will not be self-protection, nor the instrument the ballot; and, therefore, we earnestly hope that the Government, in the exercise of its proper function toward the reconstructed States, will forestall the action of the Legislature of Mississippi. What sort of protection, even with the best intentions, could be extended by this body is questionable, when we know that the convention refused to submit its work to the popular judgment, as was the case in Tennessee; that Gov. Sharkey has called upon the people by proclamation to form two companies in each county —one of cavalry and another of infantry—to preserve order and put an end to murder and robberies; and that the gubernatorial candidate, Judge E. S. Fisher, is still an applicant for pardon. Gen. Slocum has, meanwhile, countermanded the dangerous and extra-official call of the governor, as was right, and has ordered a general surrender of arms to the officers of the United States.

A LIQUOR DEALER in Massachusetts attempted to outwit the law of the State which makes his calling illegal by claiming a right to sell intoxicating liquors under a license from the United States. The Supreme Court, to which the case was carried up, decided, against Mr. Holbrook, that the payment to the United States of a fee for license, and a revenue duty or tax, does not exempt a man from responsibility for violating the criminal laws of the commonwealth. The statute in question is sometimes inaccurately called a sumptuary law, but even if it were, it would not be diametrically opposed to the internal revenue regulations, which surely are not intended to foster the luxuries which they tax. Neither could the action of the State, if it had been subsequent to the passage of the United States law, be considered unpatriotic, since vice, or the cause of vice and crime, as Massachusetts regards the sale of liquor, is not more respectable or to be tolerated because so long as it is unmolested the Government can extort a tribute from it. The ordinary tradesman or manufacturer who seeks in a legitimate way to escape the burden of taxation must also not be judged hardly. If some departments of industry are abandoned, others are created, and the general balance is preserved. The fashion which has so largely superseded felt hats with those made of cloth, is due to the enhanced cost of alcohol and lac, in a solution of which the former are dipped for stiffening.

THE following is an extract from the letter of an intelligent correspondent, sent out by an association of factories in Massachusetts, for the purpose of obtaining information on the condition of the South and prospects of the cotton culture. It is both interesting and important:

"AUGUSTA, GA., Aug. 18.

"I have given considerable attention to the causes leading to the exodus of the freedmen from the plantations to the towns, and have arrived at the following conclusions: Negroes do not like plantation labor, particularly the cultivation of cotton, sugar, rice, and tobacco, on a large scale. Those blacks who are engaged in any other employment, mechanical or domestic, have always looked down on the 'field hands,' as they were accustomed to call them, and felt above them. Now the field hand perceives, as he thinks, an opportunity for a higher grade of labor, and with an aspiration that is perfectly natural and easily understood, will do anything else rather than work on the plantations for the same wages. An odium attaches to field service among the blacks; hence they flock to the towns, and any number can be hired for deck-hands on the steamers, servants at hotels or in private residences, stevedores, teamsters—in short, anything else besides the detested field service. The crack of the driver's whip still echoes in their ears, and they fly from the scenes of former cruelties. Those who could remain—mostly the older ones—are taunted by the others as 'mean-spirited,' and their inclination overborne. This is my explanation, derived from my observation of one of the causes, and a principal one, which leads the freedman to desert the old plantation. But other reasons are not wanting. The blacks are all inclined to think this is their holiday, their 'year of jubelum;' and many careful observers and good judges believe that next season much of the license and hilarity which at present are universal among them will have passed away. And it must not be forgotten, that up to the day of the dispersion of the Confederate armies, thousands and thousands of negroes remained under the same control within the Confederate lines as before the war; hence, the breaking down of the rebellion was the forming of a new existence for them. On the large plantations in this vicinity were hundreds of blacks who had never in their lives visited a city or been further than a few miles from their master's plantation. What wonder that they should swarm to a scene with so much of novelty and interest to them? It cannot be denied that wherever our black troops have been stationed, the labor on the surrounding plantations has almost entirely ceased. If the advice of the soldiers has not influenced the plantation hands, their example has. I must give it as my opinion, from what I see on every side, that the day is very distant when such crops of cotton as were produced just before the war will again be raised. Northern men must be the men to plant. Of this there can be no doubt. Not one planter in ten will ever adapt himself to the new order of things. Everywhere I meet them with their families moving out of the country, firmly persuaded it is ruined."

IT is said that the Postmaster-General finds it difficult to make appointments in South Carolina, because of the almost universal connection of the population with the late rebellion, and an act of Congress requires an oath to the contrary. Now we submit the difficulty is not so great as represented, for about two-thirds of the inhabitants can take this retroactive oath without a particle of perjury. Why does not Mr. Dennison choose his postmasters, clerks, and route-agents from the ever-loyal blacks of South Carolina, since Congress has removed all disabilities for that service, and it is no longer a penal offence for a colored man to know how to read and write? Why not retort upon the South generally a little of the black-mailing which she attempted upon us here through her minions? Gov. Perry is clamorous for mail facilities, though it is likely that if his first speech at Greenville had come more promptly to Washington, he might never have enjoyed his provisional title. We doubt if, with all his professed desire for newspapers and letters, he would relish seeing colored employees in the Charleston office, from which, not many years ago, the mails were taken forcibly and burnt—by spontaneous combustion, if we remember, since they were charged with "incendiary" publications. However, beggars must not be choosers, and it does not follow that because a person cannot vote he cannot hold office under Government and receive a salary. There are postmistresses, and we wish Mr. Dennison would institute colored postmasters. Meanwhile, let us applaud his activity in arranging for the carriage of the mails on the Mississippi, and by the new route to Brazil; also, for a regular mail service between San Francisco and Hong Kong, China, via the Sandwich Islands and Kanagawa, Japan. The latter will not commence before Jan. 1, 1867. Twelve round trips per annum are to be made for $500,000. As many will be made between New York and Rio Janeiro for $300,000, touching at St. Thomas, Bahia, and Pernambuco.

IN the necrology of the week are embraced the names of Governor John Brough, of Ohio, and Mr. George Livermore, of Boston. Gov. Brough died at Cleveland on Tuesday, the 29th of August, of gangrene in the foot, accompanied by malignant carbuncle, from which he suffered for weeks before his decease. He was born in 1811, at Marietta, and became an office-holder through the familiar stages of law and journalism. He was largely identified with the railway interests of the State when the rebellion broke out and found him prompt to enrol himself among the War Democrats. He carried the election against Vallandigham by an unprecedented majority, and the universal tribute now paid to his memory explains the reason of his popularity. He was honest, energetic, and of native nobility of character. Mr. Livermore was a wool merchant, and one of the most thorough gentlemen in the trade. His leisure from business was devoted to literature, and especially to antiquarian studies. His work entitled an "Historical Research respecting the Opinions of the Founders of the Republic on Negroes as Slaves, as Citizens, and Soldiers," was printed and circulated at his own expense, and helped efficiently to improve public sentiment on the subject of negro enlistments. After a prostration of twelve weeks from varicose veins, he succumbed to a stroke of paralysis, and died on Wednesday, August 30. He was but fifty-six years of age.

THE latest advices from Jamaica represent the existing state of things there to be really dreadful, and fully corroborate what we have asserted of the wretched management of that island. Between an extraordinary drought and the grievous taxation of the necessaries of life, the suffering of the poorer classes is extreme. Add to this that a petition of distress which was addressed by the blacks to the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Cardwell, was met with an exhortation to them to work more diligently than they had been doing, and that public feeling is so much aroused as to cause apprehensions of an outbreak.

News from the belligerents about the tributaries of the Plate River is chiefly favorable to the Paraguayans. They have recovered the guns from their disabled ships, and also from one of the enemy's vessels, and have driven the Brazilian fleet down stream by threatening it with land batteries. They have invaded Matto Grosso and other of the interior provinces of the empire, but have received a repulse not far from San Borja, in Rio Grande. Gen. Urquiza has lost his army by desertion.

The spreading of the cattle-plague and the approach of the cholera, which has reached Marseilles, occupy the general attention of England. She has been also concerned in the celebration of the Emperor's birthday, so far as relates to the naval gathering at Cherbourg, whither she sent her iron-clads on the 14th. On the 18th the squadron proceeded to Brest. The festivities of the 15th were dampened by the most dreary weather. At Rouen an equestrian statue of the first Napoleon was uncovered by Marshal Vaillant, the deputed representative of the Emperor. The artist was a M. Vital-Dubray. The adventurous aeronaut, Godard, made an ascension on the same occasion, during which he was caught in a storm, and forced to abandon his balloon to save his life. At Lyons the bridges were freed from tolls, and a magnificent fountain in the Place Louis XVI. inaugurated. The Emperor dispensed numerous pardons, commutations, and reductions of penalties, and set at liberty several juvenile prisoners of La Roquette. The Empress also distributed 74,200 francs among seventy-five charitable societies in several cities. Close upon the heels of the report which we noticed last week, comes the announcement of a new farm-school, "with all the modern improvements," to be established, perhaps, in the department of Nièvre, where, as is not more wittily than truthfully added, "they will adopt a somewhat more sensible plan than that which isolates the youth in order to teach them to become 'sociable.'" Austria and Prussia have settled their quarrel. The latter buys Lauenburg of the former; the provisional government of the Duchies continues, Prussia managing Schleswig, and Austria Holstein. The Suez Canal was opened on the 17th of August, and a boat laden with coal passed through from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea. The Great Eastern reached England in safety. A letter from Captain Anderson to Mr. Low, of this city. expresses his utmost confidence in the ultimate success of the cable, He does not believe that the faults were occasioned by malice, but by accident only. The attempt to recover the cable will not be made this year.

The death of Mme. Charles Lemonnier at Paris has elicited a tribute to her eminent services to her sex. Desirous of ameliorating, by a practical education, the lot of women who have to labor for their subsistence, she undertook to found establishments for the professional instruction of young girls of scanty means. She solicited with great zeal subscriptions for this purpose from among her personal friends, but at first could raise comparatively little. For six years, beginning with 1856, she confined herself to sending a certain number of girls to Germany, to an institution such as she was contemplating for Paris. In 1862, the Society for the Professional Instruction of Women was at last constituted, and opened a school in the Rue de la Perle which was soon transferred to a much more commodious site in the Rue de Val Sainte-Catherine, where it still remains and numbers 133 pupils. Last November a new school was started in the Rue Rochechouart. The morning is occupied with such general studies as history geography, etc., and other hours with industrial drawing, wood engraving, trade, the making-up of garments, linen-drapery, etc. "The success of the enterprise," we are told, "is no longer doubtful, and it should be declared the more loudly by as much as it is an initiatory work purely feminine."

"In France the state is quite disposed to believe that the citizens cannot succeed in founding anything good unless it lends them assistance; and men, for their part, are apt to imagine that women cannot dispense with them. By dispensing with them, as with the state, the ociety affords them at once a little lesson in humility, and a good example of self-government. It is exclusively composed of and conducted by women."

One of the principal bankers of Paris is building a sumptuous hall for artistic, scientific, and literary uses, and purposes bestowing a large portion of its revenue upon the society. We may note, in connection with the subject of female employment, that the printing-offices in France are now entered by a small but significant number of women, who are exciting the opposition of their male fellow compositors, much as we have witnessed it in this country. The Journal de Saint-Pétersbourg mentions a stringent regulation of the University in 1863, which prohibited women from following the University courses. A Miss K., who had a decided taste for medicine without the means to devote herself to that profession, applied to the authorities of the country of Orenburg, offering to put the medical education she should receive at the Academy at the service of the Cossack inhabitants, who have superstitious scruples against being treated by men, and in consequence resort to ignorant female sorcerers. The ingenious application met with favor. Miss K. received permission to attend the Academy of Medicine, and the Cossacks of Orenburg assured her a stipend of 28 roubles a month. In May of the present year she passed the examinations for the first half of the course as well as most of the students, if not better, and the Cossacks sent her 300 roubles by way of encouragement. The case is altogether remarkable.

The obelisk of Luxor, which was brought from Egypt to Paris in 1833, and set up in the Place de la Concorde three years later, is undergoing a restoration, or, rather, the pedestal on which it rests. For while the chiselling on the monolith itself has defied the ravages of time, the inscriptions on its base in gilded letters, on the northern and southern faces, along with the representations of the process of removing and erecting the obelisk, have been in large measure effaced and rendered illegible in the short space of thirty years. It is proposed to ornament the apex with a metallic star, such as one sees on the obelisks at Rome, but we hope this idea will not prevail. This obelisk is seventy-five and a half feet high, on a single block of granite sixteen and a half feet high; but the weight of the former is but twice and a half that of the latter. In Europe there are thirty-five Egyptian obelisks standing: fourteen in Italy, twelve of which are at Rome, two at Constantinople, five in England, and two in France—the second being at Arles.

They are discussing in France the meteorological influence of forests, before disposing of those which belong to the state. Against the theory of M. Boussingault, that the prevalence of woods tends to reduce the temperature, the testimony of Humboldt is cited: that no change whatever has been effected in the climate of America by reason of the wholesale destruction of trees which has taken place here. Mr. Marsh, in his "Man and Nature," takes exactly the opposite view, and his appeal to the recollection of by no means the oldest inhabitants will be supported. Our winters are both shorter and less severe than they used to be less than fifty years ago.

George Peabody's magnificent gift of $750,000, for the purpose of constructing dwellings for the poor of London, has been partially expended in a huge brick building in what was one of the worst spots (morally) in London. It is divided into single rooms and suites of two and three, which are let at two, three, and five shillings a week respectively. There are four blocks, each of which will contain sixty families. The rooms are nine feet by twelve, and well ventilated, and the building is five stories high, and is furnished with space for drying clothes, washing-room, and a well capable of supplying 1,760 gallons of water. Similar structures are to be put up in other parts of the city. Some good men have begun a similar work for New York, but, unhappily, they confine themselves thus far to building houses for sale, and so bring little comfort to some of the most unfortunate victims of the "tenement houses."

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE RICHMOND PROTEST.

A MASS meeting was held at Richmond last week, which the correspondents of the morning papers pronounce to have been a "decided failure," but which, nevertheless, did suceeed in uttering some very strong denunciations of the persistent and wicked efforts

"of a portion of the press and people of the Northern States to brand the people of the South with perfidy and insincerity in the honest attempts they have made, and are making, to resume their former relations with the Union, by questioning their fidelity and truth in the oaths of allegiance which they have taken, and, by vague and unsupported charges, that they desire, if they do not contemplate, further resistance to its authority."

Other resolutions proclaimed anew the submission of the South to the authority of the Government, and soundly rated "the so-called Radical party, which propose to the Southern States the alternative of negro suffrage or an indefinite exclusion from the benefits of a common and equal Union."

Now we have never doubted the sincerity of the desire expressed by the Southern people within the last three months to come back to the Union. Ever since Lee's defeat there has evidently been nothing they sought more eagerly. The reason why they have been so much denounced at the North, and why there is so strong a determination to keep them out of Congress, is that they have never given any of those signs of love for the Union, and have never offered any of those securities for their good behavior, which the people of the North, whether rightly or wrongly, have decided to be essential.

It is hardly necessary to argue with so sensible and practical a people as the Southerners the right of the North to impose these conditions. It seeks to impose them, as it believes, in the interest of its own safety, and in virtue of the power which it has won by the war. The South deliberately appealed to the sword, the consequences of such an appeal being, as the world has known ever since war began, that the vanquished shall take the law from the victor. It has been thoroughly beaten. The decision of its fate rests, therefore, with the North. It is very amusing to hear men who for four years have been shedding their blood like water for the destruction of this Government, railing now, when the sword has been stricken from their hands, over the monstrosity of not admitting them with alacrity to the position in which they stood before they took up arms at all.

They make a great fuss over the fact that they submit to the abolition of slavery, and think this should cover all other omissions. Well, it covers nothing whatever. We feel under no more obligation to them for submitting to the emancipation of the negroes than to Lee for surrendering Richmond, or to John Morgan for giving up the ghost. They have in this simply accepted an accomplished fact. It is absurd to talk or think of it as a concession made to the North, which can or ought to be made the basis of a compromise between the two sections, or which gives the planters a claim on our indulgence or forbearance. We ask them now, as proof of the sincerity of their professions and of their determination to promote a solid reunion, not for things which the war has already wrested from them, but for things which it is still in their power to yield or withhold; and one of them is, not "negro suffrage," as they sophistically call it, but equality before the law for all classes and conditions of people. This is what we exact of them; and it is our exacting this, and nothing more, that leads them to utter the dismal lamentations and reproaches which are wrapped up in the Richmond resolutions. "See how repentant and well behaved we are," they tell us; "we let the rain fall, and the rivers flow, without a word of remonstrance; but not content with this, the wicked radicals actually ask us to give our black neighbors the same securities against robbery, murder, and oppression which we enjoy ourselves."

It is worse than silly to tell people, at this time of day, that the political condition of the negro at the South is no affair of ours. The blacks form a third of the Southern people, and constitute its whole laboring population. It is their social and political condition, therefore, which must determine whether it is safe or not for us to live under the same government with the Southern States; whether the rate of progress of these States is to be the same as ours; whether, in short, their civilization is to have the same character and drift as ours. So that the whole question has an interest for us altogether apart from any philanthropic concern we may feel for the negro. It is mischievous and false to talk of the matter as if it had no bearings but humanitarian ones. Whatever seems likely to interfere with order and progress at the South, as we understand them, and we have won by the war the right of defining them, threatens also the peace and welfare of the North; and we have therefore a right to look into the nature of the institutions under which the South proposes to come back and live with us. The exclusion of a large portion of the population over half our territory from the protection of the laws, is a matter with which we have everything to do. It is our affair politically to just the same extent that it is the affair of the South, for the simple reason that it is a national affair.

We have not the least desire, and we doubt if anybody has at the North, to bear heavily on the Southern people, or to misconstrue their intentions. But we can only judge of how they feel and think by their acts, and none of these have so far afforded any proof of a readiness on their part to advance one step further towards reconstruction and reunion than they were compelled by military power. We had a right to expect, if not as friends and neighbors, at least as victors, that the persons chosen to represent the South in the dealings with us would not be persons who had played a prominent part in the late unhappy troubles. No others, or next to none, have so far been elected. In the new constitutions that have been framed, slavery it is true has been declared abolished, which is about as valuable as a resolution declaring the grass green or the sky blue, but no disposition has been shown to give the Emancipation Proclamation effect, by placing the negroes under the protection of the law. These injured innocents in Richmond, these unhappy unprotected white men who are so horrified by our unwillingness to place our purse and sword and honor in their hands, will not even consent to give the blacks the simple right of being heard in a court of justice. The mere mention of it excites their rage, though we believe it is a right which no freeman in any civilized country has ever been refused, and a right without which a man stands in the position of a wild animal, and holds his life, limbs, and property at the mercy of every knave or ruffian in the community.

Southern men may be satisfied of one thing, and that is, that if the North be, as they say, vindictive, there is but one way of meeting and disarming its vindictiveness, and that is by doing justice. They have only to say that no legal distinction shall hereafter exist amongst them on account of color, and they will find the agitation about the negro which has so long raged here silent for ever. We do not ask them to turn over the government of their States to the ignorant. They may exact what qualifications they please in the way of intelligence or property from either voters or candidates for office, but we do insist upon it that they shall exact them of men of all colors. We propose until they do this to keep them out of Congress as long as we can, not because we take any delight in harassing them, or because it pleases us to see military government perpetuated amongst them, but because we consider their willingness to establish democratic institutions, to become really one people with us, can in no other way be proved. We ask them, in short, to do something more than accept the fact which we have forced on them at the point of the bayonet. So far, they have done nothing but throw down their arms, and obey the orders of our military commanders.

DEMOCRATIC DISTRESSES.

IT was no idiosyncracy of the Bourbons that "they remembered nothing and forgot nothing," and consequently learned nothing from the teachings of exile. The same infirmity of memory is incident to Democrats as well as to despots, accompanied by a like incapacity to profit by the lessons of their own experience. They remember perfectly well the golden days of Pierce and Buchanan, when they possessed the land, and waxed fat on the milk and honey of office wherewith it flowed. They remember that it was through the alliance and helping of their Southern brethren that they had entered into this goodly heritage, and they long for a renewal of the fraternal affiance which shall restore it once again to them. They seem to have forgotten that it was through the treachery of those very allies that they were thrust from their paradise into the cold outer world, and that they see its gate whenever they cast a lingering look backward towards its portals—now, alas, closed against them. And they fail to discern, as it would seem, what a different world they live in from that of five years ago; how completely the fiery tide of war has swept away the old landmarks of parties, and how impossible it is to set them up again as of old. The restoration of the Bourbons was a failure, because the French nation had remembered everything while it had forgotten nothing; and the restoration of the old Democratic party is an impossibility, because the American people have also excellent memories, and intend to apply them to equally excellent uses.

"With dreadful faces thronged and fiery arms,"

The proceedings of the Democratic conventions in several of the States, lately, have been full of proofs that it is as impossible for inveterate politicians as for inveterate potentates to understand that times change and men change with them. To read their platforms, one might infer that there had been a considerable riot somewhere in the Southern country, which they had helped to put down, but which was not of consequence enough to justify interference with the regular exercise of their political rights by the rioters; that, in point of fact, the riot would have been prevented had the Democracy remained in power; and that it was the success of the party now in possession of the Government that brought the disturbance about. They affirm that the revolted States have never been out of the Union, and that they are entitled "to all their reserved rights and their due representation in Congress." They agree as to the horrors that would ensue from the admission of the negroes to citizenship, and the entire subjection of the white race to the black in the event of such a catastrophe. And they are unanimous, we believe, in making love to President Johnson, and trying to entice him to barter his position as the head of a great nation for that of the leader of a desperate faction. A good symptom of general public health may be discerned in the zeal they all profess for the maintenance of the national credit and the payment of the public debt—a zeal which they can hardly expect to be shared by the prodigal brethren they are inviting to return from the husks of rebellion to the old Democratic homestead. All, we believe; unless it be the Split Convention held at Columbus, Ohio, which, if we understand the abridgment of its doings that we have seen, went squarely against the debt and in favor of free trade, and flatly denied the right of the Government to emancipate the slaves—a question which the more responsible bodies either avoided entirely or touched only inferentially.

We suppose that the hackneyed politicians who made up the mass of these conventions are beyond the reach of grace. They must be given over to a reprobate mind and to the idols to which they are joined. Like old drunkards, their case is hopeless; but we would uplift a warning voice to the young who are just entering on the devious ways of politics, and bid them beware of casting in their lot with those broken-down tempters. The whole ground on which they used to stand, as if established for ever, has been utterly cut away from under their feet by the sword of the nation. The whole state of public feeling is radically changed from what it was then. The revolution in public opinion which, having begun, was sure to go on and ultimately prevail, has been hurried forward a half century by the suicidal hands of the Southern Democracy; and it is one that will never go backward.

Up to the time of the election of 1860 the nation was at ease in its possessions, making money, growing in population, lightly taxed, and having all the substantial elements of material prosperity in abundance. It shrank from any disturbance of its repose. Above all, it shuddered at civil war and intestine strife. It was content to let the Democratic party of the North, with the assistance of the Southern slaveholders, rule and revel, provided it could enjoy tranquillity in its borders for the time, and have the evil day postponed. The bullying of the slaveholders, though only half believed to be in earnest, was allowed to shape the policy of the nation, and keep the party which incarnated it in power. But the bullies were not content with this dispensation. Like the boy in the fable, the diurnal egg of gold was not enough for their greed; they must needs hew the Democratic goose in twain, in hopes of securing an inexhaustible treasure at a stroke. The result we know. The old Democratic party, thus slain in the house of its friends, it is in vain to endeavor to galvanize into a ghastly show of life again. Its particles must live in new forms and under new conditions, or suffer political annihilation.

The people, as we have said, have the best of memories. They remember well the rule of the Democratic party under the nominal headship of Pierce and Buchanan, but under the real dictation of the slave power. They remember how the rebellion was contrived, and all the particulars of the plot arranged under those auspices. They have not forgotten the disadvantages under which they therefore entered into their struggle for life. Their dangers from false friends, all of the Democratic brand, are fresh on their minds. They bitterly call up the cruel cost in the blood of their best and bravest at which their freedom has been purchased. All this will not be blotted from their memories by the "glittering generalities" or the commonplaces of the Democratic party. The people have learned, further, that they can exist without the help of the South—that they can not only exist, but thrive and grow rich and increase in goods, while it is the South that is one great almshouse supported by their charity. The old prestige of slaveholding wealth and chivalry is gone for ever. The nation does not intend that its paupers shall govern it just yet, and it will take all needful precautions to hinder this consummation so devoutly wished for by hungry Copperheads—yes, even if one of them be to erect the loyal negroes into citizens, to guard by the ballot what they have won by the bayonet.

And this it is our painful task to assure the Pennsylvania Democrats they will have to submit to. The idea of negro suffrage was as repugnant five years ago to the great mass of the Northern people as it is now to them. But the idea has been thrust into the minds of the most intelligent portion of the people, including all the best part of the old Democratic party, by the action of the rebels and their Northern friends. And the leaven is fast leavening the whole lump. It is a matter of simple self-defence. The white rebels of the South are not to be trusted with power unless the black loyalists keep them in check. The nation is not going to set the rebel beggar on horseback that he may ride to the devil and drag it after him into the pit. He may have indemnity for the past when we have the security for the future which the equal citizenship of the negro will give us. Anything short of this would be nothing less than national suicide; and the nation has not fought for its life so long and so hard to die now by its own silly hand. If the Democrats had but the wisdom that is profitable to direct a party under difficulties to success, they would cease their old habits of servility to the white men of the South, and try to conciliate the black men by showing that they really believe in the democratic principles they profess by helping them to their equal political rights. They may find themselves in power again, some day, by this method, but by no other. But we fear their case is past advice.

COTTON CULTURE.

It is now pretty well ascertained that the large estimates of old cotton on hand at the close of the rebellion were erroneous, and it is not probable that over one and a quarter million bales will come to market in sound condition. There are still some estimates higher than this, but there are many more that are lower. There was probably quite a large planting for this season, possibly for a crop of 700,000 bales; but the sudden collapse of the Confederate authority disorganized the old system of labor just at the most critical season, when continuous labor is needed to prevent the weeds from choking the young cotton plant, whose first growth is very slow, and it is not probable that over one half the crop planted will be made. From the best information now attainable, one and a half million bales of American cotton must supply the world's need from about July 1, 1865, to October 1, 1866, at which date a moderate supply of the crop of 1866 will be coming in. At the first glance it would seem to be a misfortune to the country that the available supply should be so small, but a little reflection will prove that this is the most desirable condition in which we could be placed.

Consumers of cotton cloth will have to pay a little more; but as the average consumption of the country, with the factories all in operation, never exceeded ten pounds of cotton a head per annum, the difference between twenty cents and forty cents per pound is no very severe burthen; and forty cents per pound secures good order and peace in the cotton States, whatever may be the political mismanagement. Disorder cannot exist, and ill-treatment of the colored laborer will be impossible, when it shall appear that his labor will produce from $1,000 to $1,600 in gold value, besides all the food he can require. The total consumption of cotton in 1860 north of the Potomac was about 800,000 bales; south of the Potomac, about 150,000 bales. The present rate of consumption north of the Potomac is about 10,000 bales per week—say 500,000 bales per annum; and the consumption South was much increased during the war by the manufacture of home-spun cloth.

If we take the supply for fifteen months at 1,500,000 bales, this country will require one half, leaving 700,000 to 800,000 bales for export; and whenever it shall be demonstrated that such are the facts, even though this supply should all come in during the six months from September 1, it must be taken at a very high price, and if at twenty pence per pound in Liverpool, the amount placed to the credit of this country in gold value will be $130,000,000 to $140,000,000.

England must take American cotton, even though her supply of short staples be very large. The dread of an immense influx of American cotton held back by the war being removed, her market for cotton goods has re-opened with a fair demand, and her mills are now on two-thirds speed, but such has been the migration or change of employment of Lancashire operatives that labor is now very scarce; and when labor is scarce, the mills operating on American cotton will draw all the hands from the mills working Surats, even at the same rates of pay, because the work is so much easier.

We have said that with forty cents per pound once established as the price of cotton (or even twenty-five cents per pound), good order will be secured and ill treatment of the laborer impossible. Every landholder will endeavor to plant the largest possible crop, and he who ill-treats or underpays his hands must lose them. And here must come the solution of the labor question. It is believed that the Northern planter will succeed, because he will be familiar with the Northern system of piece or job work, while the old planter will fail in the attempt to secure persistent labor on the old task system of slavery, which put every man on a dead level.

The first requisite for the free-labor cotton planter is to recognize two facts:

1st, That the negro is a man.

2d, That there is a great deal of human nature in man.

Now, every one familiar with human nature, as developed in the laborer, knows that work by the job or piece establishes as the standard of accomplishment the amount of work done by the best man, while work by the day or month, or by the task, establishes the standard by the laziest or most incompetent.

The plan of sharing the crop with the laborer, or what is called the contract system, is an unfortunate necessity now, because the planter has not the means of making weekly or monthly payments; but it would be very unreasonable to expect the great mass of negro laborers, just emerging from the barbarism and ignorance of slavery, to work faithfully and persistently for a share of a crop of uncertain value, payable at a distant date by men who have up to this time defrauded them of their natural rights. Verily, if the negro does work well under that system, he will prove not only his equality but his absolute superiority over any other class of laborers in the world.

The plan by which Northern men will succeed (and this is no theoretic plan, but one which has been fully tried upon the Sea Islands, and from which results have been obtained in two years of over two hundred per cent. upon the capital invested, and which has also been tried with success upon the Mississippi River and in Tennessee)—the true plan is, to cultivate cotton by job or piece work, with prompt weekly or monthly payments of moderate amount, not sufficient to induce idleness from excess of wages, with full payment completed when the crop is made and baled; and with this may well be combined a small share in the result. But the essential element is a moderate payment, at short stated periods, based upon the amount of work done. By this the human nature in the negro man will be worked upon, individuality will be developed, the intelligent and industrious will reap his reward—the lazy and thriftless will be discharged.

On a Sea Island plantation the old slave-master's task for ginning Sea Island cotton on a hand-gin was thirty pounds per day, and this was considered hard work; but on the same plantation, the old, superannuated laborer made free, who had been almost cast aside by his owner as past service, found that at two cents per pound he could gin sixty pounds per day. This is absolute fact.

There can be nothing more simple for an intelligent employer than to cultivate cotton by the job or piece. Let him allow each laborer to assume charge of as much cotton land as he will undertake, not exceeding ten acres; hold him responsible for raising or purchasing his own food; furnish him good tools, charging him for breakage or loss; pay him for ploughing and listing by the acre, for hoeing by the acre, and if he hoes it oftener than usual, so much the better; when picking comes on, the hardest work of the season, pay him by the pound, ginning by the pound, and packing or baling by the bale. Pay him promptly, at each date agreed, all that you have agreed, and at the end of the season his bonus or share, and a good crop cannot fail to be made; on good land, not less than a bale to the acre.

The great danger to the negro will be that such will be the competition for his labor as to cause his wages to increase faster than his wants, and thus cause him to become idle. The only possible cure for this is, by education to raise his standard of life; and how rapidly this will be accomplished, has been proved by the demand of the stores established upon the Sea Islands changing from the coarse and simple requirements of a slave population to a demand nearly like that of a New England village.

JUDGE EDMONDS ON "SPIRITUALISM."

It is astonishing to find a man like Judge Edmonds resorting, in defense of what he claims to be supernatural manifestations, to the baldest Paleyan materialism. Yet this is precisely the philosophical blunder into which the learned lawyer is betrayed in his late letter to the Herald on the Colchester trial. In arguing for the truth of spiritual manifestations, Judge Edmonds says:

"But you and others say—and very naturally—first satisfy us that there is such a communication with such an unseen intelligence.

"How can we do that? Some there are who cannot receive the evidence unless it is presented to themselves and through their senses.

"Such was my own condition. I refused to believe, and did not, until all my senses—hearing, seeing, feeling, tasting, and smelling—were appealed to."

We desire to say nothing here of the credibility or incredibility of that which is called "spiritualism." It is of the methods by which Judge Edmonds professes to have attained his present convictions that we wish to speak. He refused to believe until all his senses were appealed to successfully. When these had been fully satisfied, the judge, through the aid of his ears and of his eyes, of his fingers, his palate, and his nose, listened, looked, felt, tasted, and smelled his way from one sphere of the invisible world to another, until the very glories of the seventh heaven burst at once upon his sight and his nostrils! His language admits of this construction only. "Such," he says, "was my own condition. I refused to believe until all my senses were appealed to."

There is, to us, something melancholy in this confession. It is not merely full of psychological confusion, but it displays either a profound ignorance of the methods adopted by sound modern thinkers, or an utter indifference to the loftiest evidences of revelation. If we may say so, Judge Edmonds reasons from the tail to the head—from his conclusions to his premises. He believes upon grounds upon which other men disbelieve; he makes common cause with the grossest materialism, and then insists upon its falsity; he would get bread from stones, and fishes from serpents, and is utterly unable to perceive that from physical phenomena nothing can be logically deduced except physical truth

Judge Edmonds bases his spiritual belief, at least upon the present occasion, upon an assumption of his own perfect acquaintance with every natural law, and does not see that two or three discoveries, no greater, no more unexpected, than many which have occurred within the memory of the living, might explain to the satisfaction and comprehension of the simplest a perfect conformity between the most startling wonders of "the circle" and the laws which regulate the material universe. It is not necessary for the purposes of the argument to assume that all "mediums" are jugglers and cheats. The raps may be honest, the tippings inexplicable for the present, the various parts of the exhibition quite beyond our comprehension; but after all our gaping wonder, after all our tremulous fright, nothing like the doctrine of spiritual manifestations has been proved, or begun to be proved. We are as far as ever from the spheres and the bright intelligences. For the evidence does not, in the nature of the case, apply to that which is to be demonstrated. It is like saying that water runs down hill because two and two make four, or that nature abhors a vacuum because a straight line is the shortest distance from one point to another. This unhappy incongruity of ideas has pervaded half the so called "revelations" which it has been our ill fortune to read. The celestial is but a rigid prolongation of the natural and terrestrial; the "spiritual" only the material in an exaggerated and often nonsensical form. The pretension is lofty, and the performance is mean. It is true that mortal language is incompetent to express the glories of immortality; but the inspired teachers of man through whom God has spoken to his children of the mysteries of the future, have always maintained an elevated dignity of style, and have given us high poetic pictures instead of the tinsel scenery of the theatre. Or to compare one mere mortal with another, what is there in the books of Mr. Andrew Jackson Davis to lead us to believe that he has a clearer vision of heaven than was given to the blind eyes of one > "—— that rode sublime

> Upon the seraph wings of ecstasy,
> The secrets of the abyss to spy?
> He passed the flaming bounds of space and time,
> The living throne, the sapphire blaze,
> Where angels tremble while they gaze;
> He saw, but, blasted with excessive light,
> Closed his eyes in endless night."

We might extend our argument, drawn from the material character of these revelations of modern times, but we have already been led further into these discussions than we originally intended. We have particularly desired to point out that the foundations upon which Judge Edmonds rests his belief are utterly inconsistent with the belief itself. There is a gaping abyss between the intellectual grounds of his faith and its secondary developments, which no logical ingenuity can bridge. It would have been far safer to have argued from his religion to his raps, than from his raps to his religion. His statements are of importance, because he is one of the best educated men of his creed in the country. What he says is authoritative; and we have therefore taken the trouble to point out what appears to us to be a fatal flaw in his logic.

THE PROGRESS OF NATIONAL WEALTH.

The burthen of a nation's debt should be judged, not so much by what it can bear at present as by its probable future of wealth and resources. The world itself is progressive; the world of trade, and commerce, and industrial skill in such states as Great Britain and the United States especially so. What seemed a burden of debt to the former a century ago, too great to be borne, was scarcely equal to two years' British taxation in the present day. The social and material improvement of the empire has been in a compound ratio to the multiplication of debt. The late Lord Macaulay, in one of his powerful papers in the "Edinburgh Review," eloquently illustrated this truth as early as 1830, and in replying to the theory of Mr. Southey of social retrogression, concluded with the pregnant question, "On what principle is it that when we see nothing but improvement behind us, we are to expect nothing but deterioration before us?"

The fears expressed of national bankruptcy by some of the wisest heads of the eighteenth century, are not more striking at this distance of time than their complete dissipation by the steady march of social and material improvement, and the stupendous energy of the English people at the beginning of the present century. Both are happily illustrated by the great reviewer. He relates that after the wars of Marlborough, closing with the Treaty of Utrecht, had left a debt of £50,000,000 sterling, and £6,000,000 a year expenses, Dean Swift declared the country ruined. When the seven years' war had increased the debt to one hundred and forty millions, Junius sarcastically remarked that Lord Chatham had left the Government a legacy of debt for which the country could not be sufficiently grateful, since it could never be repaid. And so the wise heads of all parties after the American war regarded the enlarged debt, in 1783, of £240,000,000, as a burthen almost too great to be successfully grappled by statesmanship. Yet, in less than forty years after the Treaty of Vienna, the grand total had been swelled to £800,000,000 sterling, or four thousand millions of dollars, and the country has advanced and flourished under it for fifty years, to a degree that Lord Macaulay himself could not have dreamed of in 1830. Indeed, half the wonders that he then predicted as likely to occur in material wealth and advancement before the year of grace 1930 (such, for example, as travelling almost exclusively by steam), had actually come to pass before the author of the prediction was laid in his tomb thirty years afterwards.

We do not start out with these examples to prove our national debt a national "blessing," for we hold no such opinion. But it would not be difficult to illustrate in a similar way the groundlessness of the fears entertained at the present time about providing the interest on our large debt, as well as about the ability of the country to pay the principal as it comes to maturity in the next twenty or forty years. We may without outraging probability look for a far greater rate of progress here in all that relates to trade, both foreign and domestic; to manufactures; to gold and silver mining; to the multiplication of private fortunes, the magnitude of incomes, the growth of population, and the distribution of taxes and imposts; and not least in importance, in the proportion of the last to the civil expenses of the Government, including the charge of the public debt.

When the United States, as a constitutional government, was founded in 1789, our population was 3,443,070; our Revolutionary public debt, $75,463,476; the foreign trade of the country, in exports and imports, $43,205,150. On emerging from the second war with Great Britain in 1815-16, our public debt, which had been previously reduced to $45,209,738, had increased to $127,334,934. In fifteen years thereafter the whole of this sum had been paid off, or provided to be paid on the presentation of the United States stock then held in Europe. Our foreign trade in 1830 had reached $143,726,438; population, 12,866,020. Such was our first experience with public debt. The popular ideas of the burthen of debt in 1816 in this country were much the same as Dean Swift's notion of the British debt almost a century before. It was felt to be a large undertaking for a people numbering about 7,500,000. But statesmanship did not hesitate to grapple it. The tariff was revised under the lead of Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay; a national currency was established through the Bank of the United States, internal taxes levied, and a complete American system adopted for paying off the public debt, and economizing the civil expenses of the Government. The main object was accomplished, as we have remarked, in fifteen years. It is a significant fact that John Quincy Adams, one of the purest and ablest Presidents of the Revolutionary stock, was beaten on his second nomination, partly because he spent thirteen millions ($13,062,316) in 1828 to conduct the civil expenses of the Government, and partly for the bare suspicion that he had brought part of this enormous Federal patronage to bear on the freedom of elections!

After the defeat of Mr. Adams, the expenses of the Government were rapidly doubled by his successors, Gen. Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, and quadrupled at a later period by Mr. Pierce and Mr. Buchanan. The last year of Mr. Pierce cost, for the civil administration alone, over sixty millions ($60,924,037), which fact was scarcely noted in the canvass of 1856, so greatly had the popular ideas of economy changed in less than thirty years, when another President of the same politics, Mr. Buchanan, was elected, who in turn spent $60,333,836 in the closing year of his administration without attracting notice on the score of extravagance. The foreign trade of the country had increased from $143,726,428 in 1830 to $762,286,237 in 1860; population from 12,866,020 to 31,620,000.

Another striking illustration of the progression of figures, and the change of popular ideas thereon, is found in the relations of the cotton trade to our foreign commerce. The exports of this staple advanced from $20,157,484 in 1821 to $191,806,555 in 1860. They constituted nearly one half the whole export trade of the year before the rebellion. During the greater part of this forty years' rapid progress in the cotton interest, the popular belief was that the country would be absolutely bankrupted without it; that this immense product of slave-labor could not be dispensed with except at the price of our entire commerce; and that no political concession to the slave oligarchy or cotton-planting interest of the South could be too great to save the Union from disintegration and our material interests from ruin. This error was common at the North. It became an infatuation, as well as fallacy, at the South. It was soon exploded in the loyal States; it proved fatal only to the States in insurrection. In less than two years after the troubles began, the North had learned to do without Southern cotton. In four years it was scarcely missed from our list of exports. In two years, and before the value of our currency had changed, the great North-western and Middle States had trebled their exports of bread and provisions, from $45,271,850 in June 30, 1860, to $119,338,785 in June 30, 1862, and, adapting themselves to the altered state of things, they had diminished the consumption of foreign merchandize to $6 88 per caput from $10 50 per caput North and South before the war.

But this is but a brief episode in the history of the American cotton trade. The experience of the war only proves that our loyal people can do without it; not that its importance to the commerce of the country has been overlooked. It now takes a fresh start in its career of usefulness on the enduring basis of free labor. And the young merchant is now living who will witness a product of ten, if not twelve, millions—a domestic consumption of three or five millions, and an export to foreign states of seven or eight millions.

What is true of the relation of the cotton-planting and cotton-producing wealth of the South to the maintenance of the public credit, is equally true of the products of farm labor in the West, and of the Pacific States in gold and silver mining. Each interest is destined to produce an annual surplus for export, the extent of which will more than authorize the consumption of five or six hundred millions in value of imported goods, provided always our own skilled labor shall not render such a movement uncalled for. The question, so far as excise and impost taxes are concerned, is one of policy rather than ability. The adequate revenue can be had in either way. The charge of interest on the public debt, and the sinking fund for the payment of the principal, are within the easy control of the Government in any event. The time is not far distant when the payment of $150,000,000 annual interest on three thousand millions of debt, and the application of $100,000,000 yearly to the liquidation of the principal, will be deemed not only a practicable but extremely easy achievement. The maximum of the debt has been, or is about to be, reached, as in England soon after the Treaty of Vienna. Our ability to pay the accruing interest, and our means, including the growth of private incomes, to liquidate the principal, are, so to speak, but in their infancy. These means will not be wasted or diverted. Our people will never dream of repudiation, but are not the less restive under public debt. They want to be rid of the burthen rather than keep it stationary, or perpetuate it to succeeding generations. And herein we differ from the English people. They have been raising and paying from £60,000,000 to £70,000,000 sterling, or $300,000,000 or $350,000,000, yearly for the support of the civil expenses of their Government, and the interest charged upon their public debt, for a score of years or more. Their imposts, though reduced since the era of free trade, are still equal to $115,000,000 or $120,000,000 of our money. These about support the interest on the funded debt. They raise little or nothing in liquidation of the principal. Their Chancellors of Exchequer study to adjust both customs and excise to the exact wants of the civil service and the interest on the public debt. The sinking fund, projected by the younger Pitt, has been lost sight of. Their statesmen of the present day, to all appearances, really accept the public debt as a national blessing, and whenever the Chancellor's budget happens to produce a few millions in excess, his next step is to take something off the tax upon tea or abate something on the income tax or sugar duties. He has no thought of the principal of the great debt of the nation. The example, we venture to predict, will not be copied by our own statesmen or tolerated by our people. It is not desirable that it should be.

THE INCOME TAX.—A CONTRAST.

No fact speaks so well for the loyalty of the American people, and in support of their determination to pay their debts, as the readiness with which they submit to the payment of war taxes in time of peace. It is true that there has been no opportunity to make an effort to obtain a repeal of taxes since the war was closed. Congress adjourned almost seven weeks before General Lee threw down his sword and gave up his army and his cause; and Congress alone has the power to change the laws regulating taxation. But if any feeling hostile to taxation existed it would find present expression with a view to a change. The income tax, which is, and from its nature must ever be, a peculiarly unpleasing imposition, would have been assailed with vigor from the day that peace was assured, were the people in a state of discontent. Yet nothing is said against it, though for weeks past men have been paying millions upon millions derived from it.

In this respect the conduct of the American democracy forms a striking contrast to that of the English aristocracy half a century since. When the income tax was first proposed in Great Britain by Mr. Pitt, the war with revolutionary France being then at its height, he solemnly declared "that it should be a war tax only, and should positively cease on the restoration of peace." Mr. Pitt had been almost ten years in his grave before that war was brought to a final close, the truce of Amiens not counting for anything; but the Liverpool Ministry, when Parliament met at the beginning of 1816, were by no means disposed to redeem Mr. Pitt's pledge, though the act enforcing the tax declared it to be "for and during the continuance of the war, and no longer." They knew that the country needed money, and that they could not safely give up the tax, no matter how strong the pledge to give it up had been made. They resolved upon a compromise. They would not repeal the tax, but they would reduce it from ten per cent. to five per cent. They had every reason to suppose that their plan would be carried easily through the House of Commons, in which body they were so strong that they had had a majority of one hundred and sixty-three on the address in response to the royal speech, after a debate that lasted through two nights. They counted on a majority of forty for their measure, and the opposition allowed them twenty. The question came to a decision on the 18th of March, 1816, "after a debate," says Lord Brougham, "that did not last half an hour; no one would, indeed, be heard in an assembly so impatient for the decision; and by a majority of thirty-seven voices the tax was defeated for ever, and the wholesome principle, as Mr. Wilberforce well observed, was laid down that war and income tax are wedded together." None but ministers were astonished at the result, for the demand for repeal was all but unanimous outside of Parliament, and had that body really represented popular feeling, there would not have been forty votes for the tax in the Commons. Patricians and paupers were of one mind on the subject. Lord Brougham was wrong when he said that the tax was defeated for ever, as Sir Robert Peel caused it to be imposed upon Great Britain again in little more than a quarter of a century, but it may be said that Sir Robert was justified in regarding his action in the light of a war measure, as the hostilities carried on by England in China and Afghanistan, and a little later in the Punjaub, made an income tax really necessary. The Syrian war, too, had its part in adding to the embarrassment of British finances. The Russian war made the continuance of the tax necessary; and the sort of war-in-peace life that England has been living for almost fifteen years with France, and the Sepoy war, have done much to render the income tax permanent. But the fact that in 1816 the English nation all but unanimously demanded the repeal of the income tax, though their Government was embarrassed, and their debt exceeded £800,000,000, is on record; and the unanimity of that demand contrasts strongly with the silence of the American people on their income tax. It is true that no promise was made, in our case, that the tax should cease with the war; but probably it was taken for granted that it would be repealed as soon as hostilities should be over, as to impose it was an extreme measure, and to be justified only by the existence of war. It is a tax that can be defended only by the necessity of the case, seeing that it bears hard upon men of moderate means, and that it is by its nature essentially inquisitorial, and places every one's business and modes of life at the mercy of tax-gatherers, who in all ages have been regarded as the most odious of mankind. That so little complaint should have been made of it, and that its early removal is not urged, are facts that deserve honorable mention as much as anything that is connected with the history of the late struggle. They show that an earnest determination exists on the part of the people to bear the burdens of war in time of peace, rather than allow any doubt to exist as to their intention honorably to discharge all their obligations. When the English sought immediate relief from their burdens, and could not be made to understand that peace should for some time be as costly as war, they were charged with being under the dominion of "an ignorant impatience of taxation." No such charge can be brought against Americans, and thus far the democratical form of government has been better sustained by the people than was the aristocratical form. What may happen in the future, the future will decide; but for four years this country, so often accused of meanness in all that relates to money matters, has exhibited the by no means common spectacle of a people more ready to be taxed than Government was to tax them; and all that is really bad in our financial condition is owing to Government's not being early ready to impose burdens while the people early were ready to bear.

Correspondence.

THE GRATE EASTURN."

New York
August 25

To the Editur of The Nation: 1865

Sur,

i ave bin told that you ave put me in your paper i am a decent man and i dont mean to stand it ef i chose to keep my ouse dirty its none of your biznes i wil see Mr Howe about it but i wil settel it without trubble for 5 hundred dollars

Yours &c

James Mulligan
No. 137 E 37 St
Grate Easturn

Pleas Ansur Soon

[The "Grate Easturn" is a huge tenement house in Thirty-seventh Street, in this city, containing, we are afraid to say how many families, crowded in the most shocking manner. We alluded in No. 8 to the probability that, when the cholera comes, it and others like it will breed and spread the pestilence in its worst form.—Ed. Nation.]

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

VIII.

Lynchburg, Va., Aug. 24, 1865.

In compliance with an invitation given me yesterday, I paid a visit to a large farm, situated within twenty miles of this city, and, so far as I could, examined the working of the new system of labor, as it exists under an employer utterly opposed to it, who denies its justice and expediency, disbelieves in its long continuance, and accepts it only on compulsion, and only so much of it as he is forced to accept. On his plantation it is a failure, he says, and he thinks it destined to fail everywhere.

The farm contains nearly twelve hundred acres, of which the greater part is covered with timber, and but four hundred and fifty acres are of arable land. Formerly, a good deal of tobacco was got from it, but during and since the war it has been used for the production of Indian corn and wheat. "I did not consider it patriotic to raise anything else," said the owner; "I could not plant tobacco while the country was starving for food. This year I have a few hills—an acre and a half—just to give the people what they want for chewing and smoking."

There are now on the place about sixty negroes, of whom twenty-one are able-bodied men and women, who have been employed upon the crops of this year; the rest are reported as being infirm people and children. I learned, however, that the care of infants, the cooking of the laborers' meals, and all house service at the owner's residence, is done by persons classed among the children and infirm. This latter class, I was told, is exceptionably large on this plantation, because the old gentleman who owns it, and whose long life has been mainly passed in the practice of his profession and in congressional service, has never carried on farming with a view to making it profitable, and has always been an indulgent master. He claims this character for himself. "I never bought a nigger in all my life, sir; and I never sold or whipped but one. Have I ever ordered you to punish any one of them, Mr. W——?" said he to his overseer. "I believe you never did, colonel." "That single one was a thief in grain, sir. As good a laborer as we had, but he would steal a sheep every week of his life. He baffled us repeatedly, but, finally, sir, we caught the rascal; took him red-handed—the mutton in his cabin and the skin in his yard. I ordered him a sound whipping, which he richly deserved, though I knew he was entirely incorrigible. Then I told my overseer to take him down, tie the skin on his back, with the ram's horns over his head, lead him into the city with a rope around his neck, and sell him for whatever he'd bring. The overseer begged to be excused from cutting such a figure in the streets, so I sold him in his own skin only, and satisfied my conscience by a verbal announcement that he was the most accomplished sheep-stealer in the Old Dominion. I have owned slaves now for five-and-forty years, and he is the only one ever whipped by my order; so you can judge if I am a hard master.

"I wish still," he continued, "to treat my people in the same way, but they are fast making it impossible for me to do so. There are always some bad men in every hundred, and now the bad niggers spoil the rest. Since mine were freed, they have become lazy, stubborn, and impudent. They know that they have escaped from all government; that we cannot chastise them. And they are not like white people. I begin to believe that they are without gratitude. Mine appear to have forgotten all the kindness and lenity with which they have been treated by me and my family."

"You 've had considerable trouble, colonel, I understand," said my companion, who was armed with authority to investigate and settle disturbances and disputes on the plantations.

"Yes, sir. I am sorry to put you gentlemen in Lynchburg to so much inconvenience, but what can we do? The Government has taken away all coercive power from us; a negro does what he likes, and I cannot inflict adequate punishment, nor have him punished without riding up to the city. The troubles we have all grow out of the complete anarchy in which our negro population now is. It was only day before yesterday that my daughter-in-law told one of the servants to do some simple thing—hang out clothes, I believe. Three times she told her without being able to secure her obedience, and I had to be called in. Really, gentlemen, I did not know how to proceed. I decided to banish her. We have on the place a house that stands alone at some distance from any other, occupied by an old blind man, Uncle Tom by name. 'Go, Elsie,' said I, 'go down to Uncle Tom's cabin; I banish you the house till you can behave yourself. Take your rations along, and stay till we send for you to come back. You shall live in exile, with nothing to do but to eat and sleep.' I could think of nothing else to do with her. We have no means of making them obey, unless they choose to do it of their own free will."

"What 's to-day's case, colonel?"

"Another one of the house girls, on the day after this occurred, was rebuked by my son for negligence, and made a very improper reply. My son boxed her ears—gave her two slaps on the side of the face with his hand, that was the whole of it. She immediately left her work, all unfinished, and betook herself to her father's house. My son sent for her, but she did not return, and we have seen nothing of her since."

"Is she at home now?"

"In the woods, I reckon," said the overseer; "she a'n't on the place. It 's her father's fault. I told him, 'London, take the gal and give her a whalin' for her impudence, and make her beg Mr. John's pardon.' He would n't though. He 's the one 's in fault, he 's so grouty."

"I went to him, myself," said the colonel, "and told him he must chastise the girl, and that she must express contrition for the offence. What answer do you think he made, gentlemen? 'That up at Lynchburg they knew the law better than he did, and I 'd better go there if I had a complaint against Rose: that Rose said she had n't done anything.'

"Now, sir, I want that man removed from my plantation. Nothing would induce me to let him stay here, and he shall not, unless the authorities in Lynchburg compel me to permit him. Such insubordination I cannot tolerate."

"Where is the man?" said my companion; "I 'd like to see him if he can be found."

"He a' n't in the field," the overseer answered. "I 'm just in from thar, and he a' n't out to-day. He 's at his house, I believe."

"Well, sir, the overseer will take you down to the quarters. I will not go. I do not wish my presence to be a restraint upon their answers."

We went to the negro cabins, the overseer, as we walked along, talking about the condition of the plantation.

"I swar, I thought we 'd go through without any more durn trouble; did n't think you 'd have to come up again. I 've been gettin' on right well with 'em, myself: ha' n't had to strike a lick. We had a considerable muss about two month ago, but the man quieted down again, and now I would n't ask no better hand than he is. His brother had been havin' some hard talk with the colonel one day, and, as I come on up from the tobacco lot, I seen 'em all round the corn-house, and I went along toward 'em. On the way, this boy met me, and he opened on me right away. 'It 's you,' he says, 'made this muss 'twixt the master and Jim: it 's all through what you told on him.' I was perfectly clar, you see; did n't know what the to-do was, anyhow, and it made me mad to hear him. Oh, he spoke almighty careless, I kin tell you, gentlemen,—sassy. Says I, 'You shet up, quick.' I had my pistol with me, and I drawed it. 'Say another word,' says I, 'and durn me but I 'll blow your brains out. I 'll put a hole through you whar you stand.' He shet right up. If he had n't I 'd ha' killed him, sure, I would. He was dreadful nigh it for a minute. Since then, everything 's gone on quiet and peaceable; but the colonel 's pretty mad, now: it 's the old man he 's mad with. Well, it 's his fault. I told one o' these gals, the other day, to go get the cows out o' the corn. They 'd broke in. She started, after two or three biddins, and she went so deliberate it fretted me so that I went after her. 'I told you to jump,' says I, and I give her a whalin'. Her father he thought that war n't right. 'You make her step, then, old man,' says I; 'she 's got to move when I talk; but if you 'll take the whalin' part on yourself, I'll give it up.' Well, now, when I find fault he does whale her. That 's what London ought to do."

While this discourse was going on we reached the negro cabins. Two or three women were there, and some nursing children. As we approached they eyed us with no very pleasant expression of countenance. The overseer enquired whether London was at home. The woman who answered was his sister-in-law, and the cause of her sulky manner appeared in her reply:

"How! Bro' Lunnon no gone since mornin'? Bro' Lunnon hear say master gone to Lynchburg yesterday, come back, say Lunnon, for leave dis place to-day. I dunno whar Bro' Lunnon now."

The wife, however, was at home, and was requested to give her version of the trouble between her employer and Rose. "Her daughter had been sick," she said, "and went late to her work on the morning in question. When asked why she had not come earlier, she answered that she came as soon as she could—that she was sick. Rose was not very late."

"'T was an hour by sun when I see her," said the overseer, "and I heerd she said she could n't come, she was a-makin' her bed."

"Well, Juliana, did her master strike her?"

"Not master," the woman said, "mass' John he hit her over the head; 'cordin' to what Rose say."

"Did he hit her hard?"

"No more 'n her nose was bleedin' when she came back."

"Well now, aunty, she 's a little girl; you box her ears when she offends you; why did n't London promise the colonel to make her behave herself?"

The woman knew nothing about what talk the colonel had with London, she said; the servants at the house would get along well enough, except that one of the ladies was too hard to please. Rose had done nothing. Yes, she knew she was bound to work, and keep a good character; so she did.

After the women had received some exhortations to industry and respectful deportment, we went up to the overseer's house, a mud-plastered cabin with two rooms, where the colonel was awaiting our return. He persisted in his request that the man London, and his family, should be at once sent away from the place.

"Why, gentlemen, such insubordination sets an awful example. We have no armed patrols here, no police, no discipline on the plantations, and there are five hundred negroes around me, and not thirty white men. We live in an isolated place, and my house contains three or four women; and it is essential that they be protected. My corn-house was broken into not long ago, and, I think, my wheat is going out of the barn. Something must be done. It is a very cumbrous mode of enforcing good order to summon you from the city to come down here and discharge my laborers, but it is the only method you have left me. And now I want an example made; I shall not feel safe unless you do what I ask, and, if it cannot be done, I would like to send them all off the plantation. I should feel better to work my garden with my own hands than to endure such insolence."

The colonel was asked if he paid his people anything for their services. "No sir," he answered, "no money wages. If you give money to a nigger he goes and spends it for whiskey, and I have no intention of making the country any more unsafe to live in than it is at present. Besides, sir, and Mr. W. will tell you the same, they are not worth it; a white man will do the work of three niggers, and one slave did more than three of these freedmen."

"So, sure," said the overseer, "anyhow they ha' n't done a third part what they might this year."

"I called my people together when your army first came here, after General Lee's defeat, and told them I should not pay wages. 'You are free,' I said, 'to go where you please, but if you choose to stay here you may; you shall work for me as you have heretofore, and I will give you the same treatment you have always had, the same quantity and quality of food, and the same amount of clothing.' Most of them have staid, and I have no specific complaints to make against any family but London's, though all, as I have said, are unprofitable servants. Two men chose to go away."

Of these two who refused the colonel's terms, one, it was incidentally told in the course of the conversation, now acts as cook on a canal packet-boat, and earns fifteen dollars per month besides his board. He visits the plantation once in a while to see his former fellow-servants, and is well contented with his new condition. The colonel would not be harassed and overworked again, he said himself, by an attempt at farming under the free labor system. He had leased the place to his overseer, and washed his hands of the whole business.

Mr. W., the lessee, expected success. He showed me the rough draft of a written contract which the negroes have signified their willingness to sign, and under which he and they are to work together during the coming year. While my friend conversed with the colonel and brought the affair of London to a conclusion, I studied the agreement. It reads nearly as follows:

"The undersigned bind themselves to stay on the —— —— plantation from Nov. 15th, year of 1865, to Nov. 15th, year of 1866. We agree to work on said plantation for Mr. W. He is to pay the rent of the plantation, and he is to pay all the expense of the crops. Mr. W. agrees to give us payment for labor by sharing equally with the negroes—one half the crop to be his, one half to be ours, one half the wheat, one half the oats, one half the corn, one half of every crop on the place, excepting that all the fodder and straw is to belong to Mr. W. Mr. W. is to give us rations and clothing, and the expense is to be paid back out of our half of the crop. We are to act polite to him, and to be obedient and industrious, and make no disturbance in the place."

The crops this year have been small. Next year the new employer intends they shall be very much larger, and I venture to predict that his hopes will be fulfilled. For the causes of the trouble on this plantation are sufficiently obvious, and they may all be removed. The owner of it is, I should say, a humane man, and I could readily believe that he himself, whatever his overseers may be able to boast, had ordered but one of his negroes to be whipped. His people probably found him kind and indulgent in all his intercourse with them, and he is now conscious of none but the friendliest and best intentions towards them. But as a wealthy slaveholder and a veritable descendant of Pocahontas, he is proud, and will have nothing less than complete deference; he believes that the blacks were born for slavery, and is intolerant of anything resembling independence and self-reliance in them; moreover, he is an original secessionist, and thinks emancipation unjust. In short, he wishes still to be master, is willing to be a kind master, but will not be a just employer. Perhaps he is now too old to learn; but they, on the other hand, are not, and his endeavor to keep them tractable slaves has had no better success than to make them unpaid and discontented freedmen. Having tried the new labor system, with the essential feature of it left out, he, of course, finds it a failure.

As we talked, he seemed to please himself by painting a gloomy picture of Southern society as it is to be when the military occupation ends—smoke-houses broken open by the laborers, and bacon stolen; corn-houses robbed, and the corn sold for whiskey; then the worst of crimes committed by drunken niggers, murders like that on the canal-boat the other night, houses pillaged and burnt because their owners would not yield to every demand that ignorance and insolence could make; the woods full of outlaws; idleness followed by want, and the country impoverished for lack of laborers—all because fanatics were determined, by main force, to lift up the nigger to a level which of himself he could never attain, and which, if let alone, he never would have sought. Negro suffrage, if it became a fact, would strip the white man—it would in his county, where niggers were in a majority—of all his property; perhaps reduce him to servitude. Why not? "You in Massachusetts, sir," he said, "are all abolitionists, and think a nigger is the equal of the white man, and, of course, you have a right to hold that opinion there. We, in Virginia, know that he is not; that God made him our inferior. Perhaps we know nothing about it. You may know best. The fortune of war has enabled you to try and prove your theory correct; but I feel so well assured of the result, that I wish from the bottom of my heart you had chosen some other place for your experiment. I wish you had confined it to Massachusetts."

I said but little in answer: that so far as Massachusetts was concerned, the matter was now out of the region of experiment; free negroes in that State were an estimable class of citizens, whose condition vindicated the good policy of paying wages for labor; that I supposed most men to be industrious, as most religious men are religious—either from hope of reward or fear of punishment; and that, as negroes in Virginia could not now be whipped, the payment of wages was the only course left open; that it was important, if negroes were to constitute so dangerous an element in Southern society, to use all fair means to keep them contented.

The experience gained in this first year of freedom has, I think, taught most farmers who intend to live on their land the necessity, for the sake of their own comfort and profit, of paying something like fair wages. The existence of the Freedmen's Bureau probably does not diminish the pressure of this necessity. Applications for a supply of laborers frequently come into the superintendents, and the wages offered are considerably higher than those now paid; one man offers one hundred dollars a year, board, clothing, and a week's holidays at Christmas; others offer one-fourth, or one-half, the crop. As a rule, the farmers say very little about colonization.

I see that one of the Lynchburg newspapers urges all persons needing the services of mechanics to hire white men in preference to black. Their labor, the paper says, though more costly than that of negroes, is better, and, moreover, to give them employment is a charitable work, for many of them are needy. An acquaintance of mine in the city, having some rough work to be done not long since, offered it to a white man, who was willing to undertake it, but would not do it for less than sixty-five dollars in specie, and was much displeased when the gentleman gave it into the hands of a negro. There were twenty days' work, and it was done for fifteen dollars. "I 'm told," said the aggrieved mechanic, "that a man's house won't be very safe if he puts niggers to work on it and shuts out white men."

While there undoubtedly is a good deal of this feeling in some portions of the community, I do not perceive that its existence prevents employers from hiring whom they please, whether he is black or white, their choice being governed not so much by considerations of color as of cost.

ENGLAND.—THE FIVE-FOLD MURDER.

LONDON, August 15.

WE must all have heard the story of the shipwrecked mariner who got thrown upon an unknown coast, and who, when he caught sight of a gibbet standing on the beach, exclaimed, "Thank God, I am in a civilized country after all!" As a sort of corollary to this story, I should note the fact that the more civilized a nation becomes, the more keen its interest becomes in the reports of murders. It certainly is the case with ourselves, that as violent crime has become less common, the fascination exercised by its narration over the popular mind has grown wonderfully intense. Nothing sells a newspaper like the account of a murder. I never can recollect any public event which created so deep an instantaneous impression in England as the news of President Lincoln's assassination; yet I believe it is a fact that the extra sale of the dailies in consequence was not so large as that occasioned by the narrative of Constance Kent's confession of the Road murder, which appeared on the morning preceding the arrival of the mail which brought us the news of Wilkes Booth's crime. I should fancy, from what I recollect of your papers at the time of the Webster and the Sickles trials, that in this respect your public is not unlike our own. At any rate, no correspondent could pretend to give a faithful chronicle of English news who omitted mention of the startling crimes which from time to time almost monopolize public interest in this country. Such a crime is that with whose details our papers are now full. And besides its intrinsic interest, it possesses an incidental importance as a strange illustration of a phase of society peculiar to England—that of the low sporting world. Let me, then, tell you the story of the Holborn and Ramsgate murders as briefly as I can.

I don't know whether the somewhat peculiar repute of the Earl of Dudley, better known as Lord Ward, has ever reached across the Atlantic. In every continental country, wherever there are opera managers and picture dealers, he is probably better known than any living Englishman. He is about the last representative of the typical "milord" we read about in French novels, and not many years ago you used to hear in every European capital strange anecdotes of the extravagance and eccentricities of the great "Milord Varde." His fortune, however, as proprietor of a great part of the Staffordshire "black country," is so enormous that even operatic speculations have been unable to impair it. Oddly enough, the murderer with whose name the country is ringing first came before the public notice in connection with the Earl of Dudley. The present earl has a brother, the Honorable Dudley Ward, who, by one of those family arrangements which seem so natural in England, and so unnatural out of it, was about as poor as his elder brother was wealthy. This younger brother of a peer and a millionaire seems a year or two ago to have been hanging about Brighton. There he played billiards with a chance professional player, who went by the name of Southey, and lost to him some twelve hundred pounds sterling. Whether he considered the money had not been won by fair play—an opinion which, possibly, was correct—or whether it was not convenient for him to pay the amount, it is certain that Southey could not get his money from Mr. Dudley Ward. Failing in this, he made various attempts to induce Earl Dudley to pay his brother's gambling debts, but without any success. At last he sent a Mrs. White, a woman with whom he cohabited, to get an interview with the earl on false pretences, and on his emissary being turned out of the house on disclosing her errand, he tried to obtain a summons against the earl for having committed an assault. There was no evidence to support the charge, which had obviously been brought with the sole view of extorting money under threat of an inevitable exposure of an awkward family scandal, and the charge was dismissed at once. Under pretence, however, of establishing his case, the fellow Southey found opportunity to make public a long document, revealing the supposed turpitude of the Dudley family, and the injustice with which the world had treated him. The document attracted some interest, chiefly from the high names introduced into it, but partly from a sort of flashy eloquence of its own. According to his own statement, Southey was a sort of "blighted being," a creature of noble instincts, who had fallen through some romantic fault, and whose efforts to redeem his past had been baffled by his own chivalrous attachment to one as unfortunate as himself, and by the heartless injustice of our social system. Leading articles were written about the subject, and then it was dropped; and the newspaper-reading public had forgotten the existence of Southey till within the last few days, when we heard one day that three children had been found poisoned in a public house in Holborn; then that a woman and child had been shot dead at Ramsgate; and the next day that the author of both these monstrous and bloodthirsty crimes was the man Southey.

His story, as it has been elicited by the coroner's inquests, is a strange one enough. Ten years ago the man, whose real name was Stephen Forward, was a baker in a small way at Ramsgate, much, as far as can be learnt, like other petty tradesmen of that seaside suburb of Cockagne. He was not prosperous in business, and one fine morning he left the place in debt, leaving a wife and child behind him utterly unprovided for. He had picked up more education than is common with his class in England, and seems to have had a strong ambition to become what he thought a gentleman. He changed his name to Ernest Southey, and took to the only pursuit in which a man of his class with us can live by his wits, and yet not come within the clutches of the law. He became a betting man, a frequenter of races, a layer of odds; a minnow in the turbid waters in which Jackson and Steele and Davis are leviathans. It is not hard to understand the evil fascination which the turf exercises over men like him. There are scores of speculators in the betting ring who back horses for tens of thousands, and pay when they lose, who started with as little capital as Southey, and who are men of far less education than this bankrupt baker. And then not only is money made without labor on the turf, but it is made very pleasantly. The race-course is perhaps the only place in England where there is perfect social equality. Tom Sayers is as good a man there as the Marquis of Hastings, or better too, for that matter; and the mere pleasure of booking a bet to a gentleman, or being nodded to by a lord, has an attraction for lower middle-class Englishmen which you must be a native of this country to appreciate. Moreover—this at least is my own surmise—to a poor profligate scapegrace there must be considerable satisfaction in observing how every species of rascality is tolerated, if not countenanced, by men of high social standing and public character. Had Southey been lucky he might have had a speaking acquaintance with half the peerage and the House of Commons, though, to do the aristocracy justice, beyond this degree of intimacy he would have had no more chance of getting than I have of being asked to-morrow to dine with the Queen of England. Southey, however, was not only a blackleg, but an unsuccessful blackleg. He never rose above the lowest ranks of the betting fraternity—a fraternity which, I can conscientiously say from some experience of many countries, comprises more unmitigated scoundrels that can be found in the same number of individuals in any civilized country. Whether he was too stupid, or not quite unscrupulous enough, or simply unlucky, it is certain he never got an innings. The only slice of luck which ever seems to have come to him was when he met a pigeon he could pluck at billiards in the person of the Honorable Dudley Ward, and even then the fish broke from the hook just when the angler thought he was going to land it. In the course of his low life of chequered vice, he formed a connection with the wife of a needy schoolmaster, who at last left her husband to live with Southey as his mistress. After the failure of the attempt to obtain payment of his brother's debt from the Earl of Dudley, the Southey fortunes sunk yet lower in the world. He became a professional begging-letter writer, and used to carry on correspondence with public men, appealing to their compassion, and declaring that if a remittance was not forwarded by return his death would lie at their doors, as nothing would remain for him but suicide. At last even this precarious source of income failed. The wretched fellow sank lower and lower; and the woman who had shared his fortunes so long grew weary of his ill treatment and the misery of their existence, and ran away from him with the view of going to Australia—an intention which she is believed to have carried out. After her flight Southey grew desperate, and maddened partly by want, still more by the sense of failure, he resolved, as far as one can guess about his motives, to make the world talk of him at last. With this end he went to the husband of his fugitive mistress, and persuaded him to give up three children—who bore the name of White, but who were believed by both men to have a better claim to that of Southey—under the pretence that he was going to take them to join their mother in Australia. Having got them into his possession, he took the poor little lads, the eldest of whom was a child of ten, to a low public house near Holborn, secured bedrooms for them, and poisoned them in their beds with prussic acid. Death was instantaneous, and the murderer made good his escape without exciting any suspicion. From London he went down to Ramsgate, presented himself to the wife whom he had deserted, and made a great profession of repentance for the cruelty with which he had treated her. At his request, the poor woman, who had earned a livelihood in his absence as a dressmaker, brought their child, a little girl of twelve, to see her father. As soon as the scoundrel had got his victims together, he drew out a pistol, and shot them each through the head, killing them on the spot. He was arrested at once, and as soon as he was taken into custody he boasted that he was also the murderer of the three children in Holborn, for whose detection a large reward had been offered by the Government. There is also reason to believe that he intended to murder the child who had been born to him by Mrs. White after she had left her husband's home, if he had not been accidentally hindered. He was committed for trial at once and will in all human probability be convicted at the next assizes, sentenced to death, and hung.

Now perhaps your impression on reading this sketch of a long story will be that the man must be insane. I doubt the impression being correct; in a certain sense, every man under the influence of unbridled passion is mad; but in no other sense can I see that this butcher of women and children can plead insanity. The peculiar feature in the case, from a psychological point of view, is the individual vanity of the criminal. Throughout his examination before the magistrates, he insisted on virtually defending himself, not apparently with any idea of escaping his doom, but simply with the desire of figuring in public. In a long string of wild and rambling rhodomontade, he urged the plea that he was only the guiltless agent of destiny, and that the real authors of his five-fold murder were the Dudley family, which had declined to pay his winnings at billiards; the noblemen and gentlemen who had not responded to his begging letters; and the society which had not supported him in such a manner as to enable him to lead the higher life to which his nature urged him. He expressed extreme indignation at being photographed while he was innocent in the eye of the law; at not being allowed to read the comments on his case published in the newspapers; and, above all, at being sentenced to be tried at a county court instead of before a metropolitan audience. Some of you may remember in Thackeray's prize novels the confession of "George de Barnwell," which was written as a parody of Bulwer's "Eugene Aram." Well, what Thackeray wrote as a grotesque exaggeration Southey uttered seriously, or, at least, in such earnest as a man of his shallow self-conceit can be capable of.

This tragic story has been—I need hardly tell you—the sensation of the week. Indeed, our topics of late have all been of bloodshed or crime, in one form or other. At the late election in Cheltenham—the Saratoga of England—a Tory voter drew a pistol in the open streets in broad daylight and shot a passer-by wearing the Liberal colors dead upon the spot. For this act he was tried for his life; but the jury having a general, perhaps not an unreasonable, impression that in a contested election men's blood will be up, refused to convict, and insisted, in spite of the judge's directions in bringing the man in guilty of manslaughter only. Then, too, we have had, what is very rare now, a published challenge. Some months ago there was a wearisome military scandal at the Horse Guards, relating to the quarrels of a certain Lieutenant-Colonel Dawkins and his brother officers, which ended on his compulsory retirement on half-pay, under protest. At the general election he contested the borough of Totness, in the Tory interest, but without success. During the hustings speeches, his opponent, Mr. Alfred Seymour, alluded to him as no longer a "fighting gentleman." This insinuation was considered by the Tory candidate to be an insinuation that his retirement from the service was due to some lack of courage; and thereupon he wrote to Mr. Seymour, stating his readiness to show at Wormwood Scrubs—the favorite resort of duellists in byegone times—whether he was a fighting man or not. Mr. Seymour politely declined the invitation on the ground that if Colonel Dawkins liked to make an ass of himself by fighting a duel, he did not; and the verdict of society is that Mr. Seymour was right. Public feeling has gone so strong of late years against duelling in England that men must be very desperate of consequences who resort to it. If Colonel Dawkins and Mr. Seymour had met, and one of them had shot the other, it would have gone hard with the survivor in a court of law. Cases, of course, may be conceived where the provocation given was so gross that the law would look leniently on a man who avenged a domestic outrage by the duello; but even in such a case, the seconds must make up their minds to a long exile or to penal servitude, in the event of the duel terminating fatally. This being the case, duelling has long ceased to be a recognized contingency in English social life; and the formal publication of a challenge strikes men of my generation like the reappearance of a pigtail or a sedan-chair in the streets of London.

I have just been furnished a copy of a pamphlet called "The Times on the American War: a Historical Study." The writer, is, I believe, Mr. Leslie Stephen, who travelled through the States at the time of the war, a couple of years ago. The object of the pamphlet is to show the extraordinary inconsistency and ignorance manifested by the "leading journal" in its disquisitions on the American contest. It is written with great vigor and good temper; and I would candidly recommend it to any of your readers who may chance to take an interest in understanding how public feeling in England was acted on by the Times, and re-acted on it in turn. The writer's theory is that the "root of all the errors of the Times may be found in its views about slavery." Having once made up its mind that slavery could have, and should have, nothing to do with the civil war, the whole story was, in its own words, "a mystery and a marvel." "A foreigner"—so the critic aptly remarks—"looking on at a cricket match is apt to think the evolutions of the players mysterious, and they will be enveloped in sevenfold mystery if he has a firmly preconceived prejudice that the ball has nothing whatever to do with the game." Quoting chapter and verse, he shows with an almost cruel pertinacity that on every point connected with the American war, the Times repeatedly contradicted itself. To quote one paragraph only: "It had thus," he says, "asserted within a year that slavery was the cause of the war; that slavery was one cause and protection another; that slavery was the cause and protection the pretext; that slavery had little to do with the war and protection much; that it could be all but demonstrated that slavery had nothing to do with it at first, and quite demonstrated that slavery had since passed out of sight; that 'some people thought' abolition was at the bottom of the whole business, and that it would probably be the result; and that slavery was the 'reel on which the coil was wound,' though 'not the material of which the coil was made.' In other words, the Times knew nothing about it."

Now, if the Times was to be judged as an historical authority, nothing could be more damaging to it than this exposure of its errrors and blunders. Whether it will injure the paper's popularity is a point about which I am not equally confident. People buy the Times much as I believe Americans buy the New York Herald, not because they agree with its views or believe implicitly in its authority, but because they get, quoad newspaper, a better article for their money than they would get elsewhere. No amount of literary criticism will ever destroy the Times. Its power can be supplanted only by the rise of other papers as prosperous as itself. Till quite recently, the Times could afford to pay ten pounds where any other English newspaper paid one, and therefore it virtually possessed a monopoly of the news market. With the introduction, however, of the penny press, the Times has, for the first time, met with a formidable rival in the person of the Daily Telegraph. The enormous sale of this paper is the first danger which has ever really threatened the monopoly of the Times within my recollection. For my part, I look on this fact as a very hopeful sign. No paper, I think, can ever again obtain the monopoly which a variety of accidental circumstances conferred upon the Times; and as far as newspapers are concerned, I am sure that in the multitude of counsellors there is safety. Nothing is worse for the country than an irresponsible autocrat, whether in a palace or in an editor's chamber.

FRANCE AND THE UNITED STATES.

AUGUST 19, 1865.

It would be vain for me to conceal from you that great anxiety is felt in Paris on account of a possible war between France and the United States. The presence of a large Federal army on the banks of the Rio Grande, the letter written by the popular leader of that army, Sheridan, the speeches of Mr. Blair, of Winter Davis, and a few others, may be said to justify partly these apprehensions. We know, however, that the Executive in America is singularly free in its action, and that while allowing its subordinates the fullest, if not always the wisest, expression of their individual opinion, it keeps its own counsels, consults the highest interests of the nation, and turns a deaf ear to most advisers. Nothing has more astonished the European mind during the four years of the rebellion than the extraordinary independence manifested by the acts of the Executive power. The Buchanans, the Pierces, had voluntarily abdicated this great power and made themselves the tools of the Southern oligarchy; no great show of authority was necessary in those times when no apparent danger threatened the republic, and when the engine of state was moving by its acquired velocity, without meeting with any friction or resistance. The great and unexpected trials to which the Government has since been subjected, have made manifest the great power which the framers of the Constitution had placed in the hands of the Executive. With regard to foreign politics, this power places the American Executive in a peculiar, and I should almost say an unparalleled, position. The whole weight of the responsibility being momentarily thrown on the President, he is at liberty to declare himself irresponsible as regards the doctrines and the professed ideas of the most important public men of his own administration. Placed on the highest situation of the political stage, he reminds me of those kings and emperors whom Corneille likes to represent in his tragedies, listening to their advisers, and presiding over political tournaments. Cassius, sword in hand, speaks of war; Flavius represents in pompous language the advantages of peace; Valerius is for temporizing. The king listens to them all, often maliciously throws a dubious word in the conversation, and seems to enjoy the mêlée of the conflicting passions. But after the torrent of Cassius, Flavius, and Valerius' eloquence has freely flown, the spectator is still ignorant of what the king will do, and the knot of the drama seems only tighter than before. In a constitutional monarchy, the responsibility is thrown on a cabinet, and the opinions of several men on a particular question cannot be as easily concealed as the opinion of an individual. Besides, the members of the administration are led by their party quite as much as they lead it; it is, therefore, seldom difficult to anticipate the action of the cabinet on a question of foreign politics. The Executive in your Government, though brought to power by a party, has something of the character of an arbiter among the parties. The President in his exalted position personifies, as it were, the nation; his duty is to open his ears to all the confused sounds that come to him from all the parts of an enormous territory, to survey constantly the whole of it: numberless forces, great and small, ought to find in him what the mathematician calls the resultant force. This is what gives to his action such a solemn meaning; this is also what makes it so difficult to prophesy his action. His will is and must be a mystery till it has given the signal to his arm and to his hand. He has no right to restrain the expression of any opinion; but he is the slave of no individual opinion, whatever be its weight. It is needless to show what advantages such a position gives him in the management of his foreign politics. In the turmoil of passions, in the noise of unrestrained license, he preserves that calm and silent power which till now has seemed to be the attribute of despotism.

It would be almost amusing, if the matter was not so serious, to read the conflicting comments made on the American news in its relation to the Mexican affairs. One day, everything goes smoothly; your Government has given the most friendly assurances of neutrality; the American army is to be entirely disbanded; the feathered crown of Montezuma, placed by our hands on the head of an Austrian archduke, is as firm as the pillars of Hercules; the liberals have been entirely defeated and have lost all hope; all the soldiers and generals of the rebel armies of Lee and Johnston are enlisting in Maximilian's army, and swelling the ranks of that cosmopolitan force, which is instructing the Mexicans in all the arts of civilization. The next day, the Juarists are seen everywhere; Maximilian sends frightened envoys to his European allies; arms and ammunition are secretly conveyed to the liberals across the Rio Grande; the Federal pickets on one shore are insulting the French pickets on the other; the Monroe Doctrine is preached from every stump in America; and President Johnson is only waiting till some trifling business is ended to send the order to march to Sheridan. The news we receive is confused and often untrustworthy, and distorted by M. Reuter, whose pleasure seems to be now to disgust Europe with American politics; he can no more turn defeats into victories and victories into defeats, but he systematically misrepresents all the facts, and is trying to produce the impression that the United States are in as deplorable and desperate confusion as his own telegrams.

Public opinion in France has always been adverse to the Mexican war; the common sense of the people has never been able to understand why French soldiers should die by the thousand and French money be spent by the million, in order that a crown should be placed on the head of a prince whose family has always been hostile to France. The Mexican scheme has shaken the faith and confidence of the blindest admirers of Napoleon III.; and there is no doubt that, were he to die or to fall from power, the new Government, be it what it may, would make it its first duty to recall the French army from Mexico, and to leave Maximilian I. to the devotion of his people and to the protection of his Austro-Belgian legion. It is because the Mexican scheme is merely a personal scheme, because it is a nightmare which will vanish as soon as French liberty wakes up, that we feel so much anxiety lest it would involve us, by accident, in war with a country which has been for so long the traditional ally of France. The anxiety is rendered all the keener by the new solidarity which the recent events have established between the American republic and the liberal party in France. All liberals have sympathized with the North in its great struggles, and have almost looked upon America as on their second country. In the face of despotism, America has become their last argument, their ultima ratio; to those who pretend that democracy cannot exist except under the strong hand of a Cæsar, they show a democracy without Cæsars; to those who maintain that the triumph of equality is impossible without a sacrifice of liberty, they oppose your example. We feel indeed that a war between France and America would be a fratricidal war: your defeat would make the Imperial tyranny stronger; and your triumph would associate names and doctrines which are now our best hopes with a sense of humiliation. France and America have never been at war; they are so placed that they cannot inflict on each other any permanent injury; their antagonism would have no other effect than to gratify their enemies, to endanger the rights of neutrals, of which they have both, till now, been the most powerful supporters, and to put new and formidable difficulties in the way of the liberals in France.

Your Government need not interfere in Mexico; the Mexican war has already been baptized by public opinion under the name of the War of Spain of the Second Empire. Let not your eyes wander too much over the Rio Grande. I wish our eyes were not forcibly turned on those provinces where so much French blood has already been shed for a worthless cause. Time is the ruler of peoples and monarchs; time will solve the Mexican question without your help; time will reveal the base motives which have moved the originators of the Mexican expedition; time will show the vanity of their hopes; time will reduce to its true magnitude the new star added to the diadem of dynasties; time will show whether a German prince can make a nation on the American continent. A war at the present moment would have but one alternative—it must be a war of liberation or a war of conquest. If it is a war of liberation, if your troops succeed in forcing the invaders to evacuate the Tuileries-born empire, you must inaugurate a new government; and, in the actual state of Mexico, public opinion is not so unanimous that you can avoid being more or less responsible for the acts of the new administration. Would such a responsibility be desirable? I doubt it. Where will your intervention, once begun, stop? The honor of your name and of your flag may, perhaps, suffer from too close a connection with any Mexican party. Is the war to be a war of conquest? No good American can desire it. It was an absolute necessity for you to reconquer all the rebel States, not so much for the sake of their territory as for the sake of an important and vital principle. This has been done; but whoever has followed the military history of the civil war, knows what difficulties have been thrown in your way by the mere extent of your territory. The time has not come yet when the tide of immigration can be thrown on the provinces of Mexico; let the South be your Mexico for the present: how much time, capital, and intelligence will be required to put the Southern States on the social level of the Northern, to destroy every vestige of slavery and barbarism, to develop the resources of an admirable country, which in so many parts is still a desert! I have always considered the Monroe Doctrine as a just doctrine, in its true sense; it is to your continent what the doctrine of the Balance of Power is to Europe. We have our international ideal, founded on old historical divisions, and necessary for the preservation of the independence of the smaller states. America has a right to have her own ideal; the Atlantic is broad enough to separate our political conflicts from yours. The Monroe Doctrine is nothing but the assumption that America ought to be American; but the doctrine needs not to be enforced by arms—nature, time, and necessity will work it out. The folly of European intervention in American affairs is every day more apparent, and the demonstration will be even more complete if it is achieved without the arbitrament of war, by the all-powerful agency of a fatal historical law. AUG. LAUGEL.

LEGAL MEMORANDA.

ON CIRCUIT, Aug. 19.

THE courts at Westminster and at the Guildhall have been closed this month past, and fourteen of the fifteen judges are on circuit. The leaders, i. e., the Queen's counsel and sergeants, are engaged making their eight or ten or fifteen speeches per diem—appealing in more or less fervid or deprecatory accents to that intelligent and noble personage, the British juryman, as their tastes and inclinations range 'twixt argument and declamation, craft and audacity, small talk and tall talk. Behind the busy gentlemen in silk sit the half-dozen juniors—whom attorneys have elected from the hundred and thirty or fifty briefless stuff gownsmen to business and prospective judgeships. They are hardly less engaged than their seniors; for the heat and burden of the day is often at nisi prius with them, and the examination of witnesses, under the censorship of a great leader, is by no means a grateful office in intricate insurance or shipping cases. Their briefless brethren sit and lounge about them—some reporting, some discussing L'Africaine, while others are drawing imaginary heads of the beauty with five thousand a year that your aspiring utter barrister (so called because he never gets an opportunity of opening his mouth) firmly believes he is to wed, when business comes to him at last. A quaint old writer described a barrister as an odd fruit, "rotten before he 's ripe, like a medlar;" and if to be idle, as the philosophic Jacques puts it, is to rot, then indeed "he rots and rots" away. Fervent young men, full of ambition and Greek verses, coxswains of university crews, the best amateur bowlers and the best judges of a good dinner in Europe, fellows of colleges and Smith's prize-men, senior wranglers who are the sons of senior wranglers, all sit among the briefless bewigged, who look so wistfully and hungrily at attorneys from the back benches. The fervent young man will have become a middle-aged old fogy or an elderly father of a family, pinched to keep up appearances, ere the business he once dreamed so imminent will reward him. His ambition to get into Parliament, his friends' firm belief that he was destined to shine "in the House," his Greek verses—all have vanished. He was a brick in the days he joined, with a marked taste for expensive coats, lemon-colored gloves, and French boots. Now he is a sloven, whose tailor despises him for his poverty and sartorial inattention. Attendance in courts has lined his face like a map of the Indies, with the New World flung in, and sprinkled his hair with grey; he is soured and bittered in temper, and is, indeed, vastly changed from that gay and volatile being who once drove tandem in town, who was on nodding terms with at least three opera coryphées, and a member of one of the best West End clubs. He has now fallen into the mere rank and file of the profession, who eke out a miserable subsistence by chance briefs, by revising barristerships or editing legal books for the benefit of their more prosperous brethren.

But this is en passant in reference to the species of barrister on circuit, and to that enormous professional class of lawyers in England that stand 'twixt the attorneys and the judges. There are, it may be explained briefly, seven circuits in all, which comprehend in their districts the various towns, or more properly the forty counties in England. These are respectively the Northern, the Western, the Home, the Norfolk or Eastern, the Oxford, the Midland, and the North and South Wales. Of these the largest are necessarily the Home, which includes the metropolis and its suburbs, and the towns in its immediate vicinity; and the Northern, which takes in Liverpool and Manchester, the two next largest English towns. There are three assizes, or gaol deliveries, in the year: one in March, called the spring—another in July, the autumn or summer—and a third in December, the winter assize. The spring and autumn, or summer assize, takes usually from seven to ten weeks, according to the length of the circuit, and the winter a fortnight or three weeks only. The presiding judges, two to each circuit, sit alternately in different towns, for the trial of civil and criminal causes, and visit in succession each town appointed in the circuit. But, inasmuch as these legal districts were mapped out at a remote period in English history, and when Manchester, Birmingham, and Sheffield were relatively small towns, the circuits till very recently presented the anomaly of avoiding these great centres of industry in favor of the small country towns. Thus Warwick was an assize town, though it had not twenty thousand inhabitants, and Birmingham, with near two hundred thousand, was not. Manchester, with a population of nearly half a million, was only elevated to the distinction last year; and Brighton, with seventy thousand people, has still to send its prisoners and witnesses and jurymen to Lewes, a place with only about eight thousand inhabitants and some ten miles off.

As your correspondent is a member of the Northern circuit, his more immediate information must be limited to the experiences of that district generally, and of Manchester and Liverpool, in which towns he has spent the last five weeks especially. The judges on this circuit have been Mr. Baron Bramwell and Mr. Justice Montague Smith, this last being the most recently, or junior, appointed judge on the bench. The civil business in the two chief commercial towns is especially of a commercial kind, arising out of disputes on cotton, questions of insurance, breaches of contract generally with an odd smattering of breach of promise cases, and questions on leases, rights of way, and trespasses to the person or property of different kinds. The criminal calendars are much the same in each town: three or four murders, seven or eight rapes, as many manslaughters, with several cases of burglaries and assaults and robberies with violence, comprising the list. In Manchester the business was strictly of a routine character, and with the exception of a civil cause, in which a theatrical manager was sued for not properly exposing the plaintiff's advertisements in a pantomime, an action to recover insurance money by a fraudulent insurer, and another against members of a trade union for conspiracy, and a very fine case against a railway for injury to a servant, there have been no especially important causes. There were one or two breach of promise cases, but these were of minor note. Four or five cases of libel by a clergyman against different newspapers, an action against a sheriff, and one or two heavy breach of contract cases, include almost all the exceptional or noteworthy cases in Liverpool.

The action for conspiracy in Manchester was, however, to some extent unique, and as possibly illustrating the different state of feeling and of law existing on opposite sides of the Atlantic may be referred to, especially as it has been made the subject of demurrer, to be argued next term before the judges in banco. The suit was briefly to recover damages, first, for money paid under duress on account of an alleged conspiracy; and secondly, for money lost and expended by reason of the alleged illegal acts of the defendants. The plaintiffs were two brothers, and the conspiracy imputed to the defendants was that they had confederated together to make these brothers pay their father's debts. The plaintiffs were contractors or builders; the defendants brickmakers, and members of the United Brickmakers' Association. The father had been bankrupt a few years ago, and then owed a small sum of money—some twenty or thirty pounds—to a member of the Brick makers' Association. This person went to each of the members of the society to which he belonged, and either by suasion, or interdict, or the rules of the society, prevented the supply of bricks to the defendants by any member of the association. As nearly all the brickmakers in the neighborhood of Manchester are members of this society, this was virtually a general prohibition of supply. In each case, in more than twenty contracts specified, the brothers were allowed to commence building, which they did as small working contractors, and they were then informed that unless they were prepared to pay a small sum of their father's debt no more bricks would be delivered. The terms dictated were in no case hard, as little as thirty shillings or two pounds on account being accepted. Their alleged hardship was that they were thus compelled to pay their father's debts. The case for the defence in reply was, that the father was the real owner of the business, and that his sons were merely put forward as the ostensible persons contracting, it being admitted that the father was engaged in the work of each contract—as the one side maintained, as a servant; as the other declared, as a principal. The declaration was on two counts, the first charging the defendants with conspiring together to hinder and prevent the plaintiffs from following and executing their trade and business, and executing certain contracts; the second, for conspiring to extort money from the plaintiffs, and to force and compel them to pay to the defendants certain sums of money which it was alleged were due to their father. The judge, on hearing the evidence, ruled that these counts could not be sustained, and non-suited; the plaintiffs will have to argue the demurrers.

The question of a husband's right to the property of a wife from whom he has been divorced a mensa et thoro, was raised recently and is now reported in the case of Moore vs. Barber. From the facts, it appeared that the deceased wife was divorced by a decree of the Court of Arches, in 1848. On the 2d of May, 1850, the court ordered the husband to pay to the testatrix, during their joint lives, the annual sum of £350 as alimony. The wife it appears had saved from this sum £1,650 5s. 5d. Bank 3 per cent. annuities, and £170 12s. in cash. At her death she had left this money to the plaintiff in the suit, the residuary legatee, and had appointed the defendant the executor to her will. The husband, this being an ordinary administrative suit, now claimed the money saved out of the allowance made to her as alimony. The grounds of his claim advanced in argument were that the allowance in legal contemplation was given for the mere sustenance and support of the wife, and if the result proved that it had not been used, it followed that there had been failure in the purpose for which it was given, and the money must revert to the husband. She could not give that which was allowed to her by her husband for her own personal expenditure to strangers, and if there were arrears or savings of such alimony they belonged to the husband. For this position, Howard vs. Digby, 2 Cl. and Furnelly 634, was chiefly relied on.

Stuart, V. C. The suit is for the administration of the assets of the wife. It is most extraordinary that of all persons the husband should be the one to appear in such a suit, as he, by a decree in the Ecclesiastical Court, has not only been shorn of his marital rights, but has also been mulcted in the costs of that suit, and compelled by the decree to pay an annual sum of money to his wife. No doubt the divorce was only a mensa et thoro, and the husband remained husband still, and was entitled in his marital right to become his wife's legal personal representative. If he were so entitled, why has he not so constituted himself in order that he might have dealt with his wife's assets? It has been said that the present case is similar to that of Digby vs. Howard, 4 Sim. 588 and 2 C. and F., where it was said that if a husband be ordered to pay money for a particular purpose, and that purpose does not arise, the court will consider that the marital right remained attached to the property which was directed to be so applied. Now, what was the position of the Duchess of Norfolk in that case? She was a lunatic entitled to a large sum by way of pin-money, which had not been paid to her. A bill was filed by her legal personal representative, who claimed the money on a ground perfectly intelligible, as far as it went, and which was, that according to the course of the decisions in this court as to the wife's separate estate, a husband, if he has not paid what is due to his wife in respect of such estate, is held to be entitled to keep possession of it, upon the assumption that his wife has consented to his so retaining it. Had the wife chosen to demand her money, she would have obtained it; as she did not ask, the presumption was simply that she consented to give it up. In this case, however, the law has made this money assets of the wife, and the husband can have no more equity in coming into this court to get back alimony, than the wife to be paid arrears of alimony.

One of those very numerous and, it might also be said, vexatiously inevitable cases, on the interpretation of certain words in a will, has recently been decided by V. C. Kindersley, in Ruck vs. Barwise. The words of disposition employed by the testator were that the interest of his property was to go to his daughter, and after her death the property to go to her children or heirs for ever.

The question to be decided was, Was this fund divisible into six or eight shares?—the daughter having given birth to eight children, of which number six survived her.

The difficulty was, Did the children take as first tenants under the will, or could any argument be founded on the words "heirs for ever" to alter the construction placed on the first bequest in the sentence.

The decision was that the children took as first tenants.

In a case, Williams vs. Jones, on appeal to the Exchequer Chamber, an interesting decision, on the question of negligence, has been decided.

The facts were exceedingly simple. A publican bought some boards of a timber merchant, and asked permission to convert them into a sign-board in a shed belonging to the timber merchant. To effect the conversion, a carpenter was employed. This man, in lighting his pipe, dropped a lighted shaving amongst other shavings, and the shed was burnt down. Action by the timber merchant to recover money of the publican, the defendant, for value of the shed and the loss caused thereby.

The argument for the plaintiff was, that the fire, having been caused by the negligence of the carpenter, who was the servant of the publican for this purpose, the publican was liable. The jury had found that the shed had been lent under an implied promise that it should be used in a careful manner, and that the defendant would take reasonable care that no damage should accrue to the plaintiff thereby, and that the fire was caused by the negligence of the defendant and his servants. But the point on these facts was, whether the defendant was liable for his servant's breach of duty. In smoking, the carpenter was guilty of negligence. But it might be urged adversely to this that he was not acting within the scope of his employment. In the absence of any precedent, it might be suggested that the case should be governed by the law applicable to bailments, and that the loan of the shed was analogous to a commodatum to the defendent. If so, the defendant, as a gratuitous bailee, would be responsible even for slight negligence: Coggs vs. Bernard, 1 Sm. L. C. 171.

The court below considered the fact that the shed was part of the realty prevented the law of bailments from applying. In the case of a loan, the borrower is bound to restore the chattel to the lender uninjured, unless prevented by some vis major. It is contended that the defendant, though merely a licensee, is liable: Story on Bailments, § 285.

There is no reason why the rule of law, with regard to a licensee under a revocable license, should differ from that with regard to a bailee. It was argued contra: 1. That the law of bailments did not apply. 2. That the act of the carpenter in smoking was not the act of the defendant, and that the maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, in no wise applied. The carpenter had acted in a manner not contemplated when the shed was built. The master is only liable where the servant is acting within the scope of the business for which he is employed. But doing an unauthorized act, the man became a trespasser. For the trespass, he and he alone, and not his master, was liable. If the act had been committed by the master personally, trespass would have been the only remedy against him. There was no bailment, merely a revocable license to the defendant to enter upon land. There was no contract between him and the plaintiff. The defendant is not liable for the trespass of his servant.

It was held, in affirmation of the previous judgment of the court below (Blackburn and Mellor, JJ., dissenting), that the defendant was not liable, for that the negligence of the carpenter in the use of the shed was not negligence in using it for the purposes of his master, the defendant, nor in the course of his employmeut.

Held by Mellor and Blackburn, JJ., that such negligence was negligence in the course of the carpenter's employment, and therefore the negligence of the defendant.

It was also held by all the court, that the loan of the shed to the defendant was neither a demise, nor anything analogous to a bailment of the shed, but a mere license by the defendant to use it, by his servant, for the purpose of making the sign-board.

Blackburn, J., among his reasons, assigned this: The master is not liable for any negligence or tort of the servant which is not in the course of his employment. It might be said that the carpenter was not employed to light his pipe or smoke. That was no doubt true. But the act of lighting a pipe is in itself a harmless act; it only became negligent and a breach of duty towards the plaintiff, because it was done when using his shed and working there amongst inflammable materials. Had the action been brought against the servant, it could not have been maintained for lighting his pipe merely, but that would have been under the circumstances evidence that he failed to take reasonable care while using the plaintiff's shed, and that would have been the true ground of action. The point is not capable of being elucidated by argument or by decided cases; it depends rather on whether this is a correct statement of the effect of facts.

A woman of the name of Winsor, under sentence of death for murder, has just been respited, in order that the question of a re-trial (the first jury having been discharged without a verdict) in capital cases may be considered by the twelve judges forming the court of appeal in criminal cases. The question is one of the most interesting in constitutional law, and will be discussed at length, in anticipation of the judges' consideration, so far as it is settled in existing law, in my next letter. TEMPLAR.

August 19, 1865.

THE BREAK UP.

BY A CONFEDERATE SOLDIER.

FROM CHARLESTON TO FAYETTEVILLE.

EARLY in February, 1865, I was ordered to the Signal Station, at Battery Marshall, on the extreme east end of Sullivan's Island. There were various rumors about evacuation, and holding the city to the last ditch, every one contradicting the other, according to each man's idea of Sherman's intentions, and each man's version of the meagre reports of his march that reached the city. On the 15th, however, we learned something positive from the following message, in cypher, from headquarters: "Prepare to move at a moment's notice, bringing off the most valuable Government property, and destroying the rest, along with all papers."

On receipt of this, I immediately sat down and wrote a request, which I pasted in the case of my watch, that if, by the chances of war, it should fall into the hands of a benevolent individual, he would do an unfortunate man a favor, by sending it to his mother, stating her address, and, what was more important, that its full price would be paid. Then I arranged my affairs; told my servant, Job, what I wished done with "my tings" in case "anything should happen," and that night took my last sleep on the old Island, dreaming of the happy summers of my childhood passed there.

The next morning all was bustle and activity, getting ready for the final move. The day I spent in Charleston. That evening I passed with some jolly companions, and we celebrated our last night by having a gay time; however sorry we may have been, we knew we could n't help it, and our motto, like most soldiers, was "Dulce est desipere," etc., etc. The next day, Friday, 17th, I should have returned to my post; but as I knew the transports with the troops from the Island were to go up Cooper River, and with all the forces from the city were to rendezvous at Strawberry Ferry, I got leave to go up by land. The grand difficulty was to secure a horse. As the day advanced, things became more excited and confused. The commissary stores were opened, and a complete rabble of men, women, and children, without respect to age or color, began cursing and fighting over bacon, flour, salt, coffee, etc. I went in and secured a few things for an old woman; but she was so horribly grasping that I soon left her, disgusted at her struggling with another old wretch for her booty. A little after dark I met a cavalryman offering a tolerably good horse for the low sum of $500. Being in great want of a beast I offered him $150, on the plea of running the risk of its being reclaimed as stolen property. The man was extremely indignant, and wanted to fight at the imputation on his character. I told him to pitch in; he then explained his reason for holding the horse so low. He expected a friend to whom he meant to lend it, and who in return would supply him with money; but the friend had left, and he was hard up, and two horses were more than he could take care of, etc. So we compromised by my giving him $200, equivalent to about $4 in specie. I mounted the nag and rode to the Quartermaster's Depot, whence I was to leave at one o'clock that night. I hitched it at the door, and on returning, twenty minutes after, found the animal nibbling grass down the street, but saddle and bridle gone. So securing the beast with a rope and leaving it in a safe place, I thought I would walk around and see how things were going on. There was no life anywhere, except at the fires, where thousands and thousands of bales of cotton were being destroyed; there were engines to keep the fire within bounds, and guards to prevent the cotton being stolen instead of burned. It was painful to see so much property, the sweat of so many brows, making food for fire. But such is the fate of war. To stand at a little distance, and look at the men rushing about in the smoke, cursing, yelling, and laughing, while the whole sky was lit up with bloody red, gave one no mean idea of pandemonium. The rest of the town was still as death, not a light in a single house, only now and then a frightened woman hurriedly closing some forgotten shutter, her eyes straining through the darkness for the dreaded robber or murderer, whose gun she expected to see aimed at her. The quiet was oppressive, and I hastened from it.

About 11 A.M., mounting my horse with a rope for bridle and a blanket for saddle, I may say I commenced my march, going up to Hempstead Mall, whence the wagon train was to start. There I met several acquaintances, and my servant Bram with "my things," four times as much as I wanted. Hitching my charger to a wagon with a bag of corn before him, I addressed myself to getting acquainted with the crowd, helping to cut down a flagstaff, and trying to keep warm the best way I could, until the train should start. At 1 P.M. it commenced moving, not without great difficulty, on account of balking teams and green teamsters. I climbed into one wagon and Bram into another, and in a little while we were lumbering along quite steadily, and I fell asleep.

When I awoke we were seven miles from Charleston, and day just breaking. I crawled out to look after my horse; he was nowhere to be seen. So borrowing another I went down the road about three miles, without seeing or hearing anything of him. At last I was told that a gray horse had been seen astray that morning, at an old camp on Ashley River, about two miles off. I went there, and sure enough descried my beast, and with some trouble I caught him. I had scarcely joined the wagon train when an old fellow in a buggy drove up and commenced calling me thief, and claiming the horse as his own. I told him he would have to prove property, and advised him to change his tone lest he should get his head broke.

One of my acquaintances here put in that he was the son of the old man; that the grey really belonged to him, and had been stolen the preceding evening with bridle and saddle, just as I had bought him. Of course I gave up the horse; the old fellow apologized for his language, and invited me to share his basket of grub and jug of lightning whiskey. So we breakfasted in high glee, and parted the best of friends. At Goose Creek, fifteen miles from town, I stopped to dine with an aunt who lived a little off the road. I could hardly realize what had come to pass. It seemed like moving in a dream; and not until it came to leaving those five helpless women alone on the plantation, with no man except negroes, did I fully comprehend that the war had actually come to the spot where I had passed many a happy holiday with my cousins. On Sunday morning, 19th, we reached Strawberry Depot, on the North-eastern Railroad, 28 miles from the city. Here I was quite at home, having passed my childhood on my father's plantation, five miles off, on Cooper River. I borrowed a horse and rode to the old plantation. I saw several of the neighbors; some had not seen me since I was a child, but all gave me a hearty welcome and plenty to eat. One old bachelor, married in 1861, had everything just the same, and bustled about to give me a good breakfast, with the kind hospitality of peaceful days.

The only difference in the establishment I could discover, was the lady sitting by the fire, and a curly-pated little urchin, whom his father spoiled much as he used to do me in the old times. On leaving, he loaded me with an enormous lunch. I could with difficulty dissuade him from sending a cart along with me; and it was only by threatening to empty everything into the road as soon as I should be out of his sight, that I convinced him I wanted no more feed. The kind old fellow thought I was going to starve. I am glad to have learned since that his plantation was unmolested.

All the troops from Charleston, consisting of two brigades, Rhett's and Elliott's, forming Taliaferro's Division, camped that night at Monk's Corner, where they were joined by Mr. Law's Division, the whole between 12,000 and 15,000 men, forming Hardee's Corps. Tuesday we reached Santee River. It took four days and nights to ferry the troops across. There I rejoined my companions of the Signal Corps; but, knowing that institution would "go up" with the fall of Charleston, I concluded to look out for myself, and ride when I could, instead of trudging along with them. While waiting to cross the Santee, I amused myself with a colt that I bought with a pair of gloves and $100, i. e., $2 25 in specie. He was a perfect beauty. On leaving, I put him in the charge of a quartermaster friend, and that is the last I saw of him.

People were giving away horses. They ran about loose, and many enterprising persons picked them up; then other fellows still more enterprising would come with a friend to back them and carry off the prize, so that horses were held by most uncertain tenure.

One night three of us "slipped" past the guard a cart which some fellow had "pressed" on the road, and we started for a place which we were told was five miles off, and rich in corn and potatoes. It turned out to be eight of the longest miles, over the roughest and darkest road I ever travelled. We finally got to the place, and routed up the old overseer, who was very surly, and declared himself dying of rheumatism. He swore he had neither corn nor potatoes; that potatoes were the bane of his existence; that it was nothing but "potatoes," "potatoes," "potatoes," all day long, and here now he was routed up at night for the "damn potatoes."

He had none, but we might get some three miles further. We were not to be bluffed off in that way; the horse was too tired and we were too cold to go three miles further on a wild potato chase. The old fellow had committed a grand mistake in letting us into his chamber, and having the fire kindled to look at us. We were quite comfortable, and swore we would not leave until we had our cart-load, for which we were willing to pay. He said we could stay and be d——d, and he drew his head under the bedclothes and pretended to snore. We had been very quiet, and had made our requisition with great politeness; but one of us had been out reconnoitring and found five potato cellars, which a negro to whom he had given a "chaw of tobacco" assured him were all nearly full, and that there was besides plenty of corn. So to teach the old sport better manners we looked around, and I found a horn, one of my companions a cow-bell, and the third a stick, with which instruments we began a concert and dance, to the great delight of the negro.

The man became furious, and raved and threatened to report us; but he would not have done much at that, as according to our account we belonged to some outlandish battery of artillery which no one could ever have found.

At length he proposed a compromise, and asked if one bushel of potatoes, five of corn, and as much fodder as we could carry, would satisfy us? To which we agreed. He gave the keys to the negro, bidding him go with us; but blackey tried to put off the work on us; so we took the keys and helped ourselves. The cellars were some distance off in a field; the negro forced us to open each one before the right one, which only, he swore, was empty. But we carried our point, and made him fill a basket of the best, and gave him half a basket for himself (which he didn't deserve), for in carrying them to the cart he lagged behind, and, pretending to stump his toe, he tumbled them all out. So we had to get a torch and undergo much trouble in picking them up, on account of wind and rain which had come on. We went into the house till the rain should cease, and cooked a pot of potatoes. The old man kindly sent us out some cold pork, and I never expect to eat so much pork and potatoes again.

Returning to camp, the horse was too much played out to haul us with the load. Two of us walked, taking turns with the third to drive. I never was so sleepy in my life; I put my hand on the cart and kept nodding the whole way; when it came to my turn to drive, I merely fell into the cart, and when I awoke we were just entering camp and day was breaking. I never stirred that day, but slept right through. That trip did n't pay for the trouble. Thursday evening we crossed the Santee. As soon as ever they commenced to move, I cut off from the Signal Corps and joined the wagon train, with which I travelled to Kingstree, thence by rail to Florence, keeping Bram with me. Job, who had come up Cooper River by transport and joined me at Strawberry, I sent on by the wagon train to Cheraw. I was told Job behaved remarkably well, and was extremely cool in picking up some of his traps, which he dropped on the bridge between Sullivan's Island and Mount Pleasant, under a tremendous shelling. I overheard him describing the scene to some other boys. "Look ya," he said, "you nigger ought to ha' bin dey, for see how I fling dem ting on my back. I put my head down and cut. When de shell come and buss, I shy and kick up jis like one o' dem little dunkey; you would n't o' tink 't was dis ole Job. Some o' dem soger scare so dey fall down. I run ober dem jis like dog."

How he brought the load, bundled up as it was, I can't imagine. There were two large pots, two tin pans, a plate, knife, fork, and spoon, a pair of shoes, two suits of clothes, four packages of tobacco, and two cans of preserved meat, and a pillow, all rolled up in a large cotton bed-quilt.

At Florence, on the following day, I learned from some men who had escaped capture at Town Creek, near Wilmington, that Haywood's Brigade, from which I had been detailed, was captured; which relieved my mind considerably, as I did not fancy returning to the infantry.

At Cheraw I came upon one of my uncles, in former times the jolliest, most peaceable man in the world, now transformed into a ferocious captain of Home Guards. He wore a homespun uniform, with three gold bars on the collar; a dilapidated tarpaulin hat, cocked fiercely on his dear old grey head. He was chewing awfully, and haranguing his men. "Go it, my fine fellows," said he. "Lick Sherman, don't you run; I'll be along with you. Only lick Sherman, wherever you catch him!" I don't believe Gen. Sherman ever came within the danger of this formidable veteran.

Here, also, I caught the last view of my precious dog-cart; the only piece of property which the vicissitudes of fortune had left me. At the evacuation of Charleston, not having yet made the famous purchase of the grey, I had lent my dog-cart to a friend, who was so fortunate as to possess a horse. I overhauled him at Cheraw, and he engaged to drive to Charlotte, and sell the carriage to recruit my finances. In a hopeful spirit I beheld it floating down the river, on the deck of the gunboat Pee Dee. When next I came upon my erratic companion, he informed me that he had driven into a mud hole, the wheels separated from the body, and so the cart "went up."

At Cheraw I got assigned to the Stono Scouts, an independent company acting as body-guard to old Hardee. I was put on "temporary duty until I should reach my command," which I never expected to do, having heard it was captured. Saturday, March 4, they began the march again. At the railroad depot there was the greatest confusion, plundering of the commissary stores, and of wine and all sorts of things sent up by the citizens of Charleston for safe keeping.

I pitched in and secured six bottles of old Madeira, and nearly got drowned in a cask of port. The head had been knocked in, and being among the nearest, I plunged my two canteens in. But the crowd was so great I could not raise my arm, which was up to the shoulder in wine, and they continued to press till my head was forced half way into the barrel; I was unable to raise myself until it was completely drained; and then the side of my face was all scratched by the canteens which had been shoved by it, and my clothes saturated with wine.

At the door of the depot I met Job, who was loaded with wine, sugar, coffee, and ham, all of which he had got in a bag. He generously presented me with two bottles of wine. As it was not always easy to procure food for two servants when forage ran short, I consigned Job to the care of a friend in Rhett's regiment. I met him afterwards at Fayetteville, for the last time during the war. Losing the horse on which my friend had mounted him, he attached himself to a company of artillery, and travelled back to Charleston with them after the surrender. Bram, too, went heavily into the commissaries. He did not rejoin me until I reached Fayetteville, coolly telling me the road was too muddy for him to walk, so he had waited for a wagon train. He was not the fellow to go on foot when ingenuity could obtain a horse. Accordingly, at Fayetteville he soon succeeded in what he was pleased to call "capturing" a horse.

I here gave away most of my wine, because I had a cough, and I was so much disgusted with the smell on my clothes I could not drink it, and I have not cared much for wine since.

I rode my pony without a saddle until we reached Rockingham, where I saw an old citizen leading a horse with an army saddle, the girths hanging loose. I quietly lifted the saddle, the old chap walking on, and I don't know when he discovered his loss. My saddle having been taken off from the old grey at Charleston, I had ridden bare-back ever since, which was derogatory to a cavalryman, and very uncomfortable. As there was no knowing when the proper authorities would equip me, I was only restoring that piece of goat property to the right hands. We passed the night at Rockingham, and at 3 A.M. were ordered to saddle up, though we did not move until 8. This is a practice at all headquarters, which all the men dislike.

For two days we marched in the direction of Greensboro', where we expected to form a junction with the remains of Hood's army, and make a stand. But orders came from Joe Johnston at Fayetteville, and turned everything in that direction. The night before we reached Fayetteville we stopped at a house where they agreed to take us in; indeed, I was so unwell, having ridden all day in the rain, I could go no further. There were several old women who were very kind in doctoring me with ley tea, pepper tea, and other villanous remedies, to which I patiently submitted, although they did me no good.

In my haversack I had about half a pound of coffee, mixed with crumbs of wet corn bread, looking anything but tempting; their eyes however gloated over it as if it were gold. Indeed, they declared it was worth "in town" $50 (about fifty cents). I asked them to boil it all, that there might be enough for my companion as well as myself and the whole house. After awhile they set the table for us; but none of them sat down; they stood and looked at us. We had bacon, eggs, sorghum, and the everlasting corn bread. I was too sick to eat, but expected my coffee. At last it was produced, worse even than the ordinary corn coffee. I could n't go it. I went to the pail and took a draught of water. They were very much surprised I did n't like the coffee. It was, they declared, "whole one-fifth real coffee!" I begged to have it all real coffee for breakfast; they agreed. But for breakfast they served some blackened water. Finding they were so careful of the coffee, I could not bring myself to reclaim it; so, thanking them for their kindness, I rode off.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT CHOLERA.

In the year 1629, Bontius, a Dutch physician, residing at Batavia, in Java, made the civilized world acquainted with the existence of that terrible pestilence, the cholera, which had doubtless, since the organization of society, prevailed with more or less violence in India and the islands along its coasts. His observations were scarcely heeded outside of the scientific circle for which they were intended, and notwithstanding the fact that the disease was subsequently recognized by British physicians in the East Indies, and by travellers of other nations, Europeans gave themselves very little concern in regard to a malady which, however virulent and destructive, was not likely to extend its ravages so far to the westward as to invade their homes.

But in this expectation they were wofully mistaken. In the year 1817 it raged with great violence at Jessore, a large town near the mouths of the Ganges. It spread, not very swiftly, but yet with awful certainty, in all directions, and by August of the following year had reached Bombay, on the western side of the peninsula. Thence it travelled through Arabia, Persia, Mesopotamia, Syria, etc., on its westward course, and, continuing to extend itself eastwardly from its place of origin, invaded the Burmese empire, Siam, Java, China, and the other populous countries of that portion of the earth.

Still, its progress was very slow. Several days frequently elapsed before it passed from one town to another only a few miles distant. The means of communication were, in the regions where it prevailed, very imperfect, and to this cause its sluggish movements must be attributed. In these days of steam its course is more rapid.

Up to 1823 its ravages had not extended beyond Asia; but in that year it appeared at Orenburg and Astrachan, two towns situated on the eastern frontier of Russia. Here it remained until 1828, when it increased in violence, attacking a tenth of the inhabitants of the province of Orenburg, and proving fatal to a fourth of those affected.

In 1830 it reappeared at Astrachan. In less than a month 4,000 persons died of it in that city, and over 21,000 perished from it in the province. Ascending the Volga, it reached Moscow, destroying thousands in that city; and, continuing its fatal course, appeared at St. Petersburg on the 26th of June, 1831. From Astrachan it also diverged along the northern coast of the Black Sea, and thence spread into Austria, Poland, Prussia, and Northern Germany generally. In August, 1831, it was conveyed to Cairo by a caravan from Mecca. Thousands perished from it on the road, and over 15,000 died of it in the former city.

On the 26th of October, 1831, the disease appeared for the first time in England, at Sunderland, a town situated on the North Sea, near Newcastle. It was supposed to have been introduced from Hamburg, by a return collier. It showed very little disposition for some time to pass beyond the limits of this city, and was mainly confined to the worst parts of the town; according to a statement made at that time, it crept like a skulking hyena from one dirty lane to another, affecting localities remarkable for their filth, poverty, and wretchedness, and carrying off those who, from decrepitude, drunkenness, hunger, or uncleanliness, were already fit subjects for the grave.

From Sunderland it spread slowly through the northern part of England and Scotland, and did not break out in London till the 14th of February following, when some persons living in the immediate vicinity of the shipping were attacked. In this city, as in all others in which the disease had made its appearance, the districts mainly affected were those chiefly distinguished for their filthiness and an utter disregard of all sanitary regulations. Thus, for instance, the streets of St. Olave, St. Thomas, and Whitechapel, which were the most unhealthy districts, were stated to be "a disgrace to the civilized world." In Whitechapel, the great majority of its confined and crowded streets, courts, and alleys were without ventilation, water, or sewerage. In Lambeth, where the cholera also prevailed extensively, the cleansing, drainage, and water supply were either totally wanting or grievously defective. It was invariably noticed that the disease was especially prevalent in those sections where typhus and typhoid fevers and other affections due to dirt and overcrowding were most liable to occur.

On the 8th of June, 1832, the cholera broke out at Quebec, this being its first appearance on this side of the Atlantic. It was supposed to have been introduced in an emigrant ship, many of the passengers of which had died from it during the voyage. Two days afterwards it appeared at Montreal. On the 24th, New York was unexpectedly attacked—the cities and towns along the coast to the north entirely escaping. From New York it extended to Albany, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, New Orleans, etc.—most of the larger towns being visited, but some unaccountably remaining exempt from its ravages. The first case in New York occurred at the corner of Gold and Frankfort Streets. The patient was a native male citizen. Some cases immediately followed in Cherry Street; the subjects were Irish emigrants, who had arrived at Quebec in the autumn of 1831, and had resided in Albany till the month of May, 1832, when they had removed to New York. On the 27th, the disease manifested itself at Bellevue Hospital. The patient was an aged woman who had not been out of the institution for three years, and who had held no communication with the city. Reade, Washington, and Duane Streets, the Five Points, and the whole region of the Sixth Ward, were visited by the epidemic with fearful violence. Rotten Row in Laurens, between Grand and Broome Streets, was another deadly centre of the malady. In all these places, as well as in the others where it raged with the greatest intensity, the local and removable conditions of general insalubrity were abundant.*

The epidemic reached its height in New York on the 21st of July, from which period it continued to decline. It did not finally disappear from the United States for three or four years.

So much for the first epidemic of Asiatic cholera. In Great Britain and Ireland over 116,000 cases and 40,000 deaths occurred. In the cities of Quebec, Montreal, New York, and Philadelphia, embracing, at that time, about 450,000 inhabitants, there were over 18,000 cases and 8,000 deaths.

Europe and America remained free from the pestilence for several years. It did not, however, entirely die out in India; and in May, 1846, it broke out with extreme severity at Teheran, in Persia, carrying off as many as 300 a day for several weeks. "Those who were attacked dropped down suddenly in a state of lethargy, and at the end of two or three hours expired without any convulsions or vomiting, but from a complete stagnation of the blood, to which no remedies could restore its circulation." At Kurrachee, near the mouth of the Indus, it prevailed with terrific violence—more than 8,000 died in a few days.

Entering Europe almost by the identical route it traversed in its first visitation, the cholera ravaged parts of Russia and Turkey during the years 1847 and 1848. It then declined in violence, and the hope was indulged that it would disappear without visiting the western countries which had suffered from it fifteen years previously. But this was not to be. When once this fatal pestilence emerges from its birthplace, it never stays its course at the outset of its travels. Wherever there is food for it, there it goes, with a certainty that ought to be appalling, but which civilized man has thus far almost entirely disregarded. After a short period of remission, it broke out with increased violence, and during the latter part of 1848 and the whole of 1849 prevailed throughout Germany, France, and Great Britain.

On the 9th of November, 1848, the ship New York left Havre for the city of New York, with 385 passengers. There was no cholera either at Havre or Paris when the vessel sailed, and the passengers remained healthy till they had been out sixteen days. One of them was then taken ill with a disease resembling cholera, another and another case followed, until, when the vessel arrived at Staten Island, on the 4th of December, eight or ten had died, and as many were still suffering from the disease. Cases continued to occur at quarantine among the passengers and the patients of the Marine Hospital. A few days after the ship arrived at quarantine, an individual came from there to the city, and stopped at a German emigrant house on the corner of Cedar and Greenwich Streets. He was attacked with the disease, and being carried back died in a few hours. On the 11th of December another case occurred in the same house. This house was excessively filthy, and contained upwards of 200 lodgers, mostly emigrants. One other case occurred at 161 Washington Street, and then the disease ceased its ravages. In all, there were 92 cases and 48 deaths.

But as usual it was only resting from its labors. During the first week of April, 1849, it re-appeared at quarantine, and by the 30th of May 43 had died of it. In the city it made its irruption in the most filthy regions and among the lowest of the population.

Meanwhile it had appeared at New Orleans, and had spread over the greater part of the Eastern and Western States; the emigrant parties and military expeditions on the prairies suffered severely from it; many tribes of Indians experienced its attacks, and the mortality from it in California was fearful. It did not entirely disappear from the United States till 1855, and in 1854 became very violent in some localities. In 1853 and 1854 it prevailed again in Great Britain, and in 1855 and 1856 the allied armies in the Crimea suffered intensely from the pestilence. Since then until the present year, if any cases have occurred in Europe or America, they have been altogether isolated and exceptional. Now, however, we hear from the East that the disease has again broken through what may be called its normal limits, and that it is rapidly spreading over Asia Minor, Northern Africa, and Europe.

On the 10th or 11th of May, the first death from cholera occurred at Alexandria, in Egypt, the disease having been brought to that city by pilgrims returning from Mecca. From that date to the 16th of July, 3,300 deaths had ensued from the pestilence, and there had been about 10,000 cases in a population of less than 60,000. Rosetta Santa and Zagazig were attacked about the same time. In June it had reached Cairo. On the 12th of July it appeared at Constantinople, and almost simultaneously several cases occurred at Ancona. From Alexandria it was imported into Marseilles in a steamer, and it is said a few cases have already occurred in Paris. That it will visit our country ere long is as certain as any event in the future can be. It behooves us, therefore, if we value our own lives and those of the individuals committed to our charge, to enquire into the circumstances calculated to mitigate the violence of the pestilence even if we cannot entirely prevent its inroads. From the recorded experience of many physicians, and from the results of our own observations of several hundred cases in 1849, 1853, and 1854, we propose, therefore, to place before our readers such information on the subject as we think should be possessed by every intelligent and conscientious citizen.

Although cholera is pre-eminently a disease of the poor, the miserable, and the filthy denizens of large cities and towns, it is by no means confined to this class. It always, however, originates among the former, and if the latter become affected, it is due either to the great virulence of the poison or to their violation of the plainest laws of sanitary science. As we have seen in the epidemics of 1832 and 1849, the disease began in New York in the most wretched localities, just as it had previously done in the other cities it had visited, and just as it has always done since. During the latter visitation it appeared first in the Sixth Ward, and it may be safely predicted that its next outbreak in our city will be in that district. At that time it was noted that the greatest mortality occurred among the occupants of cellars. A physician in large practice stated that he did not know of a single instance of recovery among those who were not speedily removed from these subterranean dwellings.

The predilection of cholera for filthy, badly ventilated, and overcrowded localities has been already mentioned. Its liability to revisit the exact place where it formerly occurred is a very remarkable feature in its natural history, and one full of interest in a sanitary point of view. Thus, the first case that occurred in Edinburgh, in 1848, was in the same house, and within a few feet of the same spot, where the epidemic of 1832 began its course. On its re-appearance in the town of Pollockshaws, the first victim was from the same room and the same bed in which it had broken out in 1832. In Bermondsey, both epidemics originated in the same locality—close to a ditch filled with excrementitious matters. In Oxford, on both occasions of its visitation, it broke out in the county jail. At Groningen, in Holland, it began its ravages in 1832 in two houses, and in 1848 the inmates of these identical houses were the first attacked. The first case of cholera in Chelsea was in Whitehall Court, in 1848. It hung around this region till 1849. The first case in 1854 was in the same locality, and, perhaps, in the same house. Dr. Ackland states that in Oxford every street and every yard in St. Thomas's parish—with one exception—which had been attacked with cholera in 1832 and 1849 was revisited in 1854. These are startling facts, and prove with a force requiring no argument to sustain it, that the germs of cholera are localized, and that only the exciting cause is required to start them into active existence.

* See the late "Report on the Sanitary Condition of New York," page lxiii.

Now, what is this exciting cause? Is it something given off from an infected person's body, or from his clothes, or from his discharges? Is it some alteration of the atmosphere? Is it an excessive or diminished amount of electricity? Is it due to the presence of ozone, or to the existence of millions of microscopic organisms which, floating in the air, are inspired and swallowed? All of these suppositions, and a great many more, have been vigorously contended for by their proposers. We do not intend to discuss them at length. We shall only express our own firm conviction that cholera is not, strictly speaking, contagious; that it is excited by a peculiar poison in the atmosphere, which clings to individuals, clothing, vessels, houses, soil, etc., and which is therefore portable, and that, unless it meets with what may be considered its germs, it is altogether inert. To cause a case of cholera, two things, therefore, are necessary: exposure of the individual to the influence of bad air, wet, improper food and drink, overcrowding, filth, etc., etc., and the action of the morbific principle referred to above. Cholera, therefore, cannot be kept off by quarantine, however rigid it may be. In Hungary, in 1849, every approach from infected districts was strictly guarded by a military force—so severe was the watch, that it was said only the wild animals passed through, and yet the entrance of the poison was not prevented. So long as the atmosphere has free circulation from an infected to an uninfected locality containing the germs, so long will cholera extend itself until the power of the poison is expended. A vessel, therefore, arriving at quarantine with cholera on board, would certainly infect the mainland if the conditions favorable to infection existed, even though there should be no direct communication with the shore.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen,
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

RIVERSIDE BOOKS.

WIDDLETON'S

LIST OF PUBLICATIONS.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Having purchased the stereotype plates, stock, and good-will of the RIVERSIDE BOOKS, heretofore owned by Mrs. WILLIAM VEAZIE, of Boston, we are now prepared to offer new and elegant editions of those valuable works, in full variety of choice bindings.

THE LIST COMPRISES:

SHAKESPEARE,

Complete in 8 vols. Riverside Edition, including the Poems, a Life, Notes, and a History of the Stage.

BYRON,

4 vols. Complete, with Life by Thomas Moore.

BURTON'S ANATOMY OF MELANCHOLY, 3 vols.

DISRAELI'S CURIOSITIES OF LITERATURE, 4 vols.

DISRAELI'S AMENITIES OF LITERATURE, 2 vols.

HALLAM'S LITERATURE OF EUROPE, 4 vols.

HALLAM'S MIDDLE AGES, 3 vols.

HALLAM'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 3 vols.

HALLAM'S COMPLETE WORKS, 10 vols.

(Comprising the three foregoing lines.)

MAY'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

2 vols. (A continuation of Hallam.)

HALLAM AND MAY'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY,

Together, 5 vols.

CHARLES LAMB'S WORKS, 4 vols.

LAMB'S ESSAYS OF ELIA, 1 vol.

LAMB'S ELIANA,

(Hitherto uncollected writings, 1 vol.)

MILMAN'S HISTORY OF THE JEWS, 3 vols.

MILMAN'S HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY, 3 vols.

(Nearly ready.)

With the exception of "Shakespeare" (16mo, gilt tops, price $1 75 per vol.), the above books are all crown 8vo volumes, price $2 75 per volume in cloth, and $4 in half calf, or half turkey binding. Each set of books in a box.

ALSO,

NOW READY,

New Editions of the following popular books, all handsomely printed on fine laid tinted paper:

EDGAR A. POE'S WORKS. 4 vols. cloth, $9. (Uniform with Riverside Press books.)

PROF. WILSON'S LIFE AND WORKS. (Noctes Ambrosianæ.) 6 vols. cloth, $15.

DR. DORAN'S WORKS. 9 vols. cloth, $20.

DORAN'S ANNALS OF THE STAGE. (A revised edition.) 2 vols. cloth, $4 50.

PRAED'S POEMS. Elegant library edition. 2 vols., $4 50.

INGOLDSBY LEGENDS. 16 illustrations, 2 vols., $4 50.

NAPIER'S PENINSULAR WAR. 5 vols., with 55 steel maps and portraits, $15.

SYDNEY SMITH'S WIT AND WISDOM. (The cream of Sydney Smith.) Edited by E. A. Duyckinck. 1 vol., $2 25.

STANLEY'S SINAI AND PALESTINE. Elegant library copy, uniform with "Eastern and Jewish Church," maps and plates. 1 vol. octavo, $4.

DEAN TRENCH'S WORKS. Uniform edition. 9 vols., $1 25 each.

LAS CASES' NAPOLEON. 4 vols., $6.

O'MEARA'S NAPOLEON. 2 vols., $3.

SIMMS' WORKS. Uniform edition. 17 vols. (by set in box), or separate volumes, $2 per volume.

CHAPMAN'S AMERICAN DRAWING-BOOKS. Complete. 1 vol. 4to, $4 50.

CHAPMAN'S AMERICAN DRAWING-BOOKS. In Six Parts. Each part complete, paper, 50 cents each.

BLUE AND GOLD BOOKS.

REDUCED PRICES.

PRAED'S POEMS. 2 vols., $2 50.

TUPPER. (Complete.) 2 vols., $2 50.

TUPPER'S PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY. 1 vol., $1 25.

POE'S POEMS. (Complete.) 1 vol., $1 25.

We have in stock a full assortment of our books in half calf and half turkey bindings. New catalogue in preparation.

W. J. WIDDLETON, Publisher,
17 Mercer Street, New York.

GOLDEN-HAIRED GERTRUDE,

THE CHOICEST OF JUVENILE BOOKS.

BY

THEODORE TILTON,

Editor of The Independent.

Illustrated from original drawings by H. L. Stephens. Printed on heavy tinted paper of finest finish. Nearly ready.

TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 Park Row, N. Y.

OUR MARTYR PRESIDENT.

Now Ready, Price $2,

AGENTS WANTED.

STIER'S WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

HEARTHSTONE SERIES.

SCHÖNBERG-COTTA WORKS.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL BOOKS.

A complete library can be made up from our stock, which includes the lists of all the societies of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.

Terms as low as can be had of the publishing houses.

BOOKS FOR SALE BY

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus,	Barnes' Notes,
Lange's Commentary on Matthew,	Bush's "
Knapp's Christian Theology,	Jacobus' "
McKnight on the Epistles,	Edwards' Works,
Home's Introduction,	Woods' "
Alexander's Commentary,	Kitto's "
Hodge's "	Shedd's Christian Doctrine,
Olshausen's "	Schaff's Church History,
Henry's "	Mosheim's " "
Benson's "	Eusebius' " "
Clark's "

Also, a great variety of Theological Works, Sermons, etc. A liberal discount to ministers

TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 PARK ROW, New York.

BABBITTONIAN PENMANSHIP.

"The Babbittonian system is cheap at four times its price."—Halifax Reporter.

"Superior to all other systems."—E. B. Rice, of the New York Custom House, and formerly Prof. of Penmanship at the State Normal School at Albany.

"It has already become famous."—N. Y. Dispatch.

"Is being ordered by the thousand at a time."—Cin. Gazette.

"The latest invention and the best. By its aid any one twelve years old may become a first-class penman without schools or teachers."—Christian Herald.

"Much more economical for school use than the twenty-cent copy books, and must succeed."—Md. School Journal.

"Beautiful copies for practice."—Scientific American.

"The most beautiful and scientific of systems, worth $5 instead of $1 50."—Journal and Messenger.

"We think we do the public a favor by commending the beautiful system of Babbittonian Penmanship, which has the right and wrong forms of all writing so fully explained that the student may become a skilful penman without the aid of the living teacher."—Hodge's Journal of Finance.

The whole system, consisting of 92 copies, on card-board slips, illustrated by 60 Wood-cuts and a Chart, including Elements, Elementary Flourishes, Fine Hand, Capitals, Ladies' Styles, Business and Epistolary Forms, etc., sent, post-paid, for $1 50. 36 beautiful Babbittonian Pens sent for 50 cents; one gross for $1 50; or, 72 pens and the Penmanship for $2. Address

BABBITT & WILT, 37 Park Row, N. Y.

NEW AND EXQUISITELY TOUCHING MUSIC.

WE NEVER CAN FORGET; or, The Memories of Andersonville Prison Pens. Words by Mrs. M. A. Kidder.

Music by Henry Tucker, author of "When this Cruel War is Over," and "Dear Mother, I've Come Home to Die."

Every soldier and every relative and friend of our tortured heroes should hear this exquisite and pathetic song.

Also just published: OUR SONG OF LIBERTY. 30c.

"BEAU MONDE QUADRILLE," by H. B. Dodworth. 40c.

"GRAND INDIAN MARCH," from Meyerbeer's Africaine, by K. Trenor. 40c.

"WATER-LILY POLKA," by T. Moelting. 30c.

"ANGELS WHISPERING," by Chas. Fradel. 30c.

"THE GOOD TIME HAS COME, BOYS." 30c.

"THE COTTAGE ROUND THE CORNER," by Henry Tucker, beautiful words and delicious melody. 30c.

THE NATIONAL JUBILEE PRIZE SONG. 30c.

Any of the above popular songs mailed free on receipt of the price; two for 50 cents, or five for one dollar.

Published by W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, N. Y., and sold by all Music Dealers.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

NEW YORK,

HAVE JUST PUBLISHED:

1.

DRAPER'S AMERICAN CIVIL POLICY. Thoughts on the Future Civil Policy of America. By John William Draper, M.D., LL.D., author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," and a "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe." Crown 8vo, cloth, bevelled edges, $2 50.

2.

BRACKETT'S UNITED STATES CAVALRY. History of the United States Cavalry from the Formation of the Federal Government to the 1st of June, 1863. To which is added a List of all the Cavalry Regiments, with the Names of their Commanders, which have been in the United States Service since the breaking out of the Rebellion. By Albert G. Brackett, Major First United States Cavalry, Colonel Ninth Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, late Chief of Cavalry of the Department of Missouri, Special Inspector of Cavalry Department of the Cumberland. With Illustrations. 12mo, cloth, bevelled edges, $1 75.

3.

CAN YOU FORGIVE HER? By Anthony Trollope. Illustrated by Hablot K. Browne. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2 00.

4.

THE OIL REGIONS OF PENNSYLVANIA: Showing where Petroleum is Found, how it is Obtained, and at what Cost. With Hints for Whom it may Concern. By William Wright. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

5.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to July, 1865, and a Map embracing Colored Routes of Travel in the above Countries. By W. Pembroke Fetridge. Fourth Year. Large 12mo, leather, pocket-book form, $5 00.

6.

THE STORY OF THE GREAT MARCH: Diary of General Sherman's Campaign through Georgia and the Carolinas. By Brevet Major George Ward Nichols, Aide-de-Camp to General Sherman. With a Map and Illustrations. 12mo, cloth, bevelled edges, $1 75. (A New Edition Nearly Ready.)

7.

CARRY'S CONFESSION. By the author of "Mattie: a Stray." 8vo, paper, 75 cents.

8.

NAPOLEON'S LIFE OF CÆSAR. The History of Julius Cæsar. By His Imperial Majesty Napoleon III. Vol. I. A new Elegant Library Edition, with Wide Margins, on Superfine Calendered Paper, with Portrait and Colored Maps. 480 pp. 8vo, cloth, $2 50. (This is the only Edition with the Maps.)

9.

DENIS DONNE. By Annie Thomas, author of "Theo Leigh," "On Guard," etc. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

10.

THEO LEIGH. By Annie Thomas, author of "Denis Donne," "On Guard," etc. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

11.

ON GUARD. By Annie Thomas, author of "Theo Leigh" and "Denis Donne." 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

12.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ROME. A Smaller History of Rome, from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Empire. By William Smith, LL.D. With a Continuation to A.D. 476. By Eugene Lawrence, A.M. Illustrations. 16mo, cloth, $1 00.

13.

BELIAL. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send the above books by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States on receipt of the price.

VALUABLE SCHOOL BOOKS,

PUBLISHED BY

IVISON, PHINNEY, BLAKEMAN & CO.,

48 and 50 Walker Street, New York.

SANDERS'S READERS AND SPELLERS, conforming in Orthography and Orthoëpy to the latest editions of Webster's Dictionary.

THE UNION SERIES OF READERS, entirely new in matter and illustrations.

ROBINSON'S SERIES OF MATHEMATICS, including Arithmetics, Algebras, Geometries, Surveying, etc.

KERL'S NEW SERIES OF GRAMMARS, unsurpassed in simplicity, clearness, research, and practical utility.

COLTON'S SERIES OF GEOGRAPHIES. The New Quarto Geography, just published, surpasses anything of the kind before the public.

SPENCERIAN PENMANSHIP, simple, practical, and beautiful.

BRYANT, STRATTON, AND PACKARD'S BOOK-KEEPING SERIES, beautifully printed in colors.

WELLS'S NATURAL SCIENCES, including Philosophy, Chemistry, Geology, and Science of Common Things.

☞ Teachers and School Officers are invited to correspond with us freely, and to send for our Descriptive Catalogue and Special Circular, which will be promptly sent upon application.

BOOKS!! BOOKS!! BOOKS!!

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS,

PUBLISHERS AND BOOKSELLERS,

PHILADELPHIA, PA.,

Take pleasure in calling the attention of the public to their choice and extensive stock of books, comprising a collection of the most popular and choice, in all styles of binding, by the favorite authors. For the convenience of Book-buyers and those seeking suitable Works for Presentation, great care is taken in having a large and varied collection, and all the current works of the day. Show-counters and shelves, with an excellent selection of standard illustrated and illuminated works, varying in price to suit all buyers, are available to those visiting the establishment, where purchases may be made with facility, and the time of the visitor greatly economized. Here may be seen not only books of the simplest kind for children, but also exquisite works of art, of the most sumptuous character, suitable alike to adorn the drawing-room table and the study of the connoisseur. Catalogues are supplied and sent post free on application, and great attention is paid to communications from the country, and the goods ordered carefully packed and forwarded with expedition on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

ORDERS SOLICITED. ADDRESS

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS,

306 CHESTNUT STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

Books sent free of postage on receipt of retail price. All the New Books for sale at Peterson's.

SEPTEMBER NUMBER OF

DEMOREST'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE

Contains a brilliant display of Fall Fashions; a fine Steel Engraving of Mount Tom; Portrait of General Meade; New Music, "Grand Festival March," by Charles Fradel; an original and splendid Poem by George W. Bungay, illustrated; the continuation of Miss Virginia Townsend's splendid Story, "Ruth Dexter's Better Days:" also, "The Minister's Wife," by Anna Raymond, and other stories. Also, Household Matters, Architectural Designs, and many other literary novelties, with our usual $1 worth of full size Patterns, etc., all for 25 cents. Yearly, $3, with a valuable Premium. Universally acknowledged the Model Parlor Magazine of America. Single copies, as specimens, mailed free on receipt of 25 cents. Back numbers 10 cents. Address

W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, N. Y.

NEW ERA IN THE STUDY OF THE CLASSICS.

ALL THE LATIN PROSE REQUIRED FOR ENTERING COLLEGE IN ONE VOLUME.

A PREPARATORY LATIN PROSE BOOK,

CONTAINING

All the Latin Prose necessary for entering College, with references to Harkness's and Andrews and Stoddard's Latin Grammars; Notes, Critical and Explanatory; a Vocabulary, and a Geographical and Historical Index.

A NEW EDITION,

CONTAINING, IN ADDITION TO THE ABOVE,

A quantity of Easy Prose Selections, designed to supply the place of a Latin Reader; also, additional Prose Matter especially prepared for, and adapted to, the Introductory Course of Latin Prose at Harvard University.

Thirteenth Edition, Enlarged and Improved.

By J. H. HANSON, A.M.,

Principal of the Waterville Classical Institute.

12mo, pp. 900, price $3 00.

Probably no work has for a long time been issued which has so completely met the wants of students as this happily conceived volume of Mr. Hanson—comprising in one book all the Latin Prose required for entrance into any of our Colleges; the Text, the most approved; References, to the two best Grammars in use; Notes, brief and to the point, giving aid where it is needed, and yet not doing the pupil's work for him; a full Vocabulary, with other great merits. It has received the approval of a large number of eminent professors and teachers, and has been introduced into many of our best schools and colleges.

PRESIDENT CHAMPLIN, of Waterville College, pronounces it "a work of great merit. . . . The book cannot fail of being favorably received by classical teachers."

And S. H. TAYLOR, Principal of Phillips Academy—high authority in everything pertaining to the subject—says: "No book of the kind has appeared which is better adapted to lay the right foundation for a thorough knowledge of the Latin language."

COMPANION TO HANSON'S LATIN PROSE BOOK.

A HANDBOOK OF LATIN POETRY,

FOR THE USE OF SCHOOLS AND ACADEMIES,

Containing Selections from Virgil, Ovid, and Horace; with Notes, critical and explanatory, and References to Harkness's and Andrews and Stoddard's Latin Grammars.

By J. H. HANSON, A.M.,

Principal of the Waterville Classical Institute,

and

W. J. ROLFE, A.M.,

Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass.

READY EARLY IN SEPTEMBER.

12mo, price $3 00.

Shortly after the publication of the "Preparatory Latin Prose Book," the author and publishers of that work began to receive requests from teachers in different parts of the country that a book of Latin poetry on the same plan might be prepared. The "Handbook of Latin Poetry" is the result of an effort to meet this popular demand.

The book comprises—from Virgil the first six Books of the Æneid, the first two Books of the Georgics, and six of the Eclogues; from Ovid, twenty-five Mythological Tales from the Metamorphoses; from Horace, more than fifty of the Odes, the Carmen Sæculare, five of the Satires, seven of the Epistles, and the Ars Poetica.

The Selections from Virgil include more than is required for admission to most of the colleges in the country; and the Selections from Ovid and Horace, both in quantity and quality, are a full equivalent for the omitted portions of Virgil.

For Female Seminaries and Colleges, it is believed that the book will meet a want which has long been widely felt.

 Attention is respectfully requested to this valuable series, which, from its convenience, value, and economy, deserves careful examination.

Specimen copies furnished on receipt of one half the price.

CROSBY & AINSWORTH, Publishers,

117 Washington Street, Boston.

MITCHELL'S NEW SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY AND ATLAS.

ENTIRELY NEW—MAPS, TEXT, AND ILLUSTRATIONS.

Just Published, price $2 50.

MITCHELL'S NEW SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY—A system of Geography, Physical, Political, and Descriptive. One vol. small 12mo, 456 pages. Illustrated by 200 engravings, with tables of the principal cities of the world and their population, and a list of nearly 1,000 Geographical Words, with their explanation and meaning.

MITCHELL'S NEW SCHOOL ATLAS—A series of 44 copper-plate maps, compiled from the great atlases of Keith, Johnson, Kiepert, the Geographical Institute of Weimar, from the United States Coast Surveys, the Surveys of the War Department, and of the several States, and from other reliable authorities, drawn and engraved expressly to illustrate Mitchell's New School Geography, with important Geographical Tables and a Pronouncing Vocabulary of 10,000 Geographical Names found in these works.

EXTRACT FROM THE PREFACE:

"Geography is two-fold, physical and political.

"In the present treatise, these two elements of the science are combined and wrought into one consistent and harmonious whole. In the account that is given of every part of the earth, one uniform order is pursued. First, the Natural features are described, including the locality and size; the mountains, plains, rivers, lakes, seas, and generally whatever constitutes the surface, the soil and climate; the products of what the soil and climate produce and the minerals—all these coming under the head of its Physical character. Secondly, the Political features are described, including the population, as to race and descent, as well as to numbers; the manners and customs of the people, the capitals and chief towns; the government and religion, and, occasionally, important historical statements—all these coming under the head of Political Geography.

"The Atlas accompanying has the large number of 44 copper-plate Maps, numerous Geographical Tables, and a valuable and extensive Pronouncing Vocabulary of 10,000 names. The book is illustrated with 200 engravings, most of which are from original drawings of the objects represented. Attention is invited to the evidences of conscientious care which has been bestowed upon every department of the work—literary, artistic, and mechanical—to make it, if possible, in every way worthy of the present advanced state of geographical knowledge and of popular education."

Teachers, Educational Boards, and others are invited to examine this work. Copies furnished teachers for examination at half the retail price, post-paid.

For sale by Booksellers generally.

E. H. BUTLER & Co.,

137 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt or stamp.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE important series of publications known, from the name of their originator and projector, as "Bohn's Libraries," is not suffered to languish in the possession of its new proprietors, Messrs. Bell & Daldy. In fact, their purchase, involving the whole stock, stereotype plates, copyrights, etc., of the different volumes, was so large a one, that it is only by activity and attention to the interests of the series that a return proportionate to the outlay can be realized. Rarely has so much money changed hands in a single transaction connected with literature—the amount of the purchase being thirty-five thousand pounds, or, in our currency, at the present rate for sterling, about $260,000. More than five hundred volumes are contained in the different libraries. The first cost of them was considerably more than one hundred thousand pounds; but, as the current sale had paid for them and cleared the outlay incurred in their production, the sum disbursed by Messrs. Bell & Daldy represented the net profit and return for the enterprise and ability shown in the management of the undertaking. Among the new volumes now in a forward state of preparation are Coleridge's "Friend," for the Standard Library; Flaxman's "Lectures on Sculpture," with all the illustrations; and Clark's "Introduction to Heraldry," edited by J. R. Planché, both for the Illustrated Library. The volumes lately added comprise an elegant revised edition of Miss Strickland's "Queens of England,' with steel plates, in six volumes; Sir Charles Bell's Bridgewater Treatise on "The Hand;" Professor Craik's "Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties;" Southey's "Life of Wesley," etc.

—Industrial biography, or the lives of men to whom their country is indebted for the development of new sources of wealth and its attendant civilization, has but lately obtained a recognized place in English literature. A few years since it was in vain that any particulars were sought in the ordinary channels of information respecting the men who acted as pioneers in the progress of the useful and manufacturing arts. Now there is a change for the better, and the lessons afforded by the career of such men are earnestly dwelt upon for the benefit of those who have succeeded to the vast practical results of their predecessors' self-sacrifices and endurances. The subject was fortunate in being inaugurated by the beautiful and tastefully embellished works of Mr. Smiles, whose "Lives of the Engineers" first won the readers, by the elegance of its illustrations, whom it retained by the surpassing interest of its style and matter. Other heroes of industry have since found biographers, as Watt, Robert Stephenson, Brunel, Telford, etc., and we now see two rival lives of Wedgewood, the eminent improver of English porcelain and pottery, brought out, both candidates for popular favor at the same time. One is by Mr. Jewett, an artist and amateur, the other by Miss Meteyard, who has access to the family papers and correspondence. The first volume only has appeared of the latter work. In general effect of paper, printing, and embellishments, it is one of the most beautiful books ever produced in England. As appropriate illustrations, nothing can excel the classical elegance of the specimens given of Wedgewood's peculiar art. Like that of most inventors, the recital of his trials and troubles is full of interest; how well he was furnished with the iron will to overcome them is exemplified by the incident that he deliberately submitted to the amputation of his right leg to avoid some painful consequences following a severe attack of small-pox. In his intimate connexion with artists, and especially with Flaxman, he set an example to manufacturers that is only now commencing to be generally followed. The whole family was a remarkable one. Their liberality to Coleridge won his grateful affection and is commemorated in his works.

—Among the books that are promised us with some degree of confidence before Christmas, is one so long looked for that its appearance seems almost beyond ordinary calculation—the "Life, Letters, and Journal of Dr. Jonathan Swift," by John Forster. This work was announced originally as forming the introductory portion of a new edition of Swift's works, now become very scarce and dear in the most desirable impressions—those edited by Sir Walter Scott. Mr. Forster combines in an unusual degree literary talent with a capacity for what is usually called drudgery, or the minute investigation so useful in throwing light on dark portions of history or biography. His large "Life of Goldsmith," in two volumes octavo, which he unaccountably suffers to be out of print, exemplifies the possession of both these faculties, and we may be sure no available source of information will be slighted from which any probable elucidation of the Dean's character and conduct may be gained. There has been no noticeable addition to the stock of materials accumulated for this purpose by succeeding editors, since Sir Walter Scott's time, that the public have heard of. Dr. Wilde's "Closing Years of Swift's Life" is the only book of importance on the subject that we remember; but Mr. Forster's position will, no doubt, procure for him access to much in the way of private papers, correspondence, etc., that was inaccessible at an earlier time to former biographers. At all events, we may look for a lifelike picture of Swift, painted with the care and accuracy of a master, that will, for some seasons, make his name again a household word in the literature from whence the constant succession of novelties has temporarily deposed it.

—Among the commercial literary enterprises commenced in a hopeful spirit, at a time when, to many observers, the prospects of the country scarcely warranted the undertaking, none promises better success than Messrs. Scribner & Co.'s attempt to present to English readers a commentary on the Bible, on a scale of far greater extent and completeness than anything that the language previously afforded. It is mainly a version of the German work of the eminent divine, Dr. Lange, of Halle. He and the scholars associated with him in the task have lately completed the New Testament, and are now engaged on the Old. The commentary surpasses in thoroughness and exhaustiveness any former work of the kind, and is a model of conscientious labor, while, at the same time, it possesses all the characteristics of a fervid, impassioned, and poetical individuality. The whole of the sacred text (besides a new translation, various readings, etc.) is accompanied by a threefold commentary, critical, doctrinal, and homiletical, each under distinct and separate heads. The portion chosen to commence the American republication was St. Matthew's Gospel, under the editorial charge of Dr. Philip Schaff. So well has it been received, and so nobly has the religious world responded to the confidence felt in its support, that, though it forms a large royal octavo volume, and sells for five dollars, between three and four thousand copies have been sold in the first year of its publication. The remaining books of the New Testament are preparing by various eminent scholars and divines, and it is a feature of the plan to add to the completeness of the work by making use of any sources of information that may have escaped the original authors. The gospels of Mark and Luke, by Dr. H. G. T. Shedd and Dr. Schaff, will appear this fall. Prof. Tayler Lewis, of Union College, has the volume on Genesis in hand, and the whole work will be forwarded with the utmost speed consistent with the necessary care and accuracy demanded in such an undertaking.

—A publication welcome to the antiquaries who interest themselves in the old British story, and the philologists who study the most ancient existing European languages, is promised by Mr. W. F. Skene, a gentleman distinguished for his proficiency in Celtic researches, who has done more to disentangle the truth respecting the vexed questions of the date and origin of the Ossianic poetry than any who has preceded him. Its title is "Four Ancient Books of Wales, containing Kymric Poems attributed to Bards of the Sixth Century, with Introduction and Notes." The publishers are Messrs. Edmonstone & Douglas, of Edinburgh. The manuscripts whose contents it is intended to print and make available for purposes of study for the first time, are "The Black Book of Caermarthen," dating from the twelfth century; "The Book of Aneurin," of the thirteenth; "The Book of Taliessin," and "The Red Book of Hergest," respectively of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Few merely literary questions have greater interest than the authenticity and genuineness of these Welsh bardic poems. Of late years they were first used as materials for history by Sharon Turner, who, in a dissertation appended to his "History of the Anglo-Saxons," was supposed to have triumphantly vindicated their integrity. The severity of later criticism tends, however, to different results, and though the headstrong nationality of the Kymric and Celtic temperament has precluded anything like impartial discussion at home, outsiders have gone so far as to affirm that the claims to an early date of these poetical remains are unsupported by reliable evidence; nay, more, that the Welsh are not "ancient Britons" at all, but an intruding tribe from Armorica, whose arrival was probably coincident with the irruption of the Saxons, Jutes, and Angles into Britain in the fifth century A.D. The arguments in support of this opinion are singularly curious and acute, and have been put forth by Mr. Thomas Wright, in his late collection of "Essays on Archæological Subjects." Mr. Nash, in his classical work, "Taliessin and the Bards and Druids of Britain" (London, 1857), has well dissected the religious poetry of Wales. It remains to be seen whether the historical portions can support a searching critical scrutiny.

—Mr. Charles Knight, whose industry seems rather to grow than to suffer diminution with his advancing years, has no sooner completed his too brief autobiographical "Passages from a Working Life," than he commences a new work. "Shadows of the Old Booksellers" is an anecdotical and biographical sketch of the ancient men of "the trade," from the restoration of Charles II. to the close of the last century, and, of course, embodies much interesting literary anecdote. Mr. Knight's claims to be admitted among the worthiest of the band he commemorates need not wait for the recognition of posterity. They are universally admitted in his own generation. To many who consider the subject transiently, publishers may seem to be "like flies in amber," worthless themselves, but preserved by contact with more precious objects. This, however, would be but a very insufficient appreciation of the services actually performed by these foster-fathers of literature, whose influence for good has been too often exerted to their own loss and detriment, from their views being in advance of those current among the public, to whom they in vain appealed. Whenever the history of English literature is properly written, not the least interesting chapters will be those detailing the fortunes of the only "patrons" that Dr. Johnson ever wished to hear of. Mr. Knight's "Shadows" will be published by Messrs. Bell & Daldy, of Fleet Street.

—The admirers of Dante in Germany are prompt in their response to the national rejoicings which in Italy honored the sixth centenary birthday of the poet. On September 14, the anniversary of his dying day, a Dante festival is to be held at Dresden, with the object of concentrating in one place all those who have labored to naturalize the Italian poet in Germany, by whose labors there exist fourteen translations of the Divina Commedia into Teutonic speech. The meeting is called by four professors, headed by Prof. Karl Witte, of Halle. The objects of the proposed assembly are: the foundation of a Dante library, on the most complete scale possible; the establishment of a Dante periodical; and the preparation of a critical edition of Dante's smaller works, which even in Italy is still wanting. The periodical, it is proposed, should appear in German, Italian, French, and English, and the co-operation of lovers of the poet in all countries is especially requested.

—Mr. Palgrave's Arabian friends, the Wahabees, seem in some danger of being overtaken by the fate that has befallen the Burmese, the Javanese, etc., and now threatens the Japanese. No sooner had his journey proved the practicability of intercourse with them, than Colonel Pelly, the British resident at Muscat, determined to improve the acquaintance, whether with secret thoughts of "annexation" it is impossible to say. He set off, therefore, from the coast of the Persian Gulf, and, with a small party and by forced marches through the desert, principally at night, he succeeded in reaching the Wahabee capital in about two weeks. He was received with ceremonious, though distant, politeness, and the firmest resolution was expressed by the able sovereign on no account to enter into relations with any European nation, and most especially not with the English, whose fame for appropriating the territory of their allies had penetrated to the court circles of Riadh, the metropolis of the country, and produced a most intense dislike of any nearer connection.

—Prof. Hiram Corson, of Girard College, Philadelphia, who has already shown his acquaintance with early English literature by an edition of Chaucer's "Legende of Goode Women," announces an enterprise of greater magnitude in connexion with his favorite author. It is a complete "Verbal and Glossarial Index to Chaucer's Canterbury Tales," based on the text printed by the Percy Society, and accompanied by similar indexes to "Piers Ploughman," "La Mort d'Arthure," Gower's "Confessio Armantis," Wyclife's Bible, Spencer's Poetical Works, and Chapman's "Homer." It seems to be Prof. Corson's aim to supply for earlier English literature a manual similar to that furnished for the Elizabethan dramatists by Nare's most useful and entertaining "Glossary." His work will form a large octavo volume of 800 pages. The first edition will be delivered to subscribers only, at ten dollars a copy, by Mr. F. Leypoldt, of 646 Broadway. The undertaking deserves encouragement, and though of course in this country the compiler must rely on the best printed texts, without the advantage of consulting manuscript authorities—in the nation where such materials abound there seems little disposition to turn them to practical account, and the attempt of Prof. Corson is the more praiseworthy in consequence.

—We hope that the announcement of the purpose entertained by Mr. John R. Bartlett, of Providence, Secretary of State for Rhode Island, of forming a complete bibliographical list of all publications connected with the late rebellion, will induce possessors of such tracts, etc. (and especially of anything of the kind printed at the South), to communicate to him the titles and particulars of works of this nature. It is only by a union of effort that the completeness so valuable in a work of this kind can be secured. Mr. Bartlett's "Bibliography of the Rebellion" will make a handsome volume in octavo; his materials already comprise notices of nearly four thousand articles, including separate pamphlets, speeches, sermons, addresses, papers in reviews, etc. Since the invention of printing there have been but three eras—all of them times of civil commotion—so prolific as the present in paper and print, for the Reformation was too early, and the American Revolution too imperfectly supplied with the mechanical facilities necessary to carry the tide of publication so high. The first was the troubles of the Fronde in France. The fugitive pieces, satirical tracts in prose and verse, etc., produced on this occasion are known from the name of the prime minister as "Mazarinades." They have been well described in an excellent bibliography by M. Ch. Moreau; the total number extant is nearly five thousand. The Great Rebellion and Commonwealth of England called out the power of the press to an extent totally unprecedented. There exists no guide to, or account of, what was so produced, but the remarkable assemblage of the fugitive publications of the time, from 1640 to 1660, formed by the royalist, Bookseller Thomason, the collection and preservation of which is one of the romances of bibliography, is bound in 2,200 volumes, and contains more than thirty-two thousand separate pieces. It is now, as is well known, among the treasures of the British Museum. The French Revolution again opened the flood-gates for a deluge of printed matter. Much of it now, for the first time, assumed a periodical form. Several important collections have been made of Revolutionary literature, including newspapers, engravings, caricatures, etc., but the bulk of it was so immense that probably much has perished. The British National Library has procured, at different times, three such collections of very large extent; among them M. Louis Blanc has, for the past years of his exile, been studying the materials for his "History of the French Revolution." The most conspicuous collection was that belonging to the Duc de la Bedoyere. It was purchased last year entire for the Imperial Library for one hundred thousand francs. The catalogue (a very superficial list) makes a large volume in octavo.

—In a recent paper Sir John Bowring draws on the vast fund of his Oriental experiences and philological knowledge for information respecting the prevalence of literature and education in China. As, according to a learned professor now writing among us, a future Chinese state of civilization is the happiest fate in store for the most enlightened modern nations, any facts relating to the mother country become interesting. In the matter of printing, it is certain that the Celestials have had a great start over all the nations of the Western world. There is, in fact, no trace of its introduction, but it is always spoken of as a thing of course, and not as a novelty, as in A.D. 593, when a decree was passed for the recutting the wooden plates (or stereotyping, as we should say) of ancient works that needed preservation. In A.D. 982, the Chinese Scriptures, or canonical books, were engraved on wood, printed, and circulated all over the empire. In the next century movable types came into use, nearly five hundred years before they were known in Europe. The Imperial arrangements for printing have always been carried out in China on a magnificent scale. The Emperor Kanghi, whose reign began in 1662, had 250,000 movable types, engraved on copper and printed no less than 6,000 volumes. Kienlung, in 1773, ordered 10,412 works to be published, covering the whole field of Chinese literature. The entire system of the competitive examination of candidates for the government service is of Chinese origin, and has been immemorially practised.

—"A chiel 's amang you taking notes" is a warning that, in the words of Burns, might have been applied to us a short time since. Mr. Samuel Phillips Day, we learn, is about to publish an interesting volume, entitled "Women and Civilization," and for the more thorough treatment of his extensive theme has travelled in Italy, the United States, and Canada, collecting materials for its illustration. If Mr. Day takes his tone from the public press, we fear the fair sex will suffer. It is fortunate, however, for the cause of philosophical truth, that his mission was a secret one, and his object unknown, or the sturdiest purpose must have given way before the blandishments that would have assailed him. Mr. Day is favorably known to philanthropists by a former work on "Juvenile Crime, its causes, character, and cure."

—The forthcoming journals, diaries, and correspondence of Miss Agnes Berry will revive the memory of the two remarkable sisters who prolonged, almost to the present day, the social traditions of the last century. Of course, a series of letters by Horace Walpole forms a portion of the remains of the lady to whom he is said to have offered his coronet and fortune. The astonishing industry of the man who desired to be known to the world only as a busy trifler, is one of the most remarkable instances of human inconsistency that we know of. In their most condensed form, the published writings of Horace Walpole form about thirty closely printed volumes, and there must be many entire series of his letters to intimate friends, as Mr. Chute, Bentley, Grey, and others, no portion of which has been printed, if indeed they yet exist. Other writings by him are extant. His "Anecdote Book," a collection of all the good stories he had heard in society, remains in manuscript, but has been read by several literary men. The nature of its contents is said (how truly, we know not) to unfit it for the pharisaism of the modern standard of propriety, so that it is not likely to be published. The fate of Walpole's choice library was a hard one. Though a coxcomb in many things, he was not particular in the outward attire of his books, whose exterior often gave no promise of their intrinsic value. Though they were entrusted, with the other contents of Strawberry Hill, to the most eminent auctioneer of the day (George Robins) for disposal, his business had never lain among books, and the Strawberry Hill sale catalogue enjoys the distinction among bibliographers of being incomparably the worst ever made. The greater part of the books were tied up in lots of tens and twenties, and sold without any description, at nominal prices. For months they were found on the London stalls, and they are not unfrequently met with in this country. Walpole was fond of annotating his books in a thick heavy handwriting that does not seem to typify much readiness in composition. His manuscript notes in his copy of the "General Dictionary" of Bayle, etc., are printed in Messrs. Geo. P. Philes & Co.'s curious publication, "Philobiblion," from the book itself, which passed through their hands to its present owner.

—The publication of M. Talleyrand's memoirs is now said to be deferred for twenty years longer, contrary to his original intention, in accordance with which they should see the light about this time, or thirty years after his decease. By the bequest of his niece, the Duchess de Dino, they had come into possession of his private secretary, M. de Bacourt, and, on his recent death, were left to certain parties on the condition that they should still be withheld from the public. They are said to be very extensive, embracing memoirs proper, with appendices of documents, and an immense correspondence, extending over the most eventful half century of the modern world. They have been transmitted to England for safe keeping. Whether or not any Napoleonic influence has been at work to keep the contents still a mystery is unknown, as well as the real judgment of the Prince de Talleyrand of the great man whose fall was, in an important measure, owing to him; but there is no doubt that, if so disposed, many revelations damaging to the Imperial fame were at his command.

TWO LECTURES BY MR. RUSKIN.*

It is not always safe to trust to English criticism of English books. Criticism is less often right in England than in France or Germany, because it is less cultivated and holds a less considerable rank in literature. Although the English know what criticism is, and are not surprised by every discriminating award of praise and blame as often as are the Americans (who frequently assume that an intellectual effort is worthy of praise as such, and that there must be personal enmity or selfish motive behind any censure of it), they have, nevertheless, very often left the duty of criticism to those who are certainly unfit for it. It seems not to be held true in England that a critic needs a special gift and training to fit him for his work. The critical faculty is not duly recognized as a mental power distinct from others. On the contrary, the ruling seems to be that any one who can write cleverly can criticize; that the author of three or four popular (or unpopular) novels, of a volume of short poems, or of a lively sketch of travel, is a competent judge of literature, and often of art as well; and that the critical department of a literary journal is sufficiently well managed by half a dozen such authors, or, where articles are anonymous, by writers without even the poor qualification to judge that they have been judged themselves.

These remarks—which, if collated with published words of the few who have been excellent as critics in Great Britain, will be found too nearly like their thoughts to be very original—are immediately suggested by the notices in the British press of Mr. Ruskin's latest published book. But there are additional reasons why, in the case of this writer's work, we must distrust ordinary English criticism. Ordinary English criticism fairly enough represents the ordinary English mind, not, as it ought to, the best intellect and knowledge that the nation can spare for the task. And if the English people were not wholly unwilling to understand or regard what Mr. Ruskin has been saying to them these six years past about government, economy, and education, his writing would not now be the sad and almost hopeless protest against long established evil that it is. He has tried to point out some dangerous modern fallacies, and has had little other answer than to be called a dreamer even by those who certainly are not deceived by the fallacies he attacks. He has tried to teach his countrymen truths more evident, perhaps, in other countries than in his, but perfectly clear to thinkers there, and is denounced as unpractical and "un-English." He has appealed to love and truth and sense of duty in the consideration of questions of political and national economy, and has tried to show that these springs of action are to be used in the construction of systems of society and government; and is at once, and on every side, assured that not these things, but self-interest only, is the motive power of the souls of men.

The general English public is, therefore, somewhat in the position, as regards Mr. Ruskin, of one who refuses to be taught, and who thus compels the rejected but still resolute teacher to use more earnest exhortation and sharper reproof every day. Much of the criticism on this book in English periodicals is of the nature of the objections of an unwilling pupil to the regulations and discipline of a severe teacher. But unwilling pupils are not those whose opinions of their teacher we generally ask. In the case before us, as the hasty refusal to hear of the popular English mind has prevented the writer from being as useful as he might have been to the world at large, because changing for the worse his thought and speech, so, on the other hand, it makes the opinion on the whole subject of the hasty recusants of very little value. Those who, of a great deal of advice, at once reject the whole, are not the best judges of the value of the advice. It was not to be expected that the critics would thank Mr. Ruskin for his warnings or regard his prophecies. It is because they and their kind are resolutely indifferent to all such warnings and promises that these are made necessary. It was not to be expected that the critics would like his rebukes. It is at them and their kind that the rebukes are aimed. The teacher declares social abuses, denounces national sins, urges radical reforms, points out ways to improvement, is enthusiastic, severe, and bitter. All this the Saturday Review contemns; it declares the assertions false, the denunciations injurious, the proposed reforms Quixotic, the way untrodden and therefore impassable, the enthusiasm ridiculous, the severity impertinent, the bitterness morbid. We ought not to be surprised, still less to be influenced in our opinions. The Saturday Review could not have been expected to think otherwise. Were it possible for that journal to sympathize with or even to respect deep feeling and enthusiasm, there would be less need for these two lectures. But at least we cannot go, for just judgment of such work as Mr. Ruskin's, to the critics who faithfully represent what seems to us the worst defect of the English national character, its small capacity of sentiment.

Again, the Fortnightly Review, which aims to gather the best thoughts on all subjects of the men best qualified to discuss them, over the signatures of the writers, has entrusted the criticism of Mr. Ruskin's original, hearty, and (the word is his own) sensational protest to Mr. Anthony Trollope. We have nothing to do with the fitness of Mr. Trollope, as shown in his novels to judge anything original, hearty, and sensational; but his notice evinces a total lack of sympathy with the author he criticizes and even of comprehension of his meaning. The critic gives instance after instance of what he considers exaggeration and misstatement, almost every instance proving that he does not know what the author means nor what his object is.

We may have to return to these two "book notices" again or to mention others. For the present we draw this inference only from their insufficiency and inaccuracy: the inference that the lesson, though read to England, had better be studied by America for herself, without asking the help of her fellow pupil across the ocean.

We shall attempt no analysis of these lectures, for a sufficient synopsis of the thoughts of either would be too long, and would be, moreover, of a dryness injurious to the reputation of the essays with those who have not read them. The thought of the first essay is consecutive and orderly, but if it could be summed up in a few propositions, they would be these:

Advancement in life is the great object of most men, and there are various false notions about it. But there is no true advancement in life except the gaining of wisdom and the power that wisdom gives. Intercourse with the living great, who can give wisdom, is possible to but few persons; but there is a great world of the wise on our book-case shelves who await our pleasure. These are the real books, those, namely, which are written to last, others being a sort of reprinted newspapers. These real books should be studied with religious care, every word weighed, great pains taken to get at the meaning of every word; for it is important that we should know what the author meant to say, and not what we can imagine him to have meant. Moreover, we must enter into the feelings, as well as understand the thoughts, of these great men. It is in this matter of feeling (sensation or passion) that the great distinction lies between noble and base. And this is the important distinction both with individuals and nations.

So far the thought is harmless enough. That it sounds, in the dry statement above, not very original or brilliant, is not a matter of great regret; those who know anything of Ruskin's writings will imagine the wealth of illustration and allusion that clothes the skeleton into roundness and vital strength. So far the thought is harmless enough and can give no offence. But the application follows:

We (the English public) have forgotten how to read in our haste to make money and our thirst for amusement. There is still hope for us only because we can still fight and toil, and can still feel love and honor. We have despised literature; for we spend and are willing to spend more on horses, wines, eating, and jewelry than on books. We have despised science; for we, as a nation, do not help science at all, more than is actually needed for our ships, but leave private devotion to do all it can or will without help. We have despised art; for whatever we do for picture galleries and art schools is not from love of pictures, for which we care nothing, but from desire to have our manufactures excel others in taste, and, therefore, in salableness. We have despised nature, using the Alps as greased poles to climb, and the quiet valleys of England for furnaces and coal pits. We despise compassion; and this needs no proof except the newspaper paragraphs I read you. Our national will is to be amused, and the nation's work is left to classes whom we despise.

The true kings of the earth are those who rule by wisdom. And yet, wonderful as it is, kinghood is still spoken of as if kings owned their people and realms as a private man owns an estate. Where kings rule by wisdom, less money will go for war, nations will not buy panic of each other, as France and England do, for millions a year, the money will go to create libraries and museums and art galleries and places of rest.

Such, in brief, is the argument of the first lecture, "Kings' Treasuries." It is to be read with care, if read at all, and every word considered, for it is compact and careful. It cannot fail to teach those who are willing to learn. The second lecture is so beautiful, so true-seeming as well as true, that it is sure to be generally liked. It considers the position and influence of women, and the influence they should have, in the household, in society, and in the world; and the education which would best fit them for their duties. It is a most beautiful and suggestive statement of the true relation between man and woman, and the value of each to the other.

*"Sesame and Lilies. Two Lectures delivered at Manchester in 1864. By John Ruskin, M.A. 1, Of Kings' Treasuries; 2, Of Queens' Gardens." London: Smith, Elder & Co. 1865. Pp. 196.

We believe these and similar teachings of Mr. Ruskin to be exceedingly valuable, and hold their failings and faults to be of an importance very secondary to their positive value. But, however mistaken we may think the rejecters of such doctrine, the English people, so far as they reject it, are not, humanly speaking, without excuse. The fact that these sharp rebukes and this stern denunciation, however general in their application, are aimed, and confessedly aimed, at the English public, makes it not wonderful that they meet harsh words by words as harsh. Their excuse is one which may not avail to save them from the consequences of determined refusal to listen to warning and counsel, but it is one which no earthly judge has a right to disallow. No nation, at least, can fail to admit its force. Few people are willing to believe or even to listen to unwelcome truths, to acknowledge wickedness and folly for which they are sternly reproved, or to bow meekly to deserved rebuke. The American people has heard much good counsel, and has not only disregarded it, but has met it with downright contempt and abuse. From the time of the adoption of the Constitution until now, there have been those who, with eloquent and earnest words, have borne witness against our national sins. Have we listened? Have we even refrained from contemptuous recrimination? Were the abolitionists—even the gentler-voiced among them—regarded with favor when they warned us from courses undeniably evil, and showed us a future of inevitable catastrophe? It required actual war, and war for many months, to give us, as a nation, any perception of the facts they had often laid before us. They had often told us what slavery was, and what the spirit of the slaveholders; we boldly denied, or, more wise in our generation, avoided the question and confined our answer to hard words and denunciation. But two months before April, 1861, an American who had long been abroad landed in New York. Those who heard will still remember his exclamation, after a week's residence in this city: "These people to this day use 'abolitionist' as a term of reproach!"

But in this particular instance the English have this additional excuse to offer, that the advice is not conveyed to them in the words and in the tone which advisers generally find most efficacious and accordingly adopt, but in words of disparagement and with an air of grieved contempt. To the respect and admiration we feel for Mr. Ruskin, and the great debt of gratitude we owe him for his various and unprecedented labors in the cause of education, we join a sincere regret that he adopts the tone which injured his former treatises on political economy, and injures this volume yet more. It is one thing to say to the public, "This that you have done is unworthy a great nation," and another to say, "You are not a great nation because you have done this." It is true enough that the English people have not a general, natural, hearty love of art; and so it is true that the German love of art is nearly all formalist, and French love of art mainly technical; and it is true in general terms that this is a bad age for art, and contains only a feeble promise of better things to come. But to tell one of these nations that it despises art and cares less for Titians than for game in its game-bags, is unjust as well as unwise. It is true of a chain that it is not stronger than its weakest part; but it is not true of a nation that it is not better than its worst men, or wiser than its most foolish. It would be more nearly true to say that every nation, not in visible decay, is as good as its best men. But neither statement is true nor wise. We know only that ten righteous men can save a city, and that a few wise men will redeem the ignorance or folly of a land. England does not despise art while Mr. Ruskin's works are read and her great painters' works increase in influence and in value daily.

But it is certain that many English critics despise reasoning. The English educated class, we believe, is as badly misrepresented by its mouthpieces as this city by its "representatives." We cannot leave the subject without quoting from Mr. Trollope a passage curiously illustrative of the style of criticism out of which nothing comes but confusion and heavy ignorance. Mr. Ruskin illustrates the alleged national despising of science by the mention of a very discreditable circumstance indeed, and Mr. Trollope meets him thus: "He says that we have despised science, and proves it by showing that the Government has haggled at buying a collection of fossils for £700, as though the science of a nation depended on the propensities or means of the existing Chancellor of the Exchequer!" The critic does not see or suspect that his author is dealing with first causes, and considers neither officials nor times, but holds the nation responsible for national sins. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is perhaps not to blame, he is certainly not blamed, nor any subordinate, nor any person. But it is a shameful condition of things where seven hundred pounds are not to be had for the purchase of an unequalled and unique collection of fossils for the nation; and where, after the value of the collection has been admitted, a servant of the Government is compelled to give his personal security for a part of the purchase money, or else to see the whole treasure rejected. And for this wrong Mr. Ruskin holds his country responsible. England as a nation is disgraced by such a cold and unwilling ministry to science. "You have despised science," says John Ruskin, and while he is unwise, as we think, to say it, England is unwise and unjust if she refuse to heed it.

PERSIAN CHARACTERISTICS.*

THE position and medical activity of Dr. Polak, his uncommon knowledge of the native idiom and literature, and numerous journeys, frequently in company with the shah, enabled him to study Persian life and habits with an extraordinary minuteness and exactitude. The fruits of these studies he now lays before the public in a series of "ethnographic sketches," which, on account of their richness in detail and obvious truthfulness, cannot fail to occupy a prominent rank among productions of their kind, and to become a standard source of information on Persia and its people—"a nation whose glory, it is true, belongs to a remote past, but which has not yet grown old; but, on the contrary, seems destined to play an important part in the political and intellectual history of the future." He presents his sketches in a plain, unornamented shape. His object is to inform and instruct, not to amuse. He tries to divest himself of all prejudice in treating his subject, seems to form his observations only after mature experience, and puts down his remarks with a rather timid hand, being fully conscious of the danger of too hasty conclusions. He rarely descends beneath the surface of things, presents few striking comparisons or illustrations, and neither solves nor propounds any problems. But he communicates, in full descriptions, much that he saw and closely examined or enquired into himself; and his studies embrace the widest range of topics. Confining ourselves to a few of the latter, we shall endeavor, in the following, to present to our readers a miniature sketch of the character and social life of the modern Persian, condensed from various chapters of the volume before us. We refer to the Persian proper, in contradistinction to his co-inhabitants of different races of that vast and checkered country, the Turcomans, Kurds, Arabs, Armenians, Chaldeans, Jews, Afghans, and others.

Both in his body and character, the Persian fully displays the type of the Caucasian race. His complexion is rather dark; his hair chestnut color, and never curly; the beard well developed and thick. His head is oval; the forehead moderately high, flattened round the temples; the eyes are light brown,—exceptionally black,—large, and shaded by long upper lids and by arched brows, connecting over the nose; the cheeks little fleshy, and without redness; the lips thin; the chin is narrow. His neck is never long; his chest is broad; his hands and feet are exceedingly well shaped. He is generally of a little more than medium size; remarkably tall or small men are rare exceptions, as are also corpulence and its opposite. His features are serious and calm, never keen or distorted. He avoids gesticulation, and rarely betrays his feelings or passions in his look or face. His gait is erect and fine; his walk graceful. He is exceedingly agile, and capable of extraordinary exertions; but when not stirred up to activity, slow and inclined to rest and idleness. He walks little, hates standing, sits in the oriental way, is an excellent horseman, but also uses for riding the ass, the mule, and the camel. He wonderfully controls his sleep according to circumstances, sometimes dreaming away most of his time; and again, when zealously active, passing days and nights in unremitting labor. He is fond of comfort, but patient under privations, and suffers with equanimity heat and cold, hunger and thirst. He is composed under every change of fortune. He is fond of exciting drinks, luxurious, but exceedingly temperate in his food.

The Persian loves riches, pomp, and display. He is greedy of wealth, little anxious about the means of acquiring it; but when acquired, spends it profusely to satisfy his luxurious tastes. He pays excessive prices for horses, carpets, song, and dance; none is too high when his harem is to be enriched and adorned. Still, polygamy is not the rule, but the exception. He is fond of music, poetry, and theatrical entertainments; likes a florid style of eloquence and writing; speaks with elegance, but often sacrifices his thoughts to the charm of rhythm. He is pleasant in conversation, and overflowing with politeness and graceful compliments, even when speaking to his bitterest enemy; and never flatly refuses a demand, preferring a false promise to momentary rudeness. He is a born actor. He is equally prone to make fine professions and to forget them; always ready to offer presents, though rarely mindful to bestow them; inclined to hypocrisy, but not to fanaticism; apt

* "Persien. Das Land und seine Bewohner. Ethnographische Schilderungen von Dr. Jakob Eduard Polak, ehemaligem Leibarzt des Schah von Persien und Lehrer an der medicinischen Schule zu Teheran." Erster Theil. ["Persia. The Land and its Inhabitants. Ethnographic Sketches by Dr. J. E. Polak, late body physician to the Shah of Persia, and Professor at the Teheran School of Medicine." Part I.] Leipsic. 1865.

o commit treacherous and even atrocious actions when circumstances command it, though not cruel from nature. He practices extortion with one hand and charity with the other. He has compassion for animals as well as man. He is slavish towards his political superiors, domineering among his subordinates in office, gentle to his servants, never rude as a husband, affable and hospitable to strangers. He suffers oppression, though averse to all authority; but hoards wrongs, and strikes without clemency when opportunity offers. He is neither brave nor warlike, but resigned in the highest degree, in misfortune as well as death.

He is attached to his native place and to his province, but cherishes no love of country. Patriotism, in the European sense, is rare. The more intense is the attachment to the family and tribe. To their welfare and honor everything is sacrificed. An insult to one member is an insult to all. The needy are supported by the wealthy. The low are proud of the high. None is absent from his family without necessity. Children pay reverence to their father, love to their mother, vouch with their honor and property for each other. The betrayal of such trust is regarded as the highest of crimes. The desertion of a relative is almost unheard of. Families, in the widest sense of the word, live together in the same town quarters. Several combine in acknowledging the supremacy of a common chief. When rising to high dignities, he raises them all; with his fall, all sink into poverty; and what was but recently the richest and most envied quarter of a city, soon becomes a desolate place. Such changes, with individuals as well as families and tribes, are frequent. They do not surprise nor stun the Persian. Elevated by the sudden favor of the shah, he wonders only why this did not take place long before; deprived as suddenly of his position and wealth, he bows before the will of his master as if it were a decree of fate. "He has given it, he takes it." But he lives, works, and builds accordingly. He enjoys and labors for the present, leaving the future to the care of Allah. His palaces crumble away as rapidly as his greatness and power. His artificially irrigated gardens dry up with the sources of his wealth. Nothing is made, as nothing is expected, to last.

Nil admirari is in other respects, too, the firm maxim of the Persian. The creative power of God cannot surpass itself; the wisdom of the Greek philosophers, the sacred sublimity of the Koran, and the verses of Saadi, Hafiz, or Firdousi, he believes, will equally remain unsurpassed. And yet, though little inventive, the Persian is inquisitive and fond of innovations. He is addicted to speculation. Everything mysterious attracts his attention; every secret society excites his interest; every new sect finds numerous adherents. Among other associations, freemasonry was, some time ago, widely spread in Persia, penetrating into the very surroundings of the shah, and counting among its disciples numerous mullas (priestly judges) and seids (reputed descendants of the Prophet). But suspected, as every secret society is in Persia, of possible designs against the abuses of despotism, it was soon persecuted with the utmost rigor. The native sect of the Babis, among the tenets of which were communism and the emancipation of woman, found fanatical adherents of both sexes, but being accused of an attempt at the life of Nasser-ed-din, the reigning shah, was crushed with remorseless cruelty, the victims of which evinced, amid the most excruciating tortures, the invincible firmness of martyrs.

"Among the higher classes, and among office-holders and men of the pen, the so-called mirzas, secretaries, draftsmen, and revisers, as well as among the refined class of servants, one often meets with characters the prototype of which is so perfectly drawn by Morrier in his romance, 'Haji Baba.' The Persian has invented a particular name for them, calling them futzul, and their way of doing and acting futzuli. The futzul is a man who knows how to adapt himself to all possible circumstances, everywhere to find his emoluments, and to appropriate to himself, or, as the Persians say, 'to eat,' the wealth of others. He is pert and intrusive, knows all the news of the town, and also how to profit by it. Cringing like a worm before his superiors, he is full of arrogance to inferiors, and on every occasion makes them feel his authority. He lies from principle, speaks the truth only when it offers a particular advantage, spreads false news, intrigues and calumniates. He seeks to oppress by all possible means those who have rendered him important services, for he cannot afford to be grateful, nor brook having any obligations to anybody. He has learned some poems, knows how to cite a verse or an epigram, and has always an appropriate remark on hand. He accommodates himself to all stations of life, and is fit for every situation, from the position of a vizier to that of a groom. He asseverates every statement by an oath, and when caught in lying, he acknowledges it without shame."

Another less respectable, because more openly dangerous, class of persons is thus described:

"Lutis correspond to the rowdies in North America. They are men who recognize in the Lot of the Bible their patron saint, stroll about in the night in search of plunder or scuffles, drink and gamble, and are always ready to create a disturbance, sometimes for the fun of the thing, but sometimes also for their own benefit. They carry a Circassian dagger in their girdle; their caps they wear cocked. They can be found in every town and among all classes, but their principal ranks are composed of prize-fighters, dancers, showmen of monkeys, bears, and lions, and similar persons. To the most enterprising Lutis belong those of Tabris, Shiraz, and Ispahan. A European finds the protection of a few Lutis occasionally very useful."

The classes of the mullas, seids, and dervishes, all of which are shielded in their excesses by the pious reverence of the people, also abound in dangerous characters. In former times the mullas were distinguished for piety and learning, and many of them attained great eminence as writers. But by degrees they became demoralized by the immunities of their position, the abject reverence the people paid them, and the facilities for abusing it which superstition afforded. They are now generally regarded as rapacious, licentious, and exceedingly corrupt. On the other hand, it must be acknowledged that their opposition often serves as an effective barrier against the excesses of despotism. The "descendants of the Prophet," who form the fiftieth part of the entire population, belong to all conditions of society, but are recognizable by the blue or green color of their girdles or turbans. They are priests, office-holders, merchants, tradesmen, and husbandmen; but the impunity which they mostly enjoy before the law has produced among them a large number of sharpers, forgers, and scoundrels of every description. Europeans must particularly shun their contact. The class of dervishes, which, among its members, formerly included the noblest minds of Iran, and among them Saadi and Hafiz, is now equally degraded, but comparatively harmless. Vagabonds from indolence, which still procures them companions from among the sons of high and even princely families, and beggars by trade, they are still inimitable as ballad-singers and story-tellers, and, as such, remarkable for purity of language and elegance of style; but they lack higher culture. In their fantastic beggarly attire, they roam from province to province and from country to country, entirely careless about the morrow, and often ruined by the smoking of beng—everywhere enjoying a superstitious popularity, though they believe neither in Mohammed nor in Allah, but are mostly deists or pantheists. Some pretend to be alchemists, and sometimes succeed in cheating their adepts of considerable sums, with which they disappear.

There is no hereditary nobility in Persia, only a few chiefs of nomad tribes carrying back their pedigree to Timour, Genghis Khan, or even the house of Sassan. The word nejib (noble), which is often used, refers not to high descent, but to position in the royal service and association with dignitaries. Families gain and lose the honor of that title, or of that of khan which is bestowed by the shah, with fabulous rapidity. The nejibs and khans of yesterday are despised or forgotten to-day. The highest title belongs to the princes of the reigning Kajar dynasty. They are called shah tzadeh (royal descendants), and the word mirza (prince) is suffixed to their names. But only the descendants of Abbas Mirza are treated as princes and entrusted with governorships and other high and lucrative offices. The other lines of the progeny of Feth Ali Shah, which, in the aggregate, has multiplied in eighty years to upward of two thousand souls, live poor on scanty pensions, a burden to the treasury, despised by the people, degraded by idleness, and destitute of the warlike virtues, though not of the royal prejudices, of the Kajars. There are also some surviving descendants of the preceding dynasty: they are distinguished by the title of mirtzadeh (descendants of emirs). Individual titles, which are not attached to rank or position, but are bestowed by the shah on single dignitaries, are of endless variety, the dictionary being continually ransacked in search of new ones. Such are: the support, arm, purse, diadem, torch, tongue, etc., of the Government, of the crown, of the realm, etc. The word mirza, which is prefixed to names, in contradistinction to the suffix of princes, designates the most influential class in Persia. The mirzas are men originally belonging to all ranks of society—sometimes to the lowest—but who, by their skill in writing and reading, general aptitude for affairs, or particular talents, if not by accident have risen to high and lucrative state dignities, or otherwise to public importance. Viziers, secretaries of state, and other influential functionaries, are chosen from among them, and in such capacities their authority overawes even the princes of the blood, and directly or indirectly controls all affairs, civil or military. The officers of the army, distinguished by title according to their rank, are men without military education or habits, appointed by nepotism, and more intent on "eating" the salaries of the soldiers than on leading them to warlike exploits, and generally as cowardly as corrupt. The Persian material is good, but, both in war and peace, it is wasted by ill treatment, in the most shameless way. Slaves, mostly imported Africans, bought more for domestic ornament than use, are kindly treated, and protected against ill-usage by humane regulations.

It is owing chiefly to the circumstance that the Koran, which is allowed to be read only in the original, is accessible but to good Arabic scholars, and that all liturgical readings have to be performed in that language, and with a pure accent, that there exists any kind of priesthood in Persia, Islamism having originally known neither priests nor temples. Even now many a layman is seen ascending the roof of his house, and, with a clear voice, calling his neighbors to prayer. But, altogether, the religion of Mohammed was never deep-rooted in the hearts of the Persians. It has now become almost an empty formula. Everybody feigns religious faith and piety in public, but few of the educated, whether mullas or laymen, believe in the Koran. Some substitute for it the philosophical tenets of the numerous sects of the Sufis; others follow their own speculations. All, however, pretend to be Shiite Moslems, though, in certain circumstances, as during travels in Turkey or Turkestan, it is not regarded as a sin to assume, for a time, the mask of a Sunnite. Conversion to Christianity happens only under peculiar circumstances, and is never sincere. The Moslem mind revolts against the doctrine of the Trinity, and is little apt to conceive virtue and abnegation in the Christian sense. The civilization of the West is often admired, but rarely esteemed, and least by those who have lived in Europe. The general conviction of Persians returning from France or England is, that those countries are more corrupt than their own. And, yet, it is only the remoteness of Persia from the seats of occidental civilization which prevents the general spread there of modern science and culture, so susceptible is the Persian intellect, though not inventive, to new ideas and reformatory tendencies.

Modern Persian literature is decidedly inferior in its products to that of former centuries. There are numberless versifiers, but few poets, and the standard models of the golden age are not even well imitated. Poetry is either a trade or a pastime, never a vocation. The shahs are beset by beggar bards, have their poet-laureates, and make verses themselves. Nasser-ed-din is both a poet and a patron of literature. Children are taught Saadi's "Gulistan," learning its most striking epigrams by heart. Poems form the principal basis of education. Every respectable conversation must have its rich admixture of spirited or pointed quotations. The precepts of the Koran are studied with less reverence than the teachings of Saadi or Hafiz; its legends are not as well known as the fabulous tales of Firdousi. A good elocution and a fine florid style is what every man of culture tries to acquire; a lucid and chaste diction is rarely to be met with. Caligraphy is the constant study of everybody, from childhood to old age. Letters and notes are written with the utmost care and neatness. Mirzas carry a collection of writing materials attached to their girdle. For fine manuscripts or exquisite writing-samples high, sometimes fabulous, prices are paid. Printed books, in which the peculiar way of writing the Arabic letters cannot be well imitated, are less valued than well-executed lithographic works. Geography is generally taught according to the old Ptolemaic system; few scholars know its modern developments. Asia is tolerably well known from historical traditions and the experiences of travelling merchants, roving dervishes, and pious pilgrims. Of Europe, only the principal countries are known. History is a more favorite study, though acquired not less superficially. It generally begins with the conquests of Islam. Mirkhond's renowned historical work, "Rutzet es Safe," is to be found in every respectable house. A continuation to our times has lately been elaborated. Histories of Napoleon, after Scott; of Peter the Great and Charles XII., after Voltaire; and of Czar Nicholas, after Baron Korff, lately issued, are widely and closely studied, sometimes to the perplexity of Europeans, who are surprised to find themselves comparatively ignorant on those topics. Works on mathematical and other scientific subjects also circulate in manuscripts or lithographs. But instruction, in general, is still in a primitive stage, though private schools abound, and almost everybody learns a little, women not excepted.

The condition of woman in Persia is not as degraded as many Europeans believe. A picture of it, we know, would be necessary to complete our sketch; but the subject is too interesting to be treated in a few fugitive passages, and we find to our regret that our space is exhausted.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

William Shakespeare. By His Eminence Cardinal Wiseman. (Patrick Donahoe.)—The Works of William Shakespeare. The Globe Edition. Edited by William George Clark and William Aldis Wright. (Roberts Brothers, Boston.)—The lecture of the late Cardinal, apart from its never-wearisome theme, has a peculiar interest as the last intellectual effort of its author, who was not destined to deliver it in public, as he had expected to do, by invitation. He apologizes for attempting to discourse of a dramatist not one of whose plays had he ever seen acted or declaimed, but whom he knew by reading and study only. In view of this circumstance, the warmth of his tribute is, if not extraordinary, at least admirable, and, of itself, a striking proof of Shakespeare's power over the minds of men. Beyond this whole-souled appreciation and homage, there is little to remark in the substance of the lecture. It would be difficult at this day to present an original view of Shakespeare's genius, whose many sides have been illustrated by the writers of every civilized nation. The Cardinal dwells, particularly, however, on the marvellous subtlety with which the character of Hamlet is drawn, so as to have deceived the very elect, and to have given rise to an endless dispute about the reality of his insanity: a delineation which the lecturer prefers to suppose less due for its scientific accuracy to the poet's observations, than to his faculty of introversion. When we have added that the Cardinal writes like a good Englishman, placing Shakespeare in the highest niche in the pantheon of letters, and employs a chaste though ornate eloquence, which would scarcely have needed the polish it might, perhaps, have been destined to receive, we have nothing left to criticize but the plan in the appendix for a proper monument to Shakespeare. This was a national, and, in part, international edition of his works, magnificently printed and bound, and illustrated by the foremost artists of the time, chiefly British. It contains an ingenious classification of the plays in periods which would have afforded the latter the freest scope for their fancy—Egyptian, classical, mediæval, modern, etc. For one reason, at least, we may not be sorry that the Cardinal's design was not adopted: he wished this sumptuous edition to be accepted, without demurring, as the standard authority upon all moot points. This could not have been agreed to by scholars and commentators, nor would it have been the best way to arrive at the purest text, for it would have repressed the spirit of investigation, which has given us, on the one hand, the greatest triumphs of critical acumen, and, on the other, the most important discoveries of early editions. The publisher has dealt shabbily with the eminent prelate. His little volume appears to be only a re-print in book-form from the columns of a newspaper, with all the typographical inaccuracies retained. This negligent work is in singular contrast with the "Globe Edition" of the Messrs. Roberts, who have imitated their English original with praiseworthy fidelity. In one compact duodecimo, of 1,079 pages, the entire productions of Shakespeare are contained—the type being small but perfectly distinct, and the paper excellent. The features which distinguish this edition are, that there are no notes; that the most probable of several emendations is inserted without alluding to the rest; that where none is admissible, the lacuna is indicated; and that, for convenient reference, the lines of each scene are numbered. These qualities, together with the compactness of the volume, we are confident, will render it justly popular among all classes.

Memoirs of the Life of William Shakespeare, with an essay toward the expression of his genius, and an account of the rise and progress of the English Drama. By Richard Grant White. (Little, Brown & Co., Boston.)—This work deserves an extended notice, and has, in fact, received one already at our hands from the early sheets. Now that it comes before the public, we may correct the inadvertence which led us, in the first number of THE NATION, to confound the Memoirs with the first volume of the author's Shakespeare, which, likewise in press at that time, is now also ready, to complete the hitherto headless series.

The Works of the Right Honorable Edmund Burke. Revised edition. Vol. I. (Little, Brown & Co., Boston.)—Since of the contents of this volume there is no need to say anything, we can only remark that the typography and binding are of that excellent character which uniformly distinguishes the publications of Messrs. Little & Brown. The twelve volumes, which are to appear monthly, will form when completed a most desirable edition for the library.

Speeches of John Bright, M.P., on the American Question. With an Introduction by Frank Moore. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co.)—There is probably no foreign advocate of the American cause during the late war who has argued it so ably and with so little effect as Mr. Bright; though, of course, the unfruitfulness of his exertions does not, and ought not to, diminish his claims upon our gratitude. Some of the speeches reprinted in this volume are amongst the most eloquent of Mr. Bright's oratorical efforts, but he had made himself, long before the war broke out, so outspoken and uncompromising a champion of republicanism, that his utterances on American topics produced very much less impression than those of his less gifted but more practical and cautious fellow-laborer, Mr. Cobden. Mr. Bright is, we believe, on his way to this country, and those who wish to become acquaint ed with his labors in our behalf, as well as with his peculiarities of style, which for force and vividness, and often for splendor, has no equal in Eng land, cannot do better than run through the little volume before us.

The Magazines for September.—"Hours at Home" opens with an excellent article upon "The Dangers and Demands of the Era" on which we are now entering, pointing out—and it cannot be too strongly dwelt on—the general tendency in the flush of self-confidence begot by the war to overlook or make light of the evils which beset our social and political progress, and to imagine our republic totally exempt from the perils and difficulties which other communities have to encounter. It is gratifying to find a religious magazine, which aims at being popular, raising its voice against the prevailing spirit of self-gratulation and the prevailing impatience of criticism. The remainder of the number is excellent; the topics well chosen and well treated; but the editor seems to us to be overdoing in the matter of shortness. The rage for "short articles" ought hardly to be gratified at the expense of quality, and there is more than one topic taken up in the number before us which if not discussed at greater length were better let alone.

"Harper" contains about the usual quantity of entertaining matter and of "padding." "Miss Pink's First Season" is intended to be a satire on "society," and we hope society winces under it, but if it does it is more thin-skinned than we take it to be. "The Sketches of Social Life in China" are interesting, and the article on Milfort, a Frenchman, who was for twenty years head chief of the Creek Indians, is a valuable and entertaining contribution to frontier history of the end of the last and beginning of this century. More melancholy reading than the facetiæ of the "Editor's Drawer," we have not often lighted upon. The composition of such jokes must be an awful drain on any man's vitality.

The "Atlantic" preserves its usual features. It settles the question of Davis's wearing woman's clothes at the time of his capture, in an article by an eye-witness, entitled "Running at Heads." Mrs. Stowe continues her "Chimney Corner," and Mr. Mitchell his "Doctor Johns," and if we except the tales, the whole number may be pronounced very good.

The "United Service Magazine" is one of the most valuable results of the war, and the number before us contains an excellent article on retaliation, apropos of the Fort Pillow massacre, the treatment of prisoners, and the atrocities of the late Confederacy.

"Our Young Folks" maintains the character it has already won. Its large circulation is an encouraging sign of the times.

We have looked in vain through the "Federal American Monthly" to find any good reason for printing, publishing, or perusing it. The paper and print are very poor, and the literary matter is not worth criticism.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Mildred Arkell. By Mrs. Henry Wood.—Illustrated Life, Services, Martyrdom, and Funeral of Abraham Lincoln.—Illustrated Life, Campaigns, and Public Services of Lieut.-Gen. Grant.—Life, Speeches, and Services of Andrew Johnson. T. B. Peterson & Bros., Philadelphia.

Standish. A Story of Our Day. [Railway Library.] Loring, Boston.

History of the United States Cavalry. By Albert G. Brackett.—Can You Forgive Her? By Anthony Trollope. Harper & Bros., New York.

Die Reconstruction und die Neger. Von Ludwig Greiner. Verein zur Verbreitung radikaler Prinzipien, New York.

Memoirs of the Life of William Shakespeare. By Richard Grant White.—The Works of the Right Honorable Edmund Burke. Revised Edition. Vol. I. Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

A Critical Examination of Our Financial Policy during the Southern Rebellion. By Simon Newcomb. D. Appleton & Co. New York.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

THE

MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY,

COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.

JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.

CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE.

Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

B. C. MORRIS, President.

WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,

46 Pine Street, New York,

BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.

JOSEPH W. WILDEY, Secretary.

AETNA INSURANCE COMPANY, OF HARTFORD,

INCORPORATED 1819. CHARTER PERPETUAL.

Paid up Capital, - - $2,250,000 00

Assets, July 1, 1865, - - 3,850,351 78

Losses Paid in 45 Years, - $17,485,894 71

T. A. Alexander, Pres't. L. J. Hendee, Sec'y.

Jona. Goodwin, Jr., A. Sec'y.

Insurance against loss and damage by Fire, and of Inland Navigation.

NEW YORK AGENCY, 62 WALL STREET.

JAS. A. ALEXANDER, Agent.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000 00

Assets - - - - - - - - - - - - 1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.

PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

E. W. CLARK & CO.,

BANKERS AND BROKERS,

35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS, COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

VERMILYE & CO.,

BANKERS,

44 Wall Street, N. Y.,

GOVERNMENT LOAN AGENTS,

KEEP ON HAND, FOR

IMMEDIATE DELIVERY,

THE ISSUES OF

7.30 TREASURY NOTES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS.

We BUY and SELL all classes of GOVERNMENT SECURITIES at market rates ORDERS from BANKS and BANKERS executed on favorable terms, and with dispatch.

Also, receive DEPOSITS, and ALLOW INTEREST on current balances.

VERMILYE & CO.

BILLS ON LONDON

At Sixty Days' Sight and at Three Days' Sight, for sale by

WARD, CAMPBELL & CO.,

56 Wall Street, New York.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

New York, August 25, 1865.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Fourth National Bank, held this day, a DIVIDEND of FOUR (4) PER CENT. was declared out of the net earnings of the last six months, payable on the 1st of September, free from Government tax.

The Books of Transfer will be closed on and after the closing of business on Saturday, 26th instant, until the 1st day of September.

P. C. CALHOUN, President.

B. Seaman, Cashier.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,

108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital,	$1,000,000
Surplus, over	400,000

This Company insures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND INLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

If Premiums are Paid in Gold, Losses will be Paid in Gold.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
EDWARD A. STANSBURY, 2d Vice-President.
JOHN C. GOODRIDGE, Secretary.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,

56 WALL STREET,

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world.

The National Park Bank of New York.

CAPITAL - - - - $2,000,000. | SURPLUS - - - - $1,200,000.

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.

J. L. WORTH, Cashier.

New York, Aug. 21, 1865.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

Saturday A. M.

Trade has been very active this week. The business in dry goods, both domestic and foreign, exceeds anything ever before known in the experience of our oldest merchants, in the magnitude of the daily sales and the promptness of demand for nearly every description of goods put upon the market. The only hindrance to a much larger trade is the want of sufficient stocks of seasonable goods. The importations in August will probably be returned at about twenty-six millions, gold value; and the customs duties realized thereon by the Government, $13,190,400 in gold. Of this sum, the Treasury is believed to have sold about $7,000,000 for currency, at 143 to 145 per cent., in addition to $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 sold out of the July customs.

The sales of merchandize are well distributed over the whole country. The North-west is buying freely, and there is a large and prompt trade with New Orleans, Memphis, and the more recently opened Southern ports. North Carolina and Georgia are probably the best buyers, though a fair business is doing with South Carolina and Virginia. The arrivals of cotton now include shipments from the Florida ports, and goods are going in that direction in exchange for the proceeds of this cotton. The renewed commercial and bartering intercourse between the North and South, on and near the seaboard, is not without its favorable political and social influence. Our great hotels number very many Southerners among their guests, and, as far as we are advised, the general opinion they express is in favor of a complete restoration of the old state of feeling and of material interests between the two sections. Whatever drawbacks may show themselves to the early consummation of this result, growing out of a difference of view on the labor and suffrage questions, there is not the slightest belief or fear entertained by these people of a renewal of hostilities. War they have learned to esteem the last and worst possible remedy, and they are candid enough not only to confess the fact, but to place their future political and material fortunes before the country upon the liberality and generosity of the Federal Government, and the support of its action, whatever it may be, in the loyal States.

The market for money has been established at the reduced quotations noticed in our last report—5 per cent. to the brokers at call, and 6½ to 8 per cent. on mercantile paper, 60 days to 4 months. The demand is not active at these rates, while the bank return for the week shows an increased surplus of money for employment in the market.

Gold has not varied over ½ to ⅝ per cent. at any time during the week, and exchange on London has fallen to 109⅛ to 109⅜ per cent. in gold for Bank bills. This ease in exchange, while our importations are so active, excites remark, but we find that much confidence is felt in the future export of cotton, the accumulation of which in New York, New Orleans, etc., is far beyond the domestic demand.

The creditors of Messrs. Ketchum, Son & Co. held a meeting yesterday, to hear the state of their affairs, and to determine the mode of settlement or liquidation. Explanations were made by the senior of the house, and the recommendation of an examining committee of the best responsibility submitted, to the effect that 50 cents on the dollar cash by the 1st November, and 10 cents additional in 12 months, be taken as in full settlement by the creditors and the trusteeship dismissed. This was agreed to by the creditors present, and will no doubt be carried out as the best composition under the circumstances. The debts are $3,985,685, including a questionable claim of $250,000; the assets, $3,093,639, including $243,500 disputed. The settlement proves less favorable than looked for last week. It transpired at the meeting that two of the young partners, Mr. Belknap and Mr. Swan, were some three months ago aware of the wrong-doing of young Ketchum to his own firm, and as early as the 4th of June remonstrated with him, when he promised to close up his private speculation. Instead of which, he went deeper into stocks and gold to recover his previous losses, and finding his depredations on the house watched, and threatened with exposure, he resorted on the 27th of that month to the famous gold check-book, from the Bank of New York. On the 4th of August he was again warned by these young partners, and the 15th named as the latest time they would delay exposure, if restitution was not made or reform entered upon. On the 14th, the forgeries were discovered by other parties; Ketchum left the Street; and the house, which might have been saved on the 4th of June by the compulsory withdrawal of the wrong-doer, was ruined. The motives of these young men were probably good; their judgment was greatly at fault, their forbearance misplaced, and the result of this first blunder fatal to all concerned. Young Ketchum was not then a forger. He had played the wrong-doer only in or to his own house. His abstractions of securities were even then large, but with the high credit and private wealth of Mr. Morris Ketchum, the loss might have been recovered; and half the reticence shown by those young partners to shield Edward Ketchum, if exercised in a more laudable direction, would have kept the mercantile world ignorant of a peril to the house not then beyond redemption.

In the case of Mumford, the Police Court has discharged him from arrest, on the ground that his checks were drawn on a bank in which he kept an active account, and in this he made large, though insufficient, deposits on the day of his default. This throws his deeply-wronged creditors on the civil courts, and leaves the brokers of the Stock and Gold Exchanges without penal remedy in cases of fraud growing out of the receipt of checks not marked good at the bank before the delivery of their property.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The original U. S. 5-20s current in Europe continue firm at 106⅝ to 107 per cent. The 5-20s have been in free supply, but are gradually absorbed at 104⅝ to 105 per cent. The 6 per cents of 1881 have improved to 107½ per cent. The 10-40s paid their September dividend yesterday, 2½ in gold, equal to 3⅝ in currency, and now sell at 94⅜ to 94½, ex dividend. The 7.30 currency loans are all steady at 99⅜ to 99½. The one year certificates are wanted at 98½. It is stated that the redemptions of the 1864 issue are more rapid than the use of the new 1865s. There is a demand for the compound interest legal tenders at 105 for the notes of June, 1864, and 102⅝ to 102¼ to 101 for July, August, and October, 1864, notes.

STATE SECURITIES.

Tennessees have further advanced to 75 per cent. North Carolinas have been sold at 71⅛ per cent. New York State 7s Bounty Scrip, 98⅜ and interest

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The Ohio and Mississippi certificates, which are to represent the common stock of the road when relieved of its receivership, have gone up from 24 to 28 cents on the dollar, and are in large demand. The calculation is that the Atlantic and Great Western Company will ultimately control the property, as the extension of their broad gauge road from Cincinnati to St. Louis. The certificates of the Eastern and Western Divisions amount altogether to about $22,000,000. They sold last year at 60 to 65 cents on the dollar, when gold was 200 to 250 per cent. The share list is ⅛ to 1 per cent. less firm on Erie, 87 down to 86 to 86⅛; N. Y. Central is ⅛ per cent. better, 92⅛ to 93; Reading has advanced from 105⅝ to 106⅜; Michigan Southern, 63⅜ to 65⅛; Michigan Central, 106⅛ to 108⅛; Pittsburg, 70⅛ to 72⅛; North-west, 27⅛ to 28⅛; North-west preferred, 62⅜ to 63⅝; Fort Wayne, 95⅛ to 97½; Rock Island, 106⅛ to 108⅛. The market firm at close of week.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

The bank stocks continue to show recovery. The Pacific Mail Company have secured the Government subvention of $500,000 for a steam line between San Francisco and China and Japan. They are to build four new steamers, and the contract to commence on 1st January, 1867. The Atlantic Mail Company have placed a much-needed new steamer on the Aspinwall route to California. Both stocks are steady. Canton are firm. Cumberland have further improved 2 per cent.; Mariposa, 1 per cent.; and Quicksilver has gone down 2 per cent. on the over production of the mine—an unusual complaint of mining enterprises. It is known, however, that there is a limit to the world's use of quicksilver, and that the New Almaden is now found to be rich and productive beyond all previous conception or calculation. The Brunswick Land Company is inactive, and the shares below $10 again.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Gold is 144½ as against 143¾ last Saturday. Bills on London, 109¼ to 109½ per cent. for this day's packet. They sold as low as 109⅛ for the Boston packet of Wednesday.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

Celebrated Gold Medal

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,

AND

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL.

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,

1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of
GIFFARD'S INJECTOR,
For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

FINKLE & LYON'S

IMPROVED

LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

GARDEN & CEMETERY ADORNMENTS.

FOUNTAINS, VASES, ETC., ETC.

SUMMER HOUSES,

ARBORS, CHAIRS, SETTEES, ETC.

Wire Trellises and Arches

FOR VINES, FLOWERS, ETC.

IRON FURNITURE,

Bedsteads of every description

For Dwellings, Public Institutions, Hospitals, Prisons, etc.

Patent Spring Beds, Mattresses, etc.

STABLE FIXTURES,

Hay Racks, Mangers, Stall Divisions, etc.

IRON RAILING,

For enclosing Cemetery Plots, Offices, Dwellings, Public Squares, etc.

Having purchased the business of the New York Wire Railing Company, HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM late Agents, we are now the exclusive Owners and Manufacturers of

Patent Wire Railing & Farm Fencing, Window Guards, etc.,

And we offer to the public the largest variety of ORNAMENTAL IRON GOODS to be found in the United States.

Particular attention given to Export trade.

CHASE & CO.,

Warerooms 524 Broadway,

OPPOSITE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, NEW YORK.

Great Improvements in Sewing Machines.

EMPIRE SHUTTLE MACHINE!

Salesrooms, 536 Broadway, N. Y.,
250 Washington Street, Boston.

This Machine is constructed on entirely new principles of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements, having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION COMBINED.

It has a straight needle perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither RIP nor RAVEL, and is alike on both sides, performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nansook Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is

EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE!

AGENTS WANTED where none are established, to whom a liberal discount will be given.

T. J. McARTHUR & CO.,
Manufacturers and Proprietors,
536 Broadway, N. Y.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!

Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees

IN EVERY STYLE,

MANUFACTURED BY

ROBERT PATON,

24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH

B. T. BABBITT'S

Pure Concentrated Potash,

OR READY SOAP-MAKER.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.

B. T. BABBITT,

64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

T. G. SELLEW,

MANUFACTURER OF DESKS AND OFFICE FURNITURE,

107 FULTON ST., near NASSAU ST., N. Y.

LIBRARY AND SCHOOL FURNITURE MADE TO ORDER.

Archer & Pancoast,

9, 11, 13, 15, AND 17 MERCER STREET, NEW YORK,

Manufacturers of Gas and Coal Oil Fixtures, Chandeliers, Pendants, Brackets, Lamps, etc., etc., for home trade or exportation, as also the Patent Convex and other Lanterns for burning coal oil without a chimney.

Dealers are respectfully invited to examine our goods. Warerooms and Manufactory, 9, 11, 13, 15, and 17 Mercer Street, New York.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,

45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS,

AND

BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

STATIONERY.

TO STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS, AND NOTION DEALERS.—The undersigned, being the oldest envelope manufacturers in this country, and having the amplest facilities, are always ready to supply, by the thousand or by the million, envelopes of every variety of size, pattern, and color, at the lowest prices.

Samples furnished when called for.

WM. P. LYON & WHITTEMORE,
537 Pearl St., New York.

W. H. Schieffelin & Co.,

SUCCESSORS TO

SCHIEFFELIN BROTHERS & CO.,

Importers and Jobbers of

DRUGS,

Indigo, Corks, Sponges,

FANCY GOODS, PERFUMERY, ETC., ETC.,

170 and 172 William Street, N. Y.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

CRUSHERS AND PULVERIZERS,

FOR WET OR DRY WORKING,

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BOSTON MILLING & MANUFACTURING CO.,

105 STATE STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Miners should not purchase machinery before seeing, or sending their friends to examine, the practical working of this series of machinery.

☞ The Whirling Table, or Crusher, weighs less than two tons, and crushes from ten to twelve tons of ore per hour to fine gravel, or two hundred and fifty tons in twenty-four hours.

The Pulverizer weighs two tons, and pulverizes to dust, infinitely finer than stamp work, one ton of ore per hour, or twenty-four tons per diem, equal to the yield of twenty-five or thirty stamps; and the first cost and wear, as compared to this number of stamps, is about one-tenth;—the entire yield being fit for amalgamation without further reduction. The fine dust is not obtained by screening, but by the immediate action of the Pulverizer.

Fifteen horse-power, net, is the maximum power required for one machine.

The cost of the wear, per ton, is less than by any other machine. All wearing parts are now made of Franklinite iron.

Let miners and their friends carefully study the practical working of all other machines and processes offered, and then see ours working in East Boston, Mass. We ask only this.

All of our machines are now made in our own shop. No CONTRACT WORK.

OFFICERS OF THE COMPANY:

President—HORATIO R. STORER.
Gen. Agent and Treasurer—JACOB J. STORER.
Consulting Engineer—JAS. D. WHELPLEY.

DIRECTORS:

John A. Blanchard, Benjamin P. Cheney, Bradley N. Cumings, Ichabod Goodwin, Horatio R. Storer, Jacob J. Storer, James D. Whelpley.

Agent in New York,

CHAS. H. GARDNER,
16 CORTLANDT STREET.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,

Importers and Dealers in

TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;

Manufacturers of

COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,

19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

DECKER BROTHERS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PIANO-FORTES.

FACTORY AND WAREROOMS,

91 BLEECKER STREET,

(MARBLE BUILDING,)

One block west from Broadway,

NEW YORK.

MARVIN'S

PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.

Superior to any others in the following particulars:
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by

MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.

Send for a descriptive Circular.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

DEMULCENT SOAP,

FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,

FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.

MANUFACTURED ONLY BY

J. C. HULL'S SON,

32 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Benedict's Time,

171 BROADWAY, COR. CORTLANDT ST., NEW YORK.

TO SOLDIERS.

AMERICAN (WALTHAM) WATCHES.

Let every soldier, before he returns home, provide himself with an AMERICAN WATCH; no better use can be made of money than to invest it in one of these durable and accurate time-pieces. It is a kind of property that constantly returns good interest, and its money value is so well-known that a pocket full of silver dollars wouldn't be as useful.

For sale and warranted by

BENEDICT BROTHERS, Jewelers,
Keepers of the City Time, and Agents for the sale of the American (Waltham) Watches,
171 Broadway, cor. Cortlandt St.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,

STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

OAKLEY & MASON,

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS,

AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

21 MURRAY STREET,

OLD STAND OF PRATT, OAKLEY & CO.,

Between Broadway and Church Street, New York.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines

FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.

THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,

ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,

629 BROADWAY.

Agents wanted.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,

625 BROADWAY, N. Y.,

MAKE THE

LOCK-STITCH,

and rank highest on account of the elasticity, permanence, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching, when done, and the wide range of its application.—Report of American Institute.

CARTER, KIRTLAND & CO.,

Manufacturers and Jobbers of

CLOTHING,

340 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK,

OFFER TO FIRST-CLASS BUYERS A LARGE AND VERY COMPLETE STOCK OF

FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING

OF ALL GRADES,

EMBRACING FINE, MEDIUM, AND LOW-PRICED GOODS.

Having made extensive purchases at a time when all were sellers and very few were buyers, we are in a position to supply our customers upon the most favorable and advantageous terms.

Jobbers, Merchant Tailors, and Dealers generally will find it to their advantage to call and examine our stock before purchasing.

Particular attention paid to the execution of orders.

SAM'L CARTER, WM. H. KIRTLAND,
JOHN ROSE, CHAS. B. PEET,
JOHN H. WERTS, Special.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.

New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.

HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. / 42 JOHN STREET, New York.

Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.

CAUTION.

These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

Economical Housekeepers Use

PYLE'S SALERATUS. | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.

Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.

ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.

"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.

"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.

"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.

"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.

Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.

WM. B. BRADBURY,
425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 11. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1865. $3 PER ANNUM

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 321

Will the Freed Negro Race at the South Die Out? 325
A Lofty Enterprise 327
Corporations and the People 328
General Lee as an Instructor of Youth 329
The Rules of Evidence in Alabama 330
Councils and Conventions 330

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Southern Whites 331
Small Savings 332
Haldeman's Affixes 332
The South as It Is 333
English Feeling towards America 336
The Break Up 337

LITERATURE:
Literary Notes 341
Mr. Parkman's Historical Narratives 344
The Schönberg-Cotta Family 344
Jesse H. Jones on Sir William Hamilton 345
Military Surgery 347

FINE ARTS:
The Drama 347

FINANCIAL REVIEW 349

Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

THE public debt on the 31st of August, we are informed from the Treasury, amounted to $2,757,689,570, against $2,757,253,275 on the 31st of July; showing the very moderate increase of $436,295 in the month just elapsed.

AN enquiry into the conduct of Judge Coursol and Chief of Police Lamothe was ordered by the Canadian authorities, soon after the disgraceful termination of the legal proceedings arising out of the St. Albans raid. The report of the commissioner, Mr. Torrance, has been published. As to Lamothe, he decides that he committed an indictable offence in refusing to execute the warrant of arrest issued against fourteen of the raiders by Justice Smith, and condemns him for surrendering the money. As regards Coursol, he says that if Coursol, as he maintains, sat as a judge, his hasty order discharging the prisoners from the custody of the Government officers, after deciding that he had no jurisdiction in the case, was "a grave dereliction of duty in a matter of national importance." If, however, Coursol had jurisdiction, his discharge of them was "more than a grave dereliction of duty." If he did not sit as a judge, but as a justice of the peace—which Coursol denies—Mr. Torrance decides that he is indictable for malfeasance in office. So that if he acted as a judge, he is liable to removal; if as a justice of the peace, to trial and punishment. The public here will now expect that one or the other of these fates will overtake him, and the Canadian Government is bound to see that it does.

IN June last Secretary Stanton requested Gov. Crapo, of Michigan, to require the civil officers of Detroit to turn over to the military authorities there two lieutenants, who were held for the homicide of a hack-driver. This the governor declined to do, on the ground that the accused were not at the time of the occurrence in the discharge of military duty, nor in the limits of a camp; and that the offence was not against the United States. But, besides this, he had no power to take the offenders from the custody of the law. We had supposed this decision was final, never having heard that the Secretary of War had pushed the matter. Now, however, in a parallel case, he makes the same request of Gov. Parker, of New Jersey, adding that "this has been the course pursued on similar applications in other States, under like circumstances, and in which the request of the Department has always been accorded." The governor declines, on the score of the inability of the Executive to interfere with the judiciary.

SECRETARY HARLAN has written an important letter to George D. Edmonds of Iowa, explaining, for the benefit of the Republicans of that State, his own opinions and those of President Johnson on the question of Negro Suffrage. He declares that President Johnson has taken no stand against the right of negroes to vote, or against the expediency of permitting them to vote; that what he maintains is that the power of deciding whether they shall or shall not vote belongs to the States, and that "the Federal Government has not the right to interfere primarily with the question of suffrage in any State of the Union." Secondarily, however, according to Mr. Harlan, the Federal Government has such right of interference, for he adopts the theory maintained by "T. F." in the columns of this journal a few weeks ago, that Congress under the clause of the Constitution which gives it the right to determine the qualifications of its own members, may refuse admission to persons with the mode of whose election it is not satisfied; and that under the clause requiring the Government to guarantee to each State "a republican form of government" it has the right to decide whether the form of government adopted by any State is or is not republican, and act accordingly. It seems clearer every day that the great struggle which has just ended on the battle-field is to be continued in Congress next session, and that the President is determined to shift from himself the responsibility of deciding the gravest question raised by the war.

THE Republican State Convention, held at Saint Paul, Minnesota, on the 6th, selected three of its candidates from the army—a general (W. R. Marshall), as the fashion goes, for governor, a lieutenant-colonel for secretary of state, and General C. Shafer treasurer. The resolutions were vigorous: "that neither a man's color, race, nor birthplace takes away his political rights;" that no portion of the people shall remain degraded and ignorant; that the imperial government in Mexico is not to be tolerated, and the Government should compel the withdrawal of the invaders. The Wisconsin Republican Convention at Madison, on the following day, had to nominate an attorney-general. There appears to have been a majority report of the committee on resolutions which omitted negro suffrage, and a minority report which introduced the awkward topic. The convention chose to abide by the former. The New York Democratic Convention assembled at Albany on the 6th, and adjourned on the 7th. The ticket upon which they agreed was compounded of Democrats and Republicans, and was headed with the name of General Slocum, now on duty in Mississippi, for secretary of state. General Patrick, formerly provost-marshal general of the Army of the Potomac, was nominated for treasurer; John Van Buren for attorney-general. The resolutions are loud in praise of the country's defenders, and unmistakably sound on the obligation to pay the national debt. The conduct of the South in accepting the results of the war, including emancipation, is applauded. So is the President for his policy of reconstruction; but so are not they who would delay this consummation by conditions of negro equality and negro suffrage. The second resolution is so curious, when we remember which party opposed the war and which sustained and conducted it to a successful issue, that we transcribe it entire:

"Resolved, That we congratulate the people of this State and of the nation upon the termination of civil war and upon the return of peace, and especially that this blessing is attained with a preserved Union, an undivided country, and the re-assertion of constitutional liberty throughout the land."

On the whole, this is the mildest-spoken Democracy whose doings we have yet had to chronicle. It may be they are none the less dangerous. Two elections occurred on the 5th—in Vermont for State and county officers, and members of the legislature. Of course, the Republican ticket was carried, and by a majority not greatly varying from that of last year. The Hon. Paul Dillingham was chosen governor. The Senate is again a unit for liberty—for the issue, as presented by the victorious party, was equality of civil and political rights for all the inhabitants of the South—and the House is even more strongly Republican than before. The constitutional election in Colorado resulted in the adoption of the constitution by a large majority. The territory will plead to be a State in December. On the 7th an election took place in California, with great quiet and a light vote. The principal counties returned Union men to the Legislature. San Francisco was divided between seven Union and seven Democratic representatives. Secretary Seward has acknowledged the receipt of a copy of the amended constitution of Mississippi.

One who writes from Macon, Georgia, on the 15th of August, remarks:

"The wages that the freedmen obtain in the towns and cities are so large as to discourage the field laborers from planting. Thus I know that as much as forty dollars a trip is given to freedmen to work as firemen on board the steamers running between New York and Savannah. The run is frequently made in three days. I have seen a large number of negroes refuse to work at twenty-five cents an hour. In fact, they appear to think two or three dollars per diem very low wages, and I have yet to hear of any one working for less than a dollar and a half. The field hands hear what these others receive, and demand as much. I am more and more persuaded that the day for large crops of cotton at low prices has passed for ever. Cotton will be raised, but not as before. For instance, the women who used to work in the field now follow the men to the cities, and the men support them there. It is delusive to talk of the negroes starving: everywhere I hear nothing but complaints because the supply of labor is insufficient, and this while not one plantation in ten is half-worked. The whole of the South is to be rebuilt and refurnished, and until it is, the negro will find abundance of labor without working in the fields.

"Everywhere I find Northern men: in all the out-of-the-way places they do almost all the business. I find the impression among the planters that while emancipation will not permanently injure the border States, it is total and irremediable ruin to the cotton States; at least, so they express themselves almost without exception. Many are removing to North Carolina, or some other border State."

But few reports have been current concerning the freedmen. The planters of Charlotte County, Virginia, are said, like those of Nottoway, to be turning off their surplus help, upon a strict calculation of the hands which will be needed during the winter. These outcasts, who have received no recompense for their labor in gathering the crops, are forced to take refuge in the adjacent counties. The wages of those that remain are five dollars a month, out of which rent and clothing must be paid for. Colonel Brown has sent an agent to Marysville to protect the freedmen, and Gov. Peirpont his adjutant-general to Nottoway Court-House, on a similar mission. Instances of the turning away of families of women and children have also been authenticated in North Carolina, and Colonel Whittlesey has instructed his agents to levy upon the planters' stores of corn and bacon an amount sufficient to sustain the destitute sufferers until the close of the year. A change of treatment has already been produced, and the planters find it prudent and economical to take back the families they had thrust from their estates. The same superintendent has wisely decided the course to be pursued in cases of mixed parentage like the following: A colored woman of Hillsborough was the mother of two children when her husband was taken from her some four years since, and two more, light-complexioned, when he returned to claim her the other day. He is willing to resume the old relation, but objects to being burdened with the two aliens, who clearly resemble a white man of the vicinity. The wife is ready to declare the truth in the matter, and Colonel Whittlesey has permitted her to do so, adding that if, on further investigation, her story is corroborated, the genuine father shall be held responsible for the support of the children, according to the laws of the State. A universal enforcement of this decision at the South would reduce the family cares of many a colored couple to a minimum. The Freedmen's Bureau in North Carolina labors under great embarrassment from the lack of co-operation with the military, who have been too early and too widely withdrawn. Gen. Swayne, the assistant commissioner for Alabama, has taken a very important step. He informs the judiciary of the State that he is loth to establish special courts for the freedmen, as he is instructed to do, which must necessarily be presided over by persons unfamiliar with the local laws. For this reason he would greatly prefer that the usual civil magistrates should accept the agency from him, and make no difference between black and white in the reception of testimony and the dispensation of justice. If this proposal is rejected in any quarter, martial law and a freedmen's court will be immediately established there. Gov. Parsons assists the general, and urges compliance on the part of the magistrates, pointing out the uselessness of refusal, and of any attempt to administer less than justice to colored applicants. The experiment, under military surveillance, will be watched with interest. We have a statement from East Tennessee that the President has ordered the discontinuance of the Freedmen's Bureau in that region, professedly because of the small number of subjects, and, from the statistics we presented last week, we might add, because the colored population is self-supporting. At the same time we should judge it desirable for the Bureau still to extend its ægis over those who are certainly not above the need of education, nor beyond the reach of malice, fraud, and even violence. The fruits of Gen. Fiske's tour through his department are seen in the fact that instead of the 7,151 freedmen who were subsisted by Government on the 15th of July only 979—mostly aged and infirm—are now drawing rations. The list of dependent refugees has been cut down from 5,969 to 11. Citizens of Virginia, North Carolina, and Mississippi are said to have addressed themselves in fear and trembling to the President, through dread of a rising of the blacks. Their apprehensions may have some connexion with a consciousness of guilt, and it cannot be doubted that one half the abuse which the freedmen have received in those three States since the cessation of hostilities would have fired white victims to deeds of vengeance. It is too late to expect this sort of thing from the negro, unless he perceives a deliberate design to re-enslave him. Those who are curious to know how he would then behave, may make the essay if they choose to bear the blame and the consequences. Gen. Howard, however, has arranged for a patrol or police system in districts where there are no agents of the Bureau.

There is a religio-political imbroglio in Missouri. By the new constitution of the State it is exacted that clergymen, lawyers, and teachers, among others, shall take the oath of loyalty, on or before the first of September of the current year, or forfeit a right to exercise their functions. The clergy, who are usually the foremost to insist on submission to the powers that be, have exhibited far more opposition to the law than either of the other two classes. The Catholics have the sanction of Archbishop Kenrick, of St. Louis, who avers that priests cannot take the oath without a sacrifice of ecclesiastical liberty, and publicly requests to be informed of an attempt to force it upon them. Bishop Kavanagh, of the Methodist Church South, heads a united flock in the same pastures of resistance. The Baptists who met in annual convention at Boonesville, on the 19th and 20th of August, to the number of about fifty, agreed together not to take the oath, and drew up their reasons, to wit: that the oath is in conflict with the United States Constitution, by interfering with freedom of worship, being ex post facto in its operation, and making every recusant a witness against himself; that it is unjust and unequal in its application; that it offers punishment for what is no crime against any human law; and that it sets the authority of men above the divine. The Old School Presbyterians are counted upon the same side, with perhaps other denominations. Bishop Hawkes, on the contrary, of the Episcopal Church, has taken the oath, and recommended taking it, where it can be done conscientiously, or else the abandonment of preaching. The matter cannot long be kept out of the courts. On their part the Catholics are at loggerheads with the Fenians. An imposing pageant in connection with the funeral of one of the members of this organization, in St. Louis, was disapproved and forbidden by Archbishop Kenrick, who refused the use of St. Patrick's church, and entrance to Calvary Cemetery, to any procession of men or women wearing the insignia of Fenianism. He takes occasion to remind these people that they are not admissible to the sacraments of the Church so long as they are connected with the association, which he has always regarded as immoral in its object.

THE career of the famous Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Regiment terminated on Boston Common on the 2d. On landing from one of the islands in Boston harbor, they were escorted by a colored militia regiment, the Shaw Guards, and the Hallowell Union Association, with bands of music, through the principal streets, amid the heartiest cheering, to the State House, where they saluted the governor, and then passed on to the field where they were to be mustered out of service. The usual evolutions were performed with great accuracy, and at the close the men were addressed with words of praise, affection, and sensible advice by their commander, late Colonel, now General E. N. Hallowell. The regiment, it will be remembered, on the 28th of May, 1863, with the lamented Colonel Shaw at its head, left Boston for Charleston harbor, and achieved its lasting renown in the unsuccessful but heroic assault on Fort Wagner. Here the colonel fell, and Major Hallowell was severely wounded. It is but a few days since the father of him whose monument was the bodies of his devoted soldiers, received his son's sword as a precious relic, albeit a sad reminder of that fatal encounter. Colonel Shaw's successor was worthy of him, and it is owing to Col. Hallowell's urgency that the regiment on its return could point to five colored commissioned lieutenants, including a quartermaster, as an evidence that brave men value each other for such essential qualities as courage, and do not suffer complexion to be a measure of human worth. The assumed native repugnance of African and Anglo-Saxon is ill-supported by the instance of this regiment, whose staff officers, including both colonels and Quartermaster Ritchie, were blonde and fair-haired men.

BESIDES the charge of the Freedmen's Bureau, the delicate business of confiscation devolves, by request of the President, on Gen. Howard. A circular of his, of the 4th inst., directs his assistant commissioners to cause accurate descriptions to be made at once of all confiscated and abandoned lands, and to set apart, for the immediate use of freedmen and refugees, as much of this property as may be required. That of which the title is least in doubt should be preferred in this apportionment. Lands which may be found on examination not to fall under the head of abandoned, shall be surrendered to claimants whose right is clear. Recipients of pardon from the Executive must file their claims and proofs with Gen. Howard, if they desire to recover their property from the operation of the confiscation act. The agent in Loudon County, Virginia, is specially ordered to suspend action in regard to assumed confiscated estates, until a careful revision and correction of the record can be made. Considerable alarm was excited in that county by the anticipated procedure of the agent.

THE following advertisement from the Charleston Courier tells its own story, and illustrates besides an observation in the letter of "Marcel," which we print on another page:

"EDITORS COURIER: In your published list of cases tried before the Circuit Provost Court, on the 19th inst., 'Robert S. Lord vs. Edward Perry, both freedmen.' I would beg to state that I have always been a bona fide free man; enjoyed those privileges before the war.

"August 22. ROBT. S. LORD."

IT is well to try if half a loaf will not satisfy the mouth which waters and calls for a whole one. So at least reasons Judge O. A. Lochrane, of Georgia, for he told the people of Atlanta, in a letter intended to be overwhelmingly loyal:

"We must not only acknowledge the freedom of the slave, but we must go further; we must recognize his right to acquire property—the right to testify in courts for its protection and his own—and place crime and police regulations upon a common principle of legislation. We cannot have distinctions of class in crimes—all violators of law must stand equal before the law, and our legislature control the policy of interest by general laws adapted to preserve the peace and order of society against all rogues and vagabonds of every class and color. This principle of public policy will save us from negro suffrage; and this last dogma we must resist; for the negro, though free, must be an inferior in the privileges of citizenship. The Government of the United States is a white man's government; and while, under the benignity of its laws, industry and persons and property will be protected, we cannot consent to lower the standard of our civilization; we must teach the freedman his duty, as well as proclaim his rights; his responsibilities must be made known to him, and the follies which have entered his brain with his new-born freedom must be driven out. We must be just to the whites as well as to the blacks; and fanaticism on this subject will only lead to trouble, flattering the negro into a position of folly that will impede the progress and industry of the country."

The judge looks confidently for protection from fanaticism to President Johnson and that "great Union party of the North and West which so fully maintains the equalities of the States and citizens."

GOV. MARVIN, of Florida, in his proclamation for a constitutional convention, is careful to reiterate that negro suffrage will be a legitimate topic of discussion for the body to be chosen on the 10th of October. The only other noteworthy point is, that persons who have gone through the forms of obtaining pardon from the President, will be assumed to have succeeded, even if they have not heard from Washington: that is, the delay will be attributed to the mails. That this procedure is wholly unjustifiable it would be harsh to assert, but any one can see that it is dangerous, and that it may vitiate the most important election of the State, even if the mails reverse the assumptions next day.

It takes a long time to get history written correctly. Everybody must have felt inclined to accept General Sherman's statement in St. Louis, that to General Halleck belonged the credit of pointing out the way to break the rebel line in Kentucky in 1862: "physically, by a perpendicular force—the Tennessee River." General D. C. Buell disputes these laurels, and certainly makes out a very fair case by the telegrams and documents he produces, in order to show that in November, 1861, or about two weeks after he had assumed command in Kentucky, he had sketched a plan of campaign for Kentucky and Tennessee identical with that which was afterwards executed by Halleck and Grant, not excepting the gunboats. When repeated overtures were made to Halleck for assistance, he was too much engrossed with Missouri, and Buell was one day surprised to find Forts Henry and Donelson taken, and his thunder stolen. A letter of General Grant to Assistant-Secretary Dana is published for the first time. He praises General Hunter's campaign in the Shenandoah Valley, and says he fails to see "that he has not acted with great promptness and great success."

THE Liverpool merchants who subscribed for a bronze statue of Stonewall Jackson, to be presented to the Confederate State of Virginia, have an elephant on their hands. As the Richmond Bulletin innocently remarks, "possibly a prejudice may exist in the minds of the national authorities against General Jackson—a prejudice growing out of the fact that he drew the sword in the late war against the United States;" and therefore they may object to the installation of the statue upon the soil of Virginia. We are happy to believe in the existence and the strength of this prejudice, and that neither "upon its pedestal in the Capitol Square, under the shadow of the immortal Washington," nor "amid the walks of that seat of learning" which bred the future champion of a slaveholders' rebellion, nor yet "above the sacred verdure that grows above his honored grave," will the brazen effigy be suffered to stand, in mockery of the dead from Gettysburg to Petersburg.

THE British Government, giving heed to a protest from Ireland against the importation of cattle to that island from England while the murrain still prevails, has prohibited such importation. The Emancipation Society has published an address announcing its dissolution. Ira Aldridge, the eminent African tragedian, is playing in London, side by side, it is said, with a member of the nobility, Hon. Lewis Wingfield. The failure of the North Atlantic Cable does not dishearten the projectors of another, in continuation of the land telegraph from Paris to Lisbon and Cape St. Vincent. Its course will be thence to the Canary Islands, along the coast of Morocco; to Cape Verde, along the African coast, with stations at St. Louis, Senegal, and at Goree. The longest link will bind Cape Verde to Cape St. Roque, Brazil, and will be less than half as long as that which was committed to the Great Eastern. Thence the coast will be followed to Cayenne, to which perhaps the chief islands of the West Indies will be anchored before New Orleans is reached. Five years are the allotted time for this enterprise. A French authority, M. Babinet, ridicules the idea of the durability of the English cable, because of the smallness of the wires and the corrosive action of the sea, as learned from the Channel cable when lifted by a fouling anchor. He allows six months for it to last if laid. Meanwhile, we now have the overland telegraph line to California in excellent working order, and the Russian telegraph is nearly 400 miles beyond New Westminister, which lies in latitude 49° N. The fleet which co-operates with it was well advanced at the latest advices. From St. Petersburg we hear of the continuance of incendiary conflagrations throughout the empire, of the most terrible description. No doubt exists that they happen from criminal design, but it is not yet clear who are guilty of this wide-spread and persistent arson. Of course the Poles naturally fall under suspicion.

Lord Palmerston, according to a statement that is going the rounds of the journals, recently said, in reply to a friend who told him that he was the oldest Prime Minister England ever had, that Cardinal Henry was prime minister at ninety. We presume that Lord Palmerston said Cardinal Fleury, who was chief French minister at the beginning of 1743, temp. Louis XV., dying then in his ninetieth year. But we have a better opinion of Lord Palmerston's historical acquirements than to suppose he would not have corrected any one who should have told him he was the oldest prime minister England ever had, for that country has had one prime minister who was older even than Cardinal Fleury. The Marquis of Winchester, who was born in 1475, in the reign of Edward IV., became Lord High Treasurer in 1549, when Edward VI. was king, and held that office until the 10th of March, 1572, in the fourteenth of Elizabeth, he being ninety-seven years old, or old enough to have been Lord Palmerston's father. Lord Winchester lived in the reigns of eight English monarchs, namely, Edward IV., Edward V., Richard III., Henry VII., Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary I., and Elizabeth, and under all the sovereigns of the Tudor line, though Elizabeth survived him thirty-one years. Lord Palmerston has lived in the reigns of George III., George IV., William IV., and Victoria; but he has been in office longer than Lord Winchester, so far as the latter's history is known, as the marquis did not become an historical character until he was fifty-eight, and his first high post he received when he was sixty-three. Lord Palmerston has been in office about fifty years, and in Parliament fifty-nine years. But he has never been in office so high as that held by the Marquis of Winchester, who was Lord High Treasurer, an office which has not been known in England for more than a century and a half. The last person who held it was the famous Charles Talbot, Duke of Shrewsbury, who received the white staff from the hands of Queen Anne when on her death-bed—the closing act of the Stuart dynasty, which terminated in Anne, being the appointment of an enemy of that dynasty to the highest political post in the realm. The first Hanoverian king put the treasury in commission, and in that state it has ever since remained. At that time, the first Lord Commissioner of the Treasury did not rank so high as a secretary of state; and it was not until some years after the accession of George I. that the first lord came to be considered premier. Lord Palmerston is the oldest prime minister that Great Britain ever has had—Great Britain dating from 1603, when James VI. of Scotland became King of England, and, by consequence, the first admitted British monarch.

A Liverpool judge, Mr. Baron Bramwell, discovered, at the recent assizes in that city, a Quaker in the jury-box, and was horror-struck to see him with his hat on. When his request for its removal was met by a mention of conscientious scruples, he replied that conscience no more compelled the juror to keep his hat on than it did his shoes—which was true, provided the Quaker's conscience was the same as the judge's. As it was not, however, and as the former persisted in remaining covered "out of reverence for the Almighty," the impatient magistrate ordered him from his seat with a fine of £10, and a threat to summon him next day and repeat the fine if he still indulged in that superfluous possession, a conscience of his own. When the next day came, the judge was only too glad to remit the fine, and to confess by this act that he had been cutting a very foolish figure.

There is danger of a cattle epidemic in France, but it comes from across the Pyrenees, and affects only bulls. In plain English, the national sport of Spain is finding favor in France. A bull-fight recently took place in the department of Landes, and now a second is reluctantly recorded by the Paris press in the ancient amphitheatre of Nismes. More than ten thousand spectators, of whom a large proportion were women, sat for five hours enjoying the barbarous spectacle. Five horses were eviscerated, and even in this bloody and revolting plight were spurred the round of the arena by the remorseless picadors. With refined cruelty six bulls were maddened by explosive darts, and finally dispatched with sword-strokes.

The fête of the French Emperor had its humorous features. Of the actors at Cherbourg and Brest and Portsmouth it is written:

"They put themselves in battle array to offer toasts to the entente cordiale. Together they make pilgrimages to the temple of peace, and the gifts that they lay upon the altar are rifled cannon, Armstrong shells, and torpedoes. They stretch forth hands to each other in so droll a manner that at a distance it almost seems like shaking their fists. Understand who will such manifestations. I knew once a boy who, hugging his sister in his arms, exclaimed ecstatically: 'I love you enough to break your teeth.' The tenderness of France and England appears to me to be of the same nature. May it please Heaven that there be no broken teeth!"

Among the nominations to the Legion of Honor was that of the Count de Lagrange, the lucky owner of Gladiator, whose victory over his English rivals in a recent race was the occasion of national rejoicing. The cross was more becomingly bestowed by the Empress on the painter of "The Horse Fair." The Imperial beneficence was manifested also by releasing from imprisonment forty-eight old convicts of the citadel at Belle Isle. One of them was asked if he meant to return to his family. "Alas!" he replied, "I have none. Before coming to prison I was an orphan." "Of father and mother both?" "Yes, I had killed them!" A mayor in the department of Vaucluse offered a prize of a hundred francs for the best pyrotechnic display on the 15th of August. A great number of competitors offered their pieces, and the exhibition approached in effectiveness that of the larger cities.

We alluded last week to the opposition manifested in France to the employment of women in printing offices. The controversy has taken possession of most of the leading newspapers in Paris, including the Moniteur. A writer in the Journal des Débats exposes pleasantly the reasoning of the sex which would properly be denominated the weaker, if judged by its arguments. These are of the sort which we in this country know by heart, and unhappily accredit too much. That which has, perhaps, most currency, and borrows its greatest weight from prejudice, is thus cleverly turned:

"We know very well what we shall be told: that women ought not to follow industrial callings, and that, if they would return to the household, they would have ease and happiness assured them. Meanwhile, a morsel of bread is refused them. And, really, is it the fault of the women if their salary is too often a necessary, indispensable supplement in a laboring family? Have they all, moreover, a home? Unhappy workwomen! they have everything against them—the vices of those they espouse, as well as of those who do not marry; and, when they wish to be self-supporting, the cry is raised: 'Work is unbecoming in you. Do better: go marry, become mothers! In the family you have a noble sphere!' Admirable language, which I hope, indeed, may one day be true for the great majority of women; but which, at this moment, unfortunately recalls the remonstrances of the schoolmaster in the story with the poor boy who was drowning and shouted for help!"

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

WILL THE FREED NEGRO RACE AT THE SOUTH DIE OUT?

"Now that the negroes will be no longer cared for and protected by their masters, they will soon die out before civilization and competition, just as the Indians have." Such, in substance, is the prediction which for the last two months has been so generally in the mouth of the whites of the South, and which has found its way into almost every letter from that quarter of the country. It has chimed in with the prejudices and preconceptions of a large class at the North, and has gone quite the round of the press, unchallenged even where it ought to have been summarily arrested and condemned. The origin and prevalence of this opinion at the South are readily accounted for. The mortality among the blacks has been lately quite striking. The paternity of the thought, also, it is not difficult to trace to the wish, and to the father's partial eyes no flaw is ever seen in the child. If the emancipation of the negro is destined to result only in his extinction, "the sacred institution" is justified in its name, and its overthrow is not a blessing but a curse. The extinction of the race would cut the Gordian knot of the negro problem. With some it is the solacing grumble in which they vent their feelings as they yield to the inevitable necessity of emancipation; with others, we fear, from acts that have lately been reported, the origin of the prediction was not merely a devout wish to behold that particular consummation, but also a determined purpose to help it on themselves. The prophecy, it is evident, will be of use in the future to explain and justify the desired result as a natural one, whatever means have been actually employed to bring it about.

But we must resort to other reasons to explain the belief in the coming doom of the negro which is held by such patriots as Gov. Brownlow, for example. The same prediction has been expressed, also, in a place whence it derives, perhaps, a kind of official authority, and where it may call for examination, as the assertion of private persons would not, viz., in the Census Report of the United States for 1860. We therefore beg attention to a few facts and considerations which would be, perhaps, dry and uninteresting did they not bear upon a question involving the fate of a numerous race and the great acts of our national Government in the last three years.

The question is, Is there any sufficient reason for believing that the negro race will, as is the prevalent supposition, inevitably die out, now that it has been freed? There has, indeed, been an unprecedented mortality among the negroes during the last nine months. But this has been owing to temporary causes, to the hardships and exposure to disease which the negroes have suffered in following our armies, and in the quarters of the large cities where they have congregated to escape from their old masters, and gain the protection of the Union garrisons; to the disturbance in their habits which the change in their condition has effected, and to the general destitution and suffering which the ravages of war have caused for a time in the South. Similar causes have produced a great mortality among the white population, also, of the South, as well among those who have not been on battle-fields and in camps, as among those that have. When society is again settled, this exceptional mortality will cease with the cessation of its exceptional causes. When the blacks have had their jubilee and holiday, the industrial instinct which the laboring habits of generations have created within them will re-assert itself, and unite with necessity and the demand for their services which the revival of trade and industry in the South will evoke, in sending them to self-sustaining work. Certainly, the experience of the British West Indies in the thirty years since emancipation took place; the experience of Port Royal and the neighboring islands in the last two years; the experience which we had in our free colored population before the war, among whom there was rarely to be found a beggar or a recipient of public charity, proves that the negroes are always willing to work when they can get fair treatment and regular pay, and that they are both able and willing to support themselves if they are given any approach to a fair chance of doing so.

But, "'Lo! the poor Indian'—in his past see the future of the negro," our prophets cry. "The contact of a more civilized with a less civilized race is inevitably fatal to the latter," they say with an assured air, as if they were quoting a settled scientific and ethnological law. If such is the general rule, it is a rule that has altogether too many exceptions to admit of its being accepted as absolute or of conclusive force as an argument. The contact of races of diverse character and origin, and of different grades of civilization, is by no means necessarily fatal to either. They may unite together, as the Celtic and Teutonic nations with the Romans, or as the Greeks and the Turks; or they may live side by side for centuries, each filling their separate place in the state, as the light Caucasian Hindoos and the black Turanian tribes in Hindostan. The rude Saxon peasants and burghers not only held out against the supremacy and oppression of the polished Norman lords, against knightly skill and strength, and priestly and legal learning, but eventually, by force of industry and commercial enterprise, regained ascendancy. And where the conflict of races has been ended only by the elimination of one of the antagonistic elements, as many instances, we think, might be adduced where the rugged vigor of the lower race has trampled the higher civilized under foot and out of existence, as where the lower has melted away before the skill and intellect of civilization.

The license of semi-civilized life has often sapped the morale and vital power of cultivated races, as well as the vices of civilized life consumed the savage. In Malacca and Eastern Africa the Portuguese have become more degraded than the natives among whom they live, and whom they once held as conquered subjects. The same phenomenonon is exhibited by the Arabs in Nubia. In South America the Spanish and Portuguese conquerors are dwindling away, and seem destined to yield the predominance to the mixed races.

The appeal to the fate of the Indian is a good illustration of the attractions which historical analogies have as arguments, and the readiness with which they are accepted as trusted evidence, in spite of their well known liability to fail in holding good. The fact that history is proverbially our teacher and guide as respects the future, gives an immediate authority to whatever lesson is assumed to be drawn from it, just as the holiness of a mediæval sanctuary afforded protection and even an odor of sanctity to the rascality of all who could get within its walls. For what particular reasons, and in what particular ways, has the contact of the Indian and the white race been fatal to the Indian? Because, as a little reflection will tell every one, the Indian will not be coaxed, and cannot be forced, for any length of time, to steady labor and the peaceful pursuits of civilized life; because he had rather perish than give up his savage independence; because of his defiant pride and passionate vindictiveness, and the incessant hostilities that have been the result of these qualities; because, in too great part, we fear, of the merciless covetousness and hatred of our own race; and, lastly, because all the good tendencies of his nature and those of civilized life are antagonistic, and only in vice does he easily assimilate himself to its members. It has never been found possible to make a useful slave of the Indian. The attempt was made in the West Indies and failed; and the importation of negro slaves was then first commenced, precisely because it was found impossible to make a slave of the Indian. The negro and the Indian are, perhaps, more opposite in character than any two other races on the earth. The qualities of which the Indian is destitute, and the lack of which unfits him for civilization—docility, patience under injury, respect for superiors, desire of the praise of others, local attachments, aptitude for steady pursuits—the negro possesses in a high degree. It was these virtues that made his long enslavement possible, and they naturally fit him for a place in civilized society. The vice of intemperance, which has made such havoc among the Indians, has never been prevalent in the African race.

The capability of the negro to bear hardships is much greater than that of the Indian. Of the causes, then, that worked the destruction of the Indian, there is only one that is liable to act on the negro, and that is, the excessive and undeserved hatred and cruelty of his white superior. Will those who prophesy a coming fate for the negro similar to that of the Indian, admit that this cause will produce it? There is, at least, no natural cause, no cause arising from the character of the negro or from the natural workings of the contact and competition of the two races, that affords reason to expect for the negro, now that he is freed, a similar fate to that which is overtaking the Indian.

We cannot reason from the history of the Indian to the probable history of the negro, because of the opposition in character and situation between the two. But if it is possible to draw any trustworthy lesson from the past to guide us in conjecturing the future of the African race, surely we can do so from the history of that part of the same race which formerly was in possession of the same freedom whose effect on the rest of the race it is prophesied will be so fatal. Was our old free colored population, in its lack of the care and protection of masters, dying out before the competition and civilization of the whites by whom they were surrounded, or were they flourishing and augmenting at a fair rate of increase? The official census reports give the increase of the free colored population of the United States since 1800, as follows:

In 1800	82.28 per cent.	In 1840	20.87 per cent.
1810	72.00 "	1850	12.46 "
1820	25.23 "	1860	12.32 "
1830	36.87 "

The average of these per-centages is 37.43, and the lowest 12.32. But this increase, it may be said, is in great part artificial, caused merely by the number of slaves who have been manumitted or escaped from their masters. Let us see to what extent the lowest rate of increase, that, namely, during the last ten years, will be reduced by separating these artificial elements from the natural increase or the gain of births over deaths. The number of slaves manumitted in the last ten years is estimated, in the Census Report of 1860, at 20,000. From the data which are there given about fugitive slaves, 8,000 may be considered a large estimate for the number of those fugitives who were either numbered among the free colored population or escaped to Canada. The actual increase of 58,521 from 1850 to 1860, given by the Census Report, must, then, be diminished by about 28,000. But, on the other hand, this is nearly balanced by the addition that must be made for the number removed from the country by the Colonization Society and by the number who have removed to Canada during the last ten years. The former number is about 5,000. The latter number cannot be estimated at less than 15,000; for by the Parliamentary return for 1851 the colored inhabitants of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were only 5,968; in Upper and Lower Canada they amounted in the same year to about 9,000, making about 15,000 in all; while, by an official return for 1862, printed by order of the House of Commons, there was then in the same provinces a colored population of 34,257. The natural increase, then, of our free colored population between 1850 and 1860 is about 8,000 less than the gross increase of 53,521 given by the Census Report—that is, it is an increase of 45,521 on a population in 1850 of 434,449, or an increase of 10.5 per cent. This per cent. of increase may seem low when compared with that of the white or former slave population of this country. The increase of the white population between 1850 and 1860 is given by the Census Report as 37.97 per cent., and the increase of the slave population as 23.39 per cent. Corrected, however, for the 2,200,000 immigrants that have swelled the increase of the white population and for the 28,000 manumitted and fugitive slaves, by whom that of the slave population has been diminished, the natural increase of the white and slave population during the last decade was 26.6 and 24.4 per cent. respectively; each of which is more than double the increase per cent. among the free colored. But when we compare the increase among the free colored in the last decennial period, not with the exceptional increase of population in this country, but with the movement of European populations, it will appear to be a very fair rate of increase. The increase of England and Wales in the last ten years, with the number of those who emigrated from the country added to the increase in the country, was 13.5 per cent. The increase in Scotland, corrected as before for emigration, was only about 9 per cent. The actual increase in France in the same period is only 3.77 per cent., and even when the increase in the country is augmented by the number of immigrants, the total increase will amount to little more than 4 per cent. The increase of the German Confederation, corrected for the emigration to America, is only a fraction over 6 per cent. That of Austria is 7.40 per cent.; that of Prussia, about 13 per cent; that of Russia, 9.80; that of Belgium, 7.6. The average of Italy for the last three-quarters of a century is only 9.50 per cent. for each decade; while the increase of the population of the five great European powers taken together, during the last decennial period, is barely above 9 per cent. Yet no serious apprehensions, we imagine, are felt that the population of any of these European states is dying out.

It perhaps may be said that though the increase of the free colored population has not yet fallen below that of European countries, the rapid diminution of the rate of increase which that class has exhibited, would soon have changed the per cent. from the side of gain to that of loss, and points plainly to an ultimate and not far distant extinction of the race. But a similar constant decline in the rate of increase is shown by our white population, by England, and by several other European countries. The rate of natural increase of the white population of this country has declined by a steady decrease of between one and two per cent. from 33.9 in 1800 to 29.8 in 1840 (vide Census Report for 1860, p. xl.) and to 26.6 in 1860. The rate of increase in England for the last forty years has been about one per cent. less every decennial period. In the last decennial period, the rate of natural increase diminished about two per cent. In Austria the rate of increase has diminished fourteen per cent. in all in the last four decades. If we could disengage the natural rate of increase of our free colored population from the other circumstances that formerly gave the reported increase a factitious magnitude, it would be found, we think, that the diminution in the rate has not been so excessive as to justify any serious apprehensions. In the first part of the present century, the emancipation acts of many Northern States increased the number of the free colored by thousands; and that number was augmented in a much greater proportion than it has ever been since by manumission, for then slavery was regarded as an institution not sacred, but destined soon to die out, and manumission was an act not frowned upon by society and made almost impossible by legal impediments, but encouraged and admired, and the freeing of all the slaves on an estate upon the death of the master was a common occurrence. It is noticeable, moreover, that in the last twenty years the rate of increase has altered scarcely at all; the rate between 1850 and 1860 being only a tenth of one per cent. less than the rate of increase in the ten years previous.

In the Census Report of 1860 the slow increase in the free colored population of the Northern States is maintained to be due in great part to "their indifference as a class to virtuous moral restraint," a fact which is shown beyond all doubt by the presence of the large proportion of 36.22 per cent. of mulattoes among the whole free colored population. "This development of the Census," it is said furthermore, "indicates with unerring certainty the gradual extinction of the race, in proportion as, whether free or slave, they become more diffused among the dominant race," as they will be, it is added below, by the extinction of slavery. This mischievous cause and the fatal result which "with these lights before us we need not look forward to centuries to develop," are expatiated on at length. But when we turn to the tables that give the proportion of the mulattoes to the total free colored population, which are the luminaries that we are told will reveal these shadows of coming events, we find a set of facts which can only be made to point to these conclusions by very ingenious twisting.

We find that the proportion of the mulattoes to the total free colored population throughout the United States has diminished, instead of increased, in the last decennial period. In the Northern States, it is true, the proportion of the mulattoes to the whole free colored population of those States in 1860 is 2 per cent. more than in 1850. But such a small gain in ten years is totally inadequate to account for the 30 per cent. of mulattoes among the free colored population of the Northern States; and in the Southern States, where the proportion of mulattoes among the free colored is 40.77 per cent., the proportion diminished 2.18 per cent. If the great proportion of mulattoes among our free colored population is due to "an unfavorable moral condition among them" at any time, the diminution of the proportion of mulattoes since 1850 shows that this condition has ceased to exist in any but a very trifling degree; and the fact, which is exhibited by these same tables, that the proportion of the mulattoes among the slaves increased over 3 per cent. in the last decennial period, shows that this "unfavorable moral condition" is certainly amended by the transition of the race from slavery to freedom. The simple explanation of the great proportion of the mulattoes among the free colored is that, from the superior intelligence and spirit of the mulattoes, from their more generally holding the position of house-servants, and sometimes from peculiar relations to their masters, a much greater proportion of them have gained manumission or made their escape from slavery.

The slow increase of our free colored population in the last few decades—slow, that is, in comparison with the rapid rate of the rest of our population—is due to their anomalous condition as a small body of former slaves, or the descendants, more or less removed, of slaves—to the legal disabilities, social persecutions, physical hardships, and frequent personal violence to which the influence of slavery and the slave power exposed them; and, especially, to the great mortality resulting among them from the incongenial climate of the Northern States in which large numbers had to take refuge. In the Report of a Commission appointed by the Secretary of War in 1863 on the condition of the Freedmen, a table of deaths in six Northern and five Southern cities is given, which shows that the mortality in Northern cities is much greater among the colored than among the whites, while in Southern cities the average is about the same. The fact that the falling off of the rate of increase immediately followed that period (about 1830) when the change in public feeling toward the negro took place, is significant of the true causes of the lessening of the increase. Two other causes which contributed, though in a less degree, to the same result may be mentioned. A disproportionate part of the free colored were beyond the productive age, the reason of which was probably the preference shown to the aged slaves in manumission—a reason which also explains the otherwise strange contradiction that while the mortality among the free colored was much greater than among the whites, the average length of life among the free colored was also greater. The temporary accession of this class made the increase of the permanent body of the free colored seem less. There was also an injurious inequality between the sexes. The announcement of Gov. Andrew some little while ago that there was an excess of 40,000 females in the State of Massachusetts excited considerable attention. In the free colored population of the Southern States, in 1860, the excess of females was even greater in proportion to the whole body. It amounted to 12,000 in a population of only 260,000, or 13 women to 12 men. This circumstance also contributed to retard the increase of the free colored class. That in spite of all these adverse circumstances our old free colored population before the war not only sustained itself against the competition of the white race by which it was surrounded, but steadily augmented by natural increase at a rate, at its lowest, greater than the average of the five great European powers, proves, as conclusively as anything can be proved in regard to the future, that the rest of the race in the South, now that it also has been freed, is not destined to become extinct from any natural decrease or any ordinary adversity of circumstances, and affords us good augury of its future progress in the congenial climate of the South, relieved from most of those anomalous obstructions which checked the growth of our old free colored population.

At a recent meeting of the London Anthropological Society, men of scientific aspirations, as we remarked in a former article, gravely announced that in their opinion the white race in America is degenerating and will probably become extinct. The realization of this absurd prediction is only a little less improbable than the realization, from natural causes, of the prediction which we have been discussing. We do not expect that the blacks at the South, with the responsibilities of freemen which they will now have, will increase as rapidly as when they were slaves. But the extinction of the race can be argued only on the supposition of the exercise of excessive oppression and cruelty towards them by the whites. Their own hearts will tell the people of the South whether that supposition is a calumny on their justice and charity and Christianity, or not. We, for our part, will not yet entertain the supposition; but we would have the friends of the freedmen aware of their natural capabilities and natural prospects; we would have those, if there are any such, who are inclined to use the prophecy of the natural dying out of the freed negro race at the South, as an excuse for doing what they can to bring that result about, know that the pretext will not avail them; and we would have the country know to what cause that result, if it does take place, will have to be assigned.

A LOFTY ENTERPRISE.

The question which perplexed the alumni of Harvard College in regard to the proper sort of memorial for their brethren who fell in the sweet service of liberty, is also debated by the country at large, for the Republic is not ungrateful. Cemeteries and monuments for the dead, pensions and hospital-homes for the disabled survivors, are but a partial recognition of the heroism of the battle-field. Something more, it is felt, is wanted for both these classes, and for that large number who, at the close of hostilities, are happily neither the objects of mourning nor of compassion and charity. Posterity will not be satisfied with brief and perhaps illegible inscriptions, nor content, amid the veterans of some American Greenwich or Chelsea, "to glean," as the author of "The Biglow Papers" remarks, "the materials of revolutionary history from the lips of aged persons who took a part in the actual making of it, and, finding the manufacture profitable, continued the supply in an adequate proportion to the demand."

We have welcomed, accordingly, the quite numerous volumes of regimental histories, which, published when the record of the war was still unfinished, are likely to be followed by others lacking nothing of completeness. Personal diaries, too: the tales of individual suffering, captivity, and escape; the narratives of campaigns, battles, sieges, and marches; and the collections of private letters, have a value not easily reckoned in affording an accurate picture of the epoch from which we are emerging. A few weeks since, we noted the effort of the Congregational churches at the West to obtain the fullest statistics concerning their preachers and members who had participated in the conflict of arms. Still more recently we published the advertisement of the Christian Commission, which designs embodying with a history of its own origin and work "reminiscences, facts, and incidents that will illustrate its spirit and method, at home and in the field." We shall hope for a similar chapter in the report of the Sanitary Commission. A New Hampshire photographer, we believe, has grouped on a single card the portraits of his townsmen who perished in the war. Latest of all, our attention has been directed to "The Soldiers' Memorial Society" of Boston, organized, as its constitution tells us, to preserve the grateful memory of the soldiers of Massachusetts. Its plan is contained in the following articles:

"It will collect such narratives and other memorials of their heroism as may be obtained for the use of the historian or student. And it will hold itself ready to assist in any work of benevolence in those regions which were the seat of war, which may fitly show there that in the work of war our soldiers were engaged in the highest work of humanity and justice. Our monuments to our brothers who have served the country shall be in the hospitals, schools, and other beneficent institutions to which we can contribute in the regions where they fought for us. . . . .

"The Memorial Committee shall collect such personal memoranda of those who have been in the army as may be accessible, attempting as full a collection as possible of those personal incidents which are most apt to die out from written history. From time to time they shall have charge of such publications as the whole Board may direct."

The remarkable feature of this undertaking is evidently not its historical scope and endeavor, laudable as these are, but the practical, living work which binds up wounds that were reluctantly inflicted, and repairs the places laid waste by a hard necessity—which enters, indeed, at the jagged and blood-stained breach, but comes to scatter unfamiliar blessings even upon heads not yet prepared to receive them thankfully. It resembles the pure air and the sunlight that flood the chasm of the murderous shell, bringing health and strength to the sickly dwarfs that bred in the shadow of a mighty barbarism. We know very well that the motives of the noble-hearted men and women of Boston who thus publish their intentions to the world are likely to be abundantly misconstrued. The names of those who have lost their dearest relations in the grapple with rebellion will not shield the movement from imputations of impertinence and officiousness. If this time the negro is left to his legion of new-found friends, and a helping hand stretched out to the crushed and ignorant whites scarce rid of the grime of a hostile camp, this cannot be called abolition sentimentalism, but it will probably be regarded as more an evidence of repentance than of Christian magnanimity and brotherly love. For all that, the work will go on. What Massachusetts begins she is apt to carry through. The schoolmaster has been abroad ever since she first sent him out, and his travels have as yet no visible end. He balances now his satchel with his wallet, feeds the hungry while instructing the unlearned, plants a school-house here and a saw-mill there, drains the swamp and clears the forest, bores the tunnel and sinks the shaft; and, amid the clatter of plates and the whirring of machinery, the echoes of the axe, the anvil-chorus of drills, and the myriad notes of industry, his voice is ever heard repeating—it may be somewhat nasally—the A, B, C, out of which are spelt law, liberty, and labor, and in which, ere long, not even the wayfaring man at the South shall err. Meanwhile let us commend most cordially the example of Massachusetts to her sister States. Let them contribute their portion to the memory of our defenders, the history of the grandest spectacle of the ages, and the pressing task of reconstruction.

CORPORATIONS AND THE PEOPLE.

The frantic talk about hanging presidents and directors of railroads with which the newspapers have been filled for some weeks past, though perhaps excusable, is not very complimentary to the public. Not one of their readers has the least expectation that anybody will be hanged, or that, if anybody was hanged, it would render railroad travelling more secure for any great length of time. And the moral reflections on the guilt of railroad officials which have been submitted to the world in such quantities, creditable as they may be to the writers, and deeply as the offenders may be impressed by them, are in reality for all practical purposes utterly worthless. The causes of the shocking slaughters which have taken place during the last year or two on our railroads are not to be found in individual depravity, but in the nature of the system under which the great lines of communication are kept up.

A reckless indifference to the safety of the passengers is, of course, the worst fault of our railroad companies, but it is by no means the only one. Their indifference to their health and comfort is just as marked. We have the worst and roughest tracks, the most uncomfortable, dirtiest, worst ventilated cars, the most unpunctual trains, most uncivil officials, the most inconvenient, filthy stations, and the worst supplied and worst served refreshment rooms, of all civilized countries. And it follows, as a corollary from all this, that in no country are railroad passengers killed and maimed with so much impunity and in such numbers.

It is all nonsense to tell us the railroads are as good as the community can afford. Except on the extreme Western frontier, or in some of the more sparsely settled districts of the South, we assert, unhesitatingly, that there is no country in which the passenger traffic on railroads is nearly as great, or in which the people are half as well able to pay for safety, comfort, and speed. The Irish railroads run faster, have better cars, better stations, better tracks, and pay larger dividends than ours, and they are dependent on the poorest population in Europe for support. Our cars are cattle-pens compared to those of the Swiss lines, and as to safety, we doubt if these kill or maim one person for our ten, and yet they are maintained by a society whose structure is just like our own, and whose surplus wealth it would be ridiculous to compare with ours.

The trouble with our railroads is not in the greater recklessness of our presidents, conductors, or engine-drivers. They are as humane, as considerate, and as conscientious as those of any other country, and as are the average of other men in this. Very likely their democratic education has supplied them with less strict notions of subordination and responsibility than those in which most men in aristocratic countries are bred. But they are not specially depraved or inhuman. The ultimate causes of the abuses under which we are groaning are, in our opinion, to be found in the fact that corporations have acquired in the United States a degree of power and exemption from control to which they have nowhere else been as yet able to attain. Such concentrations of wealth and power in the hands of a few persons not sovereign, have not been witnessed in modern times since the overthrow of the feudal barons. They are the direct result of the growth of commerce. No such phenomena were foreseen in the last century. Down almost to our day, the only dangers to republican liberty which jurists or political philosophers feared were those which were likely to arise from the predominance of individuals, causing a tendency either to monarchy or aristocracy. Nothing, or next to nothing, was known in even the last century of the possible results or possible power of great combinations of individuals for commercial purposes. The only bodies of the kind with which our fathers were familiar were the Dutch and English East India Companies, but their immense strength was concealed from the popular gaze by the fact that their operations were carried on in foreign countries.

The objections to an aristocracy, or even to the concentration of great wealth in the hands of particular families, which we all feel, and which have been recognized in the legislation of nearly every State in the Union, is that it is apt to create a power too great to be controlled by the law, and thus liable to be used for the detriment of the rest of the community. Now our great railroad and other corporations have assumed a character and occupy a position amongst us which are in almost all respects, politically considered, similar to those of a bad and very unscrupulous aristocracy. In fact, these corporations are worse, and contain more dangers to the country than any aristocracy which has as yet been seen in the modern world; for they are armed with monopolies, and owing to their impersonality are indifferent to public opinion, to a degree of which no duke or marquis would be capable, owing to the fact that he must always be a man amongst men.

Ask any jurist, or, in fact, any intelligent man amongst us, on what ground we forbid entails, or the establishment amongst us of orders of nobility, and he will tell you that we fear the growth of a body of persons whose wealth, and the social weight it gave them, would enable them to control legislation, to influence elections for their own benefit, and to defy or divert the action of the courts of justice. And yet there is not one of these apprehensions which we do not see realized in the position of any of our great railroad companies. The New York Central, for instance, through its president, notoriously controls more votes, and is just as unscrupulous in the use it makes of them as a duke owning a whole county could possibly be. It can, we venture to say, do more to defeat a bill, or get a bill passed in the legislature, than any nobleman could ever do; and there is no question that a private person might bring a suit against the Duke of Northumberland or Prince Metternich with a far better prospect of having justice done him, than if he sued an American railroad company in possession of a long and successful line. In fact, there is nobody who is familiar with the relations of these bodies to the legislatures or the courts, who does not know that their influence is most corrupting and pernicious, and daily increasing; that individuals are every year more powerless against them; and yet the whole system of corporations is but in its infancy. What it has yet become gives but a faint idea of what it yet may be. In New York City the Avenue railroad companies already set the municipal authorities at defiance, defeat regularly every year in the legislature every bill for the improvement of the city which seems likely to diminish their profits, and conduct their business with an indifference to public comfort and decency which no individual would dare to exhibit.

In the case of railroad companies, all these evils are aggravated by the fact that a monopoly of one of our first and most pressing necessities—the means of conveyance over our great lines of communication—has been bestowed on them almost without conditions or restrictions. Railroads are in this country really the great public high-roads. The ordinary roads have become simply what the French call chemins de traverse. The full gravity and importance of such a concession as this was not perceived when it was first made. The only thing thought of then was getting the roads made; the full consequences of letting them pass into the exclusive control of trading companies were not foreseen. In France and Prussia, the power was reserved by the state of resuming possession of them after a term of years, and in England Mr. Gladstone has in contemplation a plan which will enable the Government to buy out all the existing railroad companies at a fixed rate, and work the lines for its own benefit. The evils from which we are suffering here are already abundantly manifest in England, but, owing to the difference in the nature of the government, they are much less serious in their results. The public there, as here, exercises little or no control over the national high-roads. Small bands of traders hold a monopoly of one of the first necessaries of life. There, as here, competition has ceased to afford any help in securing comfort, safety, or punctuality, because the nature of the case does not admit of it. There, as here, there is no substitute for competition; and there, as here, the only legal remedy for outrage, or inconvenience, or injury—the action for damages—is all but worthless, owing to the reluctance which individuals must always feel about engaging in suits against powerful and wealthy organizations which hire lawyers by the year. Small as the amount of attention may be which this subject has already excited, there are not many others connected with our social and political condition of greater importance. A few far-seeing observers, like Mr. George P. Marsh, have already called attention to it. Dr. Draper has, we believe, touched upon it in his last work. The day is not far distant when it will have to be taken up by the country and settled.

How it ought to be settled, we are not now prepared to say positively. But it is certain that some means must be devised of giving the people, through the Government, greater control over trading corporations, and preventing the acquisition by them of monopolies injurious to the public comfort and safety, and of political influence dangerous to political liberty. So far from handing the post-office over to express companies, as the Tribune has so often proposed, we believe the excesses of the railroad and other companies will eventually bring the people to lay aside that extraordinary fear of the Government, as a sort of enemy of individuals, which we have inherited from our European ancestors, and to regard it as what it really is, or ought to be, in every highly civilized community, the organized co-operation of all for the benefit of each. As long as the united force of the community—immense as it is, and as we see it to be at such crises as the late war—is confined to simply furnishing protection from ordinary fraud and violence, progress must be slower than it need be. There could hardly be a more striking illustration of the horrible way in which the world has been governed than the dread which still lingers in America, which has never known anything of despotism or feudal lords, of seeing the state make any active effort for the promotion of public comfort, safety, or happiness.

GENERAL LEE AS AN INSTRUCTOR OF YOUTH.

General Lee has been elected president or rector of Lexington College, and the event has called forth an elaborate eulogium on him from more than one Democratic organ. They declare, having of course an eye to the impending election, that he was undoubtedly guilty of an error of judgment in taking the Southern side in the late war; but that, nevertheless, his character is of such a high order that his influence on young men cannot but be good. Calhoun's intellectual subtlety, we are told, led the youth of the South astray; Lee's moral elevation and purity are to bring this generation back to the "flowery meads of virtue."

This is all very fine and very affecting, or rather would be if there were any truth in it. We shall not enquire whether, if a man commits a crime, the whole responsibility of it can ever be saddled upon his intellect, leaving his heart as innocent as an infant's. It may be possible on a pinch to draw such distinctions successfully; but in this case no such distinction is necessary. General Lee has saved the public all labor on this point by writing, when the war was on the eve of breaking out, a letter to his sister, in which he solemnly declared his conviction that the secession movement was unnecessary and unwise, and that he looked on it with at least regret. He thus showed that his judgment on the right and wrong of the matter was perfectly sound. Intellectually, he made no mistake as to the character of the revolution. He decided deliberately at the outset that it was uncalled for, which was simply, according to all moralists, another mode of pronouncing it a crime. He nevertheless joined it, became its leading agent, and devoted head, soul, and body to its service for he next four years. In other words, he made himself the instrument of slaughter and devastation, for which there did not exist in his own mind a single reason, except the will of the majority of his neighbors. That the majority have decided upon entering on a causeless war may seem to a good man a sufficient reason for his not adhering to their enemies, or for not offering any violent opposition to them at home; but no man of the highest character could see in it a reason for lending them all the aid in his power. And yet this Lee did. He had not a single argument to justify the battle of Gettysburg. All he knew was that the Virginia Convention had determined to secede; but this, according to his own confession, was no moral justification whatever. His intellect worked perfectly well about the whole matter. It was his heart that went astray. He committed butchery, knowing it to be butchery—but not for the purpose of avoiding greater evils than butchery.

It may be said that his soldier's notion of duty and allegiance may have led him to overlook the claims of abstract moral right, as it constantly does military men in other countries. But if he was affected by this consideration, it must have bound him to the United States. It was to the Federal flag that he owed military allegiance; it was to it he had sworn fidelity as a soldier; and in so far as his military conscience worked upon him, it must have worked upon him in favor of the Union. But he was evidently not influenced by it in the least. He threw off his uniform, violated his oath, and armed himself against the Government which had educated him, and which was the only one he had ever served, on the call of one which had just sprung into existence, and of which he had until that moment known nothing whatever. The talk of his having only "served his State," and of his determination never to leave it, is of very little value. He obeyed the orders of a chief chosen by the whole Confederacy, and was throughout the war the servant of every State in the South just as much as of Virginia.

We do not say all this for the purpose of showing that there is nothing good in Lee. There has been a great deal of rant talked about the "moral guilt of the rebels," as if the fact of a man's defending a bad cause on the battle-field proved his total depravity. We have seen innumerable attempts to argue people's readiness to rob and murder in private life from the fact of their having served in the Confederate ranks, all of which of course makes little impression on anybody accustomed to reason. Other people's silver spoons are no doubt perfectly safe in General Lee's custody, and his honesty, in the ordinary sense of the term, is unimpeachable. Amongst what are called "men of honor" in most parts of the world, he is probably considered to-day a very honorable man, and we have no doubt he thinks he is himself, and thinks so sincerely. The processes by which a man justifies his conduct in his own eyes will not always bear revelation or explanation, and if put on paper for the inspection of calm and impartial observers, would often wear a very queer look, when the man himself is perfectly satisfied.

But we protest against the notion that he is a good instructor for youth, or that he is fit to be put at the head of a college in a country situated as Virginia is. A man who can do what he has done, take arms for a cause which nothing but his intellectual approval could justify his serving, but which his intellect condemned, is hardly a fit person either to train or to "influence" young men. No amount of good talk now or hereafter about "the duty of the citizen towards the general Government" will ever do away with the effect of his example. No obligations can possibly be devised that will bind the young men of Virginia to the United States half so strongly as those which he deliberately and traitorously disregarded. No crime against society to which faction or sophistry or passion can tempt, will ever equal that to the commission of which he has devoted the last four years of his life. Unless his first appearance in the college is marked by a frank and hearty act of repentance, the influence of his character, on which his votaries now rely to fit him for his position, must be bad, and only bad. The expectation that he can undo the work of Calhoun is absurd. Calhoun was at least honest and consistent, and the good or evil which honest and consistent men work can never be effaced by weak men like Lee, who see the right, and go snivelling and weeping after the wrong.

THE RULES OF EVIDENCE IN ALABAMA.

The state of things in Alabama is singular. The local law forbids the reception of negro testimony in any cause to which a white man is a party, and the courts accordingly refuse to receive it. But the Freedmen's Bureau, with the approval of the President, has decided that wherever negro testimony is not received in the courts, all causes to which negroes are parties shall be heard before the Assistant Commissioner, and decided by him on his own responsibility.

General Swayne, unwilling to withdraw so large a portion of the population from the jurisdiction of the local courts, has issued an order making the judicial officers and magistrates of the State "Assistant Commissioners," with power to adjudicate as such in all cases between white and negro, if they choose to observe the rules of the Bureau in the matter of testimony. He adds, however:

"Failure to signify acceptance, or evident denial of justice, will be followed by revocation of the appointment herein conferred, and the substitution of martial law in the district where it shall occur."

Governor Parsons has thereupon issued a proclamation, advising all judicial officers of the State to accept the appointment offered by General Swayne, "and in good faith to do justice, and observe the instructions contained in General Swayne's order." He says:

"The only question for us is, shall it be received in courts whose judges and magistrates and jurors are our own citizens, who are acquainted with the habits and character of the negro, where the proceedings are governed by well settled rules of law and evidence, and where, if either party is dissatisfied with the decision, he has the right of appeal, or in courts composed of 'persons foreign to her citizenship and strangers to her laws,' where there is no fixed rule to govern the proceedings, and no right to appeal to correct an error if one is committed? There can be no doubt in the mind of any thoughtful citizen as to which is the best course. It is apparent from the foregoing that unless the magistrates and judges appointed under the Provisional Government accept the appointment conferred by General Swayne, martial law will be substituted and military courts established, which will hear and determine all complaints in which the rights of the negroes are involved between themselves, or with the whites, and negro evidence will be received."

The confusion there is in all this is one of the most singular phenomena of the reconstruction process. If a civil judge sits as an Assistant Commissioner, there is clearly no appeal from his decision, under the State law, to a higher court, and, therefore, the white Alabaman gains nothing in this respect by the judge's conversion into an agent of General Swayne's. Moreover, an Assistant Commissioner is not and cannot be bound by the decisions of the State courts. If there be, as Governor Parsons says, "no fixed rule to govern the proceedings" before an Assistant Commissioner chosen by General Swayne, and no right to appeal to correct an error if one is committed, neither can there be any such rule or right in proceedings before civil judges who sit as Assistant Commissioners. Both will derive their authority from the same source; so that, in point of regularity or security, nothing is gained by the change, as far as the whites are concerned.

As regards the negro, we have no doubt he will be a great loser. Thousands of cases will occur in which, though there may not be such a plain "denial of justice" as to call for General Swayne's intervention, negro evidence will be virtually disregarded. The claim of Southern men to be better fitted than other people to weigh negro testimony is preposterous, and we should be sorry to see it receive any sanction or countenance from the Government or its officers. They are probably worse qualified than any other men in the civilized world, because they all labor under the influence of a foregone conclusion as to his status and capacity, and what influence that conclusion has on their judgments, feelings, and conduct we all know from the history of the rebellion. The whole South rushed into an insane attempt at revolution under the influence of a theory of society which rested on nothing better than an affirmation that a negro's place in the animal kingdom was a long way below that of white men, and only a little way above that of beasts. To ask such men to weigh negro evidence in the same way that other evidence is weighed, is about as reasonable as to ask them to interpret the chattering of apes.

The case is one which clearly calls for mixed courts. If it be deemed advisable, and we think it is, that local judges should as far as possible be made to share in the administration of justice in this transition period between the inhabitants of the State, they should have, as assessors in all cases to which negroes are parties, appointees of the Bureau, filling the place of the stipendiary magistrates appointed by the home authorities in similar circumstances in the British West Indies. It is a very remarkable and suspicious circumstance that no offer has as yet been made or recommended in any Southern State to make the reception of negro evidence by the State courts obligatory by the State law or constitution. All expressions of opinion on this subject which reach us from high Southern authorities, are strongly hostile to any such change; and whenever it is recommended, as by Governor Parsons, it is as something temporary and exceptional, called for more by the necessity of appeasing the military authorities, than as a permanent change dictated by justice and sound policy.

COUNCILS AND CONVENTIONS.

We are living in a very gregarious time. The possibility of individual exertion, influence, and achievement seems no longer to be so much as dreamed of in our philosophy. The last ball set in motion by anybody solitary and alone was that of Mr. Benton, who fortunately does not live to bewail our all-pervading paper currency. If the Englishman can initiate no public enterprise without a public dinner, the American is equally helpless until he has called a convention. The most importunate reform must await the passage of a series of resolutions. Truth is never safe except in the keeping of an executive committee. The patriotism which boldly wanders from its native platform is regarded as suspicious and untrustworthy. The cause which has no crowd to sustain it, which is not maintained by broad rumor and made invincible by cunning machinery, will vainly trust to its righteousness for respectability. It may seem an easy matter to manufacture a genuine compound rhubarb pill, which shall be worthy of the confidence of the doctor, and potent against indigestion. But the frightful truth has burst upon a dyspeptic world that the rhubarb of commerce is not to be trusted, and that many a bolus which seems fair to the eye and is honestly bitter to the palate is, nevertheless, a wretched deceiver, which, swallowed in the touching confidence of sickness, is more likely to harrow than to heal. Nothing remained for honest apothecaries but to hold a convention in Boston, and such a convention they have just held, at which eloquence was literally a drug. The wool-growers, too, have gathered together in Philadelphia, and the corn and pork dealers in Chicago. The school-masters and the school-mistresses have discussed in solemn congregation the comparative virtues of different spelling-books and the efficacy of judicious flogging. There have been conventions of carpenters and of beer-brewers, of discharged soldiers and of discontented women, of farmers and of horse-dealers, of teetotallers and of anti-tobacconists, of Millerites, whose world is just ending, and of freedmen, whose world is just beginning. But these, at least, were not ghastly gatherings, like those synods of dead "Democrats" who, here and there, have crept from their graves into daylight, to rattle their bones in disgust at the aspect of a world so changed since they left it—to proffer their fleshless fingers to the President—to approve this measure and condemn the other—to offer one final screaming protest against the doctrine of human equality—and to strike one last feeble blow at a race only just now rescued from the heel of the oppressor! It is well that such should meet in droves; no individual could well endure the ignominy of ignorance and the shame of stolidity which would be intolerable in the eyes of the world, if many shoulders did not sustain them. Such conventions as these are not novelties, for the first of them was held in the infancy of the world, and in

> "—— Pandemonium, the high capital
> Of Satan and his peers."

It is not necessary that we should point out the power, either in a good or bad cause, of associated action. The moral tagged to the fable of "The Bundle of Sticks" is as sound now as it was in the days of Æsop. There is safety in a multitude of councillors, provided they are wise and not foolish, honest and not knavish. But forty thousand foxes would be no truer than forty, and a legion of asses no wiser than one lonesome donkey. Conventions may be convenient, but the very facility with which they register the edicts of party, and the personal irresponsibility which they secure, make them ready instruments in the hands of designing leaders. It is unpleasant to think that, no matter how shameful may be the platform adopted, no matter what crimes it may censure or extenuate, there will be thousands upon thousands who will crawl down to it, from whatever moral height they may occupy, without coughing. But, closely inspected, the scandal grows greater and more repulsive. Of the five hundred who compose the convention there may be fifty—there may be only five—who manage all the proceedings, who nominate the nominations, and who cut and dry the resolutions in the lobby. The strings are in the hands of these, and, as they pull, the puppets wink, gape, gesticulate, squeak, and gibber. Men who, though weak, are good, or at least not bad, are made to stand sponsors for enormous iniquities and for crimes hardly to be named. He who ventures courageously to protest against all this fatal charlatanry is pronounced the flea of the convention, and is unanimously voted a nuisance, a marplot, and a bore. He who thinks for himself interrupts the harmony of the deliberations; he who speaks for himself perils the prosperity of the party; he who consults his conscience, and acts by its direction, is told that he is more nice than wise; and if he will not be swept by the current, he is left high and dry upon the barren shores of political heterodoxy. The consequence is that conventions meet merely to register the conclusions of the caucus; and when there is really an honest difference of opinion which will not be composed by the ordinary methods, there are divisions and secessions, and two conventions instead of one.

We have thus indicated the moral danger attending this important feature of our political system. As we cannot afford altogether to dispense with conventions, which, in themselves, are natural and convenient parts of our public machinery, it is the more necessary to insist upon the duty of the personal conscience, and the dignity of obedience to its dictates. There is no party important or necessary enough to the public safety to hold the mind of a single human being in fee simple. There is no man who will not lose some of the simplicity of his finer instincts by mixing with a mob no better and no wiser than himself. But as political duties must not be avoided, the necessity of finding the golden mean between selfish isolation and a surrender of all personal identity becomes apparent. He will be happy who shall find it. Party may be his helper, but never his master; and while he mixes for the hour with the great mass of his fellow-citizens, he will be guilty of no act calculated to compromise the truth which he loves, or to disturb the serenity of his most private reflections.

Correspondence.

THE SOUTHERN WHITES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Mr. Redpath's account of the "poor whites" of Tennessee in The Nation (No. 7) recalls my own experience with the same class in a four months' residence in Arkansas, last autumn and winter. He has described them so accurately, that I need do nothing but confirm his description as being equally true of the refugees of Mississippi and Arkansas. I hardly ever found any who could read; hardly ever any children who knew their own age with exactness. The only really bright and intelligent boy I met, about fourteen years old, was just able to spell out words in the "First Reader." A Southern lady, who had had the charge of Sidney Johnston's hospitals in Nashville, told me, that out of some five hundred Arkansians whom she buried there, not more than half a dozen were able to write their names. She, like every other Southerner whom I have talked with, considers these people lower than the plantation negro.

There is a discrimination to be made here, however. If one were asked what characteristic distinguishes these two classes, he would say that the poor whites appear to be totally lacking in vitality, while the blacks have an excess of animal nature; so that there will probably be found more positive viciousness among the negroes, while the "poor whites" are simply "good for nothing." I have never, in this country or Europe, among whites or blacks, seen such specimens of premature old age as in the refugee houses upon the Mississippi—bent, gaunt, colorless girls of fifteen looking (except in the face) like women of fifty. If there were no whites but this class, an observer would certainly call it an effete race, and in truth they are simply degenerate Anglo-Saxons; while the faults of the negroes (and they are not exaggerated) are those of an undeveloped, semi-barbarous race.

If the doctrine held by many were true, that a degenerated people can never rise again—as I do not believe—there would be little hope but in the dying out of these people, a process which has been going on during the war as rapidly with them as with the blacks. Out of five hundred and ten inmates of the Refugee House in Helena, during a certain period, one hundred and eight died; and I think other places would show an equal rate of mortality. But, in fact, it is not possible to draw any sharp lines between this class and that of the small farmers, in whom there are a great many promising elements of character. We are apt to think that there is nothing between the aristocracy and the "white trash," overlooking the numerous and important class of small planters and farmers. These do not compare unfavorably, on the whole, with our small farmers at the North. They are less intelligent and less thrifty, but are, I believe, in the main, an honest, industrious set of men. They engaged in the war with zeal, but I think have learned that they were really fighting against their own interests, and, at any rate, seem ready to accommodate themselves to the new order of things.

It is common to argue as if slavery had corrupted the Southern whites to such a degree that they could never be depended upon to make good citizens. Morality, as well as patriotism, is said to be destroyed among them. How far this is true I will not undertake to judge, but I think not to the extent that is sometimes taken for granted. That there has been terrible social corruption cannot be denied; so there is in free society, only here it is an excrescence, there it seems to be a natural consequence of the institution of slavery. Still, it seems to me that the actual corrupting power of slavery, apart from the direct relation of master and slave, may be exaggerated. With many the relation itself was as far as possible humane; and I have no doubt that there were some who were not strong enough to resist the temptations of irresponsible power, but who yet, in all other relations and circumstances, were well-meaning and conscientious, just as it has been common to observe that however polished, cultivated, and genial a Southerner may be, touch upon the subject of slavery, and he is no longer a gentleman. All that is needed is, to remove this particular form of temptation out of the way of these people, free them from these inhuman surroundings, and they will be good Christians and good citizens.

Now the practical bearing of these remarks is this: that in order to make these people trustworthy citizens, they must be brought to the conviction that slavery and rebellion are hopelessly at an end. So long as there exists in their minds the least shadow of hope that the institution will be revived, they cannot be trusted. I have said, in my former letters, that the people of South Carolina have this conviction, and that they wish to accept its consequences in good faith. Still, I do not doubt that if we were to become involved in war with any foreign power, half the people of that State who have taken the oath, and taken it in good faith, would immediately begin to regret it—to ask themselves whether they had not been too hasty—and soon there would follow conspiracies and outbreaks. In the same way, if they should once get the notion that by intriguing with the Democratic party they could get the institution of slavery restored, even under another name, I do not doubt that they would be ready to do it. Just so long as they are convinced of the hopelessness of their cause, just so long, and no longer, we may depend upon them to be orderly and (in a sense) loyal. For this reason, I look with great apprehension upon the experiment of starting political movements at this juncture. A month ago, a gentleman who has been quite prominent in public life said to me, that "the people of South Carolina are too weary and sick at heart to think of politics; all they want is peace." This was, no doubt, true at the time. But set these same people to calling caucuses, choosing members of the convention, and intriguing for offices, and immediately they will find that, after all, they have not lost their relish for the old game, and will begin to think that perhaps they can save a little yet of what they thought was gone for ever. It may be that my fears upon this subject are groundless. Nobody would rejoice more than I at a genuine restoration of self-government to the Southern States. But the idea, sometimes thrown out, of withdrawing our troops, seems to me nothing short of madness. Indeed, I do not believe that the blacks would protest against it any more earnestly than the whites. Both are suspicious of each other, and it takes very little to excite ill-will between them. I should expect, if the garrisons were removed, to hear of a war of races in a very short time. At the same time, nothing is more absurd than the fears of the whites that "the negroes are going to rise." If there is any attempt to re-enslave them, they certainly will rise—at least, they ought to; otherwise, they have no motive to do so. "What for we rise?" I heard one of them ask, in Charleston; "we have our freedom now." Leave the negroes in the quiet possession of real freedom, and we need have no apprehension of any trouble.

Before closing, I will relate one or two incidents that came under my observation, not connected with what I have described above, but illustrating certain traits in the negro character. It is undeniable that the negroes do not exhibit so strong family affection as we should expect; still, a colored man in Columbia told me that he had that day seen a man who was sold away to the West thirty years ago, and who was now returned and searching for his wife. It reminded me of the case of a woman I knew, at Port Royal, who had taken another husband when her first was sold away, and who was speculating on the probability of the first returning, now that he was free. Her heart was still with her old love, and there seemed to be very little doubt in her mind as to her duty. "Of course I go wid him—does n't he belong to me?"

If there is any one argument for slavery which has a plausible ring of humanity about it, it is that it affords a security to the laborer of being supported in comfort in his old age—a pleasanter refuge than the alms-house. That this is usually the case we all know. I saw, however, an old woman in Columbia whom her mistress—a member of a wealthy family—put up to be sold at auction when she was past work. An Irishman bid her off for $5; but finding that she was not worth even that to him, was about to sell her again, when the colored members of the Presbyterian church, shocked at the scandal, gave him the price he paid, and have supported her now for five years. They have also supported for ten years an old man whom his master turned adrift when he was no longer of any service to him, telling him that he was now free, and might take care of himself.

Another of the favorite arguments for slavery has been thoroughly exploded by a knowledge of facts—the alleged comparative degradation and wretchedness of the free colored population. So far from this being the case, there is actually a colored aristocracy, the most exclusive members of which are those who were called "bona fide free"—that is, as I understand, those whose freedom dates back beyond a certain date. These are well educated, prosperous, and highly respected. They own lands and houses; they did own slaves, and many of them sympathized (or professed to sympathize) with the rebellion. There is a striking analogy between them and those wealthy plebeian families who, in the early period of the Roman Republic, were allied with the patricians against their own order. And just as the Licinii and Sextii, when the contest became one for political equality, came forward as the champions of the plebeians, so now these wealthy slaveholding mulatto families of Charleston are fully identified in interest with the mass of the colored people, and are becoming leaders among them, while the old jealousy between blacks and mulattoes is disappearing.

MARCEL.

SMALL SAVINGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

The savings banks would seem to be all that could be desired as places of safe deposit for small sums, yet if the object be to enable the laboring classes to invest their earnings with the least trouble, they fail in some respects. I live in a town of 5,000 people, in which there is no bank. A few days since I offered to give each of my servants ten dollars, if they would add to it the sum due them for wages for the past three months, and deposit the whole sum in a savings bank, to which they all agreed. I took the money to the nearest savings bank, and was there told that unless I would act as trustee, the girls must themselves come to the bank and sign the books. This involves the loss of half a day's time and the expense of the trip. Now, I suppose one girl out of two would be deterred from making a deposit by these necessary requirements, while a day laborer must lose half a day to a day, according to his distance from a bank.

There might be a very simple method adopted by which the great mass of the savings of the people would be invested in United States bonds, and every possible facility given to the depositor. Every town or city has its treasurer, who is under bonds for the faithful performance of his duty. Let each State pass a law that each town or city may, by vote, authorize the town treasurer to receive on deposit any sum above one dollar and not exceeding one thousand dollars, adopting the formalities customary with savings banks and giving a book in the usual form, not transferable; the treasurer to invest such moneys, in his name as treasurer, in registered bonds of the United States. Interest on deposits to date from the first of the month next ensuing, and to be paid each six months or added to the deposit. A certain notice to be given in case of withdrawal of the deposit, to enable a sale of bonds to be made when necessary. The town or city to be responsible for the payment of all such deposits. All such business to be under the general supervision of the selectmen, and the signature of one or more of them to be required for the transfer and sale of the bonds. It would be necessary for the treasurer to keep a moderate sum uninvested to meet calls, but as the rule would be that deposits would more than equal withdrawals, a sale of bonds would seldom be required.

It will be objected that the town would lose some interest—a small matter if thrift be encouraged among the people; also, that more business capacity would be required on the part of the treasurers than many of them now have. If such is the case, it is time a new treasurer should be chosen. More time would be required of the treasurer, and consequently higher pay. Again the increased thrift induced among the people would compensate. The advantages are obvious. In small country towns the treasurer would appoint one day in each month to receive and pay deposits; in larger ones, one day in a week; in cities, every day. Every laboring man or woman could easily attend. The mass of the people would have more interest in Government bonds. They would receive the full income from their money without deductions. They would have non-transferable deposit-books, instead of transferable Treasury notes, easily lost or spent. The guaranty of the town would be esteemed a great safeguard by the ignorant or half-educated. The disloyal voter, if any such existed in the town, would have his property mortgaged as the guarantor of the credit of the United States, by making the town responsible for the deposits and investments.

I am confident that some one accustomed to such matters could easily frame the necessary laws, and I hope to see some State lead off soon. By such methods the evils of a national debt may be mitigated, and many benefits derived; for it would be unsafe to authorize the investment of small deposits by towns or cities in anything but registered United States bonds; and if this scheme should prove to be an inducement to thrift and saving, it would be best that an amount of debt equal to such deposits should always be due from the United States to the people. Some action of Congress might be needed to simplify the sale and payment of the interest on registered bonds.

The main safeguard of this country is in the local self-government, the pure democracy of the town meeting. Everything which tends to secure a selection of the most honest and best men of the town for town officers, without regard to party politics, gives strength to the country. What could more induce the selection of the best men than to make the town officers the trustees of the savings of the mass of the people?

I believe there would at once be a marked improvement in the character of the selectmen and of the town treasurers, and in saying this I do not mean to say that they are not now well chosen.

A.

HALDEMAN'S AFFIXES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

As a general rule an author should not send explanations to his reviewer, both the book and the reviewer being accessible; but as my own brevity or obscurity has misled you and may mislead others, I offer a few explanations, thankful for your hints; for, according to Sir Fretful Plagiary, "What is the purpose of shewing a work to a friend if you do n't mean to profit by his opinion?"

2. Books on philology are to be judged by the general scope and not by detached etymologies, where great latitude is allowable. In my analytic orthography ("Trevelyan Prize Essay," 1860) I have stated that "Port Tobacco in Maryland is a port at which tobacco is shipped, yet port and tobacco had nothing to do with the original naming of the town." Here a most plausible and 'morally certain' etymology is disputed. On the other hand, the "Atlantic Monthly" (August, 1860) plausibly refers the colloquial verb mosey (to go away, be off) to vamose (referring also to the name Moses as an assigned etymology), yet the word has an Indoeuropean root, and a frequentative mizzle, which is defined under quite another mizzle (to drizzle) in Worcester and the new Webster.

3. In the new Webster there is a cut of an impossible nautilus, with impossible sails, "a kind of shellfish, furnished with a membrane" (the figure shows two) "that serves it as a sail." In the "Affixes," p. 77, nautilus is defined as "a little ship (its shape being that of the prow of a ship); a shellfish fabled to sail." Here the difference is between the nautilus of poetry with its pretended sails, and the ship-shaped nautilus of fact without sails.

4. You say that "we unquestionably want" such a treatise, and I will be pleased when my pioneer work shall be succeeded by a better, with as much original, necessary, and useful matter for the student.

5. If smelt and melt are cognates, I care not whether they are regarded as different forms of the same word, the difference is in the s, which I regard as equally a prefix with that in sombre, where it represents sub.

6. Of such single letters it is truly said that "it is very difficult to trace their origin or their signification." Yet a principal feature of the work is the attention given to these short modifiers, which the reviewer considers should "hardly be regarded as prefixes in the usual sense," and much of the force of the criticism results from his mode of arguing this side of the question.

7. To damage my prefix m, he selects musk (Welsh mwsg, from mws an effluvium) and mustard (Welsh mwstardd, with a Welsh etymology), apparently because he can cite Latin originals for them, whilst he neglects those for which he is without such originals, as m-esh and m-aggot, where the m is not only a prefix, but one which comes up to the reviewer's standard of a prefix derived from a distinct word or words.

8. Important single letter heads are unnoticed, like v-, p-, f-, w-, t-, in brave, plate, flat, waste, twink; the four distinct heads of -th (with the observations appended), -p in yelp, and the adverbial suffixes -n, -r, -s, in when, where, else.

9. "Mr. Haldeman ought to pay a little more attention to French and Latin before he writes again." This remark was made because I chose to refer buckler to the Welsh bwccledr rather than to the French bouclier, which Diez (p. 575) refers to Latin buccula, a little cheek. Latin moschus was also known to me, but not muscus as a synonym.

10. Hȳbrid for hybrid I justify by the Latin hibrida, being distrustful of modern dictionary forms which put Greek letters in Latin words. "The carpensian Virgil and that of the Vatican have sulpur for SULFUR sulphur." Hald. Latin Pronunciation, 1851, p. 39.

11. If Greek and Welsh belong to the same stock of languages, it may happen that a word may be referred to either or both, and Welsh may afford light where Greek is obscure. Two etymologies are fused in widow-finch, and in the modern word buxom, and whilst I refer (p. 167) willing to the French voulant, I admit that in some localities it was more likely to have been taken from the Germanic willig.

12. In regard to mistake and remiss, the text admits of the inference of the reviewer, but remiss is referred to MITTO on p. 254 below. Barren was taken from the Gothic form, as in un-bairand-ane (not bearing fruit). John xv. 2.

13. As Pierre Belon, in his history of fishes (1551), says that he mentions the sturgeon only "pour monstrer que nous n'ayons pas ignoré quel il est" —so the few expressions like "Aztec accidental" mean that whilst I know that there is a Gaelic and an Aztec prefix a-, agreeing in meaning with Latin a- or ab-, yet I regard a similarity of this kind between Aztec and Latin as accidental rather than an evidence of cognation. But as others might fall upon these seeming marks of affinity, and suppose that I had not observed them, it was deemed useful thus to caution the student against them; and whilst I doubt the supposed affinities between Hebrew and Greek, I give an occasional example for those who differ from me.

14. I have not quoted Finnish (to the employment of which in English etymology the reviewer objects), but any one who uses either Finnish or Welsh may cite the distinguished Diefenbach in justification.

15. As stated on page 10, § 3, the book was not intended to be exhaustive, but a New York publisher's announcement has stated that a work of the kind, intended to be exhaustive, was in preparation, and this may have hurried my own. A work on affixes is also under way in London.

16. I do not justify the spelling of "altho'" but as I write it thus the printer "followed copy." It would have been well had he done so in other places. Thus there was no A.M. in the manuscript title, and whilst a pencilled note forbade a full point after the date 1865, a comma stands there. On page 20, second line below (and in the middle of page 54) F instead of Ꝼ got in for the capital letter of the Greek spiritus asper, which was correctly given in the proof, and appears in its proper form under HETERO- and HOLO-.

17. From verb and adverbial I have deduced a word verbial, because verbal relates to words rather than to verbs. In objecting to hȳbrid this seems to have been overlooked

18. I do not wish any English authority to be responsible for my shortcomings. I owed it to Mr. Furnival to make the acknowledgment in my prefatory, but the manuscript will show that his pencillings have not been many.

19. The charge of English influence cannot be substantiated from the book. I have been but little in England; I reject the English pronunciation of Latin; I know not how the English pronounce Greek, and I have been more familiar with French and German scientific works than with English ones.

20. Finally, if (in regard to the Philological Society) "we" of THE NATION "place little value on any of its lucubrations," "we" stultify ourselves in thus confessing our inability to appreciate the merits of the eminent philologist, Richard Garnett. S. S. H.

COLUMBIA, PA., Sept. 2, 1865.

[Mr. Haldeman's book has now been twice reviewed in THE NATION, once by us and once by himself. We trust he is satisfied. We have departed from our rule in admitting his reply, and we have done so partly on account of the peculiar nature of his subject, and partly in order to allow him to present to the public his own explanation of the imperfections of his work, which is, that it was "hurried" into the market to anticipate another publisher, who had announced a book of the same kind "intended to be exhaustive." The admission is something unusual.—ED. NATION.]

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

IX.

AUGUST 29, 1865.

LATE this forenoon I left Lynchburg, and set out on a horseback journey into North Carolina. The weather has been bright and hot all day, and the road hilly and dusty, so that I have ridden slowly, and travelled no more than twenty-one miles. In that distance I found but one person going the same way with myself, although the country, especially in the vicinity of the city, is pretty thickly settled, and a good half the land lying along the road is cleared and laid out in farms. The man was a German from Hesse-Darmstadt, going out to look at some land which he hoped to purchase.

He was in the United States five years, he said, and had been forced to spend two of it in the Confederate army. Except for that, he liked America better than Germany; more money could be made here than there, and the climate pleased him much better. He came to Virginia because he had a good heap of friends here, and had found it a good State; but the Virginian people did not like foreigners. They said if it had not been for the foreigners in the Yankee army, the South never would have been whipped. He reckoned that was so. Nearly half the Northern soldiers were German, Irish, and Dutch. But the people round here did not want to part with their land to anybody; they thought it made them great to own much land. He wished the Government would confiscate, so that land would become cheap.

I said that in the Lynchburg papers I had seen quite a large number of farms advertised as for sale. Yes, he said, but they wanted more than the right price; it was one of those farms that he was then going to look at, but he would not give twenty-five or thirty dollars an acre. He would buy or lease two hundred acres and raise grain; his brother would help him, and they would hire as few negroes as they could. Some would be necessary, but all of them were bad—great liars and unfaithful workers.

As I rode along, negroes were everywhere busy stripping off the corn-blades and tying them into small bundles, which are hung upon the stalks to be cured by the sun. Later in the day they could be seen coming up out of the fields, carrying on their heads great stacks of the dried fodder, which is at once stowed away in blade-houses. These are small buildings with walls of logs, between which are left wide apertures for the admission of air, as the fodder is apt to grow musty. Besides blade stripping no field work seemed to be going on, except here and there a little mowing, and on one farm a white man and a boy were laying a stone wall, the first I have seen in the State. Out of the towns, the zigzag fence of rails is almost universal.

The surface of the country over which I have travelled to-day is rolling and much diversified. The landscape is a good deal shut in by woods, but often to-day I have been able to see the distant Peaks of Otter, dark blue against the pale blue of the horizon, and almost to be mistaken for clouds, except that every other cloud was fleecy white. The soil seemed fertile; there was abundance of timber, the apple trees and the late peach trees were laden with fruit, and all the crops appeared to be thriving well. Indian corn was everywhere, and I saw occasional patches of cotton, tobacco, and broom-corn growing near the houses. More frequent were fields of sorghum. But a small portion of the land is under cultivation.

The people living in this section of the country have no railway or water communication with their markets, and all produce designed for Lynchburg and Danville has to be transported by wagon. I have met seven or eight of these heavy vehicles to-day, toiling slowly along the road. They are canvass-covered, drawn by four or six mules or oxen, and loaded with tobacco in hogsheads or packed loose. Some were driven by negroes, but more usually they were in charge of white men, who walked beside the team, while on top of the load, among the hay and corn-blades, were the women and children going up to the city to make purchases. Baskets of eggs and chickens are hung at the end of the cart, and a bag of meal or of cooked provisions. Besides these parties and the man from Hesse-Darmstadt I believe I have met no one to-day.

At sunset I arrived at the Old Stand, which, as a small shield above the door announces, is a house of "Entertainment by S. Simmons." It may serve as a sample of the Virginia country taverns. The house stands in a large yard of short clean grass shaded by tall red oaks; it is two stories high, unpainted, and without window-shutters. Beside the door is a little shelf with a water-pail on it, and a drinking gourd hangs just above. The corn-house, blade-house, stable, and cow-yard are across the road. The dwelling contains four rooms; on the ground-floor one has a bed in it, a chair, and a clock; the other has half a dozen chairs, a table, and a chest of drawers, on which are a three weeks old copy of the New York Daily News and four or six books—a "Life of Whitefield," "Wesley's Journal," and some more modern Methodist publications.

No one about the house seemed to be stirring, so I tied my horse at the gate and walked in. An old man with a handkerchief thrown over his face to protect it from the flies lay asleep on the bed, and not wishing to awake him I read the News for more than half an hour. Then he came out, had my horse fed, and told me I might stay all night. His wife had gone away for an hour or two—when she came back I could have some supper, such as it was.

He was poorly himself, had a misery in his head, and had to get sleep when he could. Was I used to travelling that road? No, I said, I had never been over it till to-day. He thought he 'd never seen me before; did n't hardly reckon I was a Virginian; was n't raised in these parts, anyhow? From Massachusetts, hey? That 's one o' the Northern States. The people up there want the niggers freed, do n't they?

"Yes," I said, "they want them free, and, indeed, they think they are freed now."

"Allow they 're free, do they? The war freed 'em, hey?"

"Yes, the Emancipation Proclamation and the war. Do n't you think they 're free?"

"No, I do n't. They seem to think they be: go here and there and everywhere, as if they was free; but we can tell better when the next Congress meets and after the Supreme Court has decided. Niggers can't do nothin' with themselves. Of course not. How are they behaving in Lynchburg?"

"Very well, I believe."

"No, they a' n't. Up at Acquia Creek they 're rioting, and so they 'll do everywhere."

He never owned any of 'em, he said, and never wanted to. Did n't they let 'em vote in Massachusetts? Did I belong to any church? No, I answered, I did not; did he? Yes, he was a Methodist. What made him ask me the question was because he had heard that the President was going to do something or other to make the South Church unite with the North. I had heard nothing of it, I said; did he think they would come together of their own accord? No, he did n't; they could n't unite, and they ought n't to. He thought the people of the North and South had better just have nothing to say to each other; better keep apart for a time, anyhow. Did I want to buy a farm? He 'd sell that one for twenty-five dollars an acre; there were three hundred acres of good land, all in good order. He 'd never been raised to farming, and wanted to give it up.

He asked me many questions about Massachusetts—how large it was; what was the capital; if the people mostly followed farming or sheep-raising; if they lived as well as the people of Virginia; if the Methodists were a numerous and powerful sect there; if the Northern people did n't hate the Southerners; if Jeff. Davis would be hung; all of which I answered as well as I could, but without securing credence for my assertion that the North could not be said to hate the South. Massachusetts was ahead of Virginia, he reckoned, because more emigrants came there and there were more small farms. Perhaps Massachusetts people might live better than folks in Virginia, but he 'd heerd that they lived mostly on fried peas with bacon in 'em. Virginia people used to live pretty well once, before the war.

While we talked his wife returned, and we were soon summoned to supper. The landlady apologized for the scantiness of the meal, and said the war had accustomed her to poor living; in fact, she hardly knew now when it was necessary to make an apology. Coffee without sugar, corn-bread and butter, and a dish of boiled eggs were set before us, together with a pitcher of buttermilk. Supper was served in a little kitchen behind the main dwelling house, and connected with it by a covered plank-walk. In a corner of the room stood a very large wooden loom, in which the landlady said she had woven all the cloth used in the family for all purposes. Now that peace had come, she reckoned she 'd depend on my country for things of that kind and let the spinning-wheel and loom rest awhile.

The old man's opinion that slavery is in some way to be restored, or that, at any rate, uncompensated emancipation will not be permitted by the judiciary, nor by Congress, when the whole country is represented in that body, is an opinion that I have more than once heard expressed, and sometimes by men of more intelligence than the tavern-keeper. One day last week, I walked into a hotel parlor in Lynchburg, where quite a crowd of men were listening to the very amusing talk of "a true-blue, dyed-in-the-wool, Daniel Webster, old-line Whig, sir." By anecdotes and original comicalities he kept his audience in continual laughter. While I heard it, his conversation was, for the most part, a humorous but caustic tirade against the Democratic party, which, he said, was chargeable with all the calamities of the past four years. Democracy had killed those nephews of his who fell fighting for the Confederacy; Democracy had dragged him through thirty-two battles and got him ridiculously whipped at the end of 'em; Democracy had reduced the Southern people to corn-feed for the last three years; Democracy had piled up a national debt on the South that had all been—well, call it paid, gentlemen. But the Yankee debt, the United States debt, our debt, if you will have it so—that 's going to be repudiated in less than twelve months. Democracy had emancipated all the niggers—took away his, whom he thought a d—d sight more of than of all the Democrats since General Jackson. However, they were all staying with him now, and in less than a year every nigger in the South would be a slave again. There are two words about their freedom."

"Come, come, Uncle Billy," said a bystander, "you one of Governor Peirpont's Commissioners of Elections and talking like that! What becomes of your oath?"

"Oath? I've taken every oath that 's come into ——— county since General Lee's surrender, and I 'll take all the rest that come; and I 'll keep 'em all. But the Supreme Court has got to talk about this thing yet, you know, and so has Congress—the Congress of the United States, you know; when they 've talked we 'll keep our mouths shut, but till then we 'll talk. I 've got Andy's pardon right here in my pocket, and I can say what I like. Besides, my son, if I had n't, I 'm not afraid to die; I never cast a Democratic vote in my life—yes, just one: I did cast one vote for that d—d infernal scoundrel of a Jeff. Davis. But I 've bitterly repented of that."

"You need n't," said one of his hearers, "that 's the best vote you ever cast in your life."

"See here, my friend," said the commissioner, "when I began life I had one most important rule to guide me, and it brought me luck and a good conscience: whenever they brought along anything Democratic, 'No, I thank you,' says I, 'I would n't choose any, thank you.' I departed from my rule once, voted for Jeff. Davis and secession, and after being whipped for four years under one Democratic President I had to go and beg a pardon from another. Henceforth, I 'm subjugated, and I 'm a Whig."

AUGUST 30, 1865.

This morning at six o'clock I had breakfast, which consisted of the same materials that composed our supper last night, and started for Pittsylvania Court-House, which is fifty-five miles from Lynchburg.

The sky for half the day was cloudy, and the day pleasanter for travelling than yesterday. Four miles of riding brought me to the Roanoke River, which is here not more than a hundred and twenty-five yards wide, flowing between green banks with a strong and rapid stream. In this part of its course the people call it the Staunton River, while fifty miles above and the same distance below it gets its name of Roanoke. The bridge which formerly spanned it was destroyed in May last by General Rosser, acting under the orders of General Johnston, and travellers are ferried across.

The journey of to-day has been more lonesome than that of yesterday, the country being less thickly settled, and the road for a much greater part of the distance being entirely in the forest. In many places the hills were very steep, and the road was often rugged where the rains had cut deep channels and gulleys in the earth, or had washed bare the rough ledges of rock. Some of these places were so dangerous that turn-outs had been made by the wagoners, and for a few rods the traveller, forsaking the road, rides along among the trees, and emerges into the beaten track after he has passed the obstruction, which is sometimes a gulley or a ledge, sometimes the fallen trunk of a great tree which has lain so long unrotted that the old road marks are half obliterated, sometimes when the road crosses a low or spongy spot. Obstructions of the latter sort were however oftener overcome by corduroying the wet place with branches of trees and rails. I had ridden several hours without meeting any one, and began to be doubtful if I had not made a wrong turn at some one of the many forks in the road; so I waited for an hour at noon to rest my horse and to see if some traveller would not overtake me. The sun was shining bright, for the clouds of the morning had wholly disappeared, but there was not the faintest breeze nor the least sound in the forest. It was so hot and so still, with nothing to be seen but the trees and the sand, and it had been so monotonously still and dull all day, that I could not help thinking that people living in such a country were excusable, amid their dearth of amusements and mental excitants of any kind, if they busied themselves with sectarian differences in theology and speculative questions in politics.

As no traveller passed, I mounted and rode along, giving careful study to the guide-posts as I passed them. Some of them were completely covered with pencillings. One, besides its inscription, "Lynchburg, 40 miles," was filled with messages and directions. I copied two or three: "B. C., Captain Wofford's Georgians will go by way of the Court-House;" "Captain Williams—Charlotte Battery—we will go through Pittsylvania C. H.;" "Jack, go the road with the pine branch;" "W. H. B., Raleigh, N. C., gone along April 5, 1865."

I found that I had not lost my way, and pushing on found clearings becoming more frequent, and the land as I got lower improving in appearance, but still seeming less fertile than what I saw yesterday. By the roadside, just before going into the village, I came upon a team of mules feeding beside one of the tobacco wagons mentioned before. An old negro and a lad of seventeen or eighteen years old were sitting beside a fire they had kindled near a spring, the boy watching a corn-cake baking in an iron pan, and the man kneading together water and white corn meal in a wooden tray. Slices of bacon were already fried.

They had been to Danville, they said, with leaf tobacco, and were now almost home again. The tobacco was two or three years old; no one had raised any tobacco this year. They would have been five days away from home when they got back to the plantation, but it was good fun.

Pittsylvania County Court-House, or Competition, or Chatham as it is called on the map, is a small village containing three or four pretty churches, a fine court-house, and many handsome dwelling houses. It is a pretty little place, and once was busily engaged in the manufacture of tobacco, but since the war nothing whatever has been done,

My fare at the one tavern which supplies the place of four that once existed here seemed to furnish proof of the exhausted condition of the country. Nothing was set on the table but butter-milk and corn-bread. There is meat in the country, the landlord said, and flour is worth fifteen dollars a barrel, haul it yourself at that. He was working his farm without negroes—himself and his boys did everything. The boys—three or four grown-up young men—were very sulky at the supper-table because of a freshet which had destroyed a good deal of their corn.

"Oh," said one of them, stretching himself after supper, "I 'd rather be in the war ten years than pull fodder two days. D——n farming; it 's enough to kill a horse; it 's just fit for a nigger."

AUGUST 31 1865.

My road to-day has led me through a country much like what I saw on Tuesday. There are more clearings and more cultivated land than I saw yesterday, and the soil seemed more productive. During all these days the dwellings which I have passed have been such as were described in a previous letter; at rare intervals one sees the mansion-house with pretensions to elegance and comfort, the log-cabin plastered with mud occurs very frequently, and somewhat less often is seen the ordinary farm-house.

At noon to-day I stopped for awhile at one of these log-cabins, rather larger than most of them, but still having but one room and a loft. There was a glazed window, however, and the board floor was beautifully white and clean. As I dismounted at the gate, the man of the house walked down the path to meet me and offered his hand with much cordiality of manner, inviting me to come in and take a seat. His farm was a small one, containing only a hundred and twenty-five acres of land, and he worked it himself without the help of negroes.

"Never owned a nigger, sir, and never would hire one except a gal to do house work. Too much drivin' and overseein'. They 're wanderin' round now since the crops are laid by, so that the roads are full of 'em. I hear they 're dying, heaps of 'em, in Danville."

"Have they been working for wages?"

"Board, I reckon. Nobody knew what to do with 'em. The country's full of orders and reports about 'em—some say they 're all to be sent up North and kept thar, and some say that the Government 's sending 'em all to Cuba, and sellin' 'em for slaves. I don't know what they are doin' with 'em, but I wish they 'd clar 'em out o' this. They 're in the way here; the abolitionists like 'em and they 'd better take 'em. I hear that the abolitionists talk of taking away our right to vote, and giving it to the nigger. Pretty ridic'lous idee."

While her husband was talking, the wife, a lean, pale woman, sat nursing an infant, which after a little while went asleep and was laid away in its crib. Then the woman, going over to the mantel, took down a small circular tin box and began to dip snuff, a process I had never before witnessed. She held in one hand the box, and in the other a bit of stick chewed at the end, so that the displaced fibres formed a rude sort of brush. This she moistened by putting it into her mouth. Then it was dipped into the snuff and rubbed upon the teeth and gums both on the back and front teeth and on the upper and lower jaws. Every little while, being a neat woman, as the appearance of her house indicated, she walked across the room and spit carefully into the fire-place, after which she replenished the supply of snuff in the dip and again applied it to her teeth. By-and-bye the box was returned to its place upon the mantel, and the woman, holding the dip-stick in her mouth, began to talk with me about the social position of the negro in the North, for by this time they had learned I was from Massachusetts.

"Thar was a Yankee man," said she, "was travellin' by here, and he had a nigger gal with him that he was goin' to take up into your country. He wanted to rest and drink water, and I made him welcome to come in; so in he came, and in came the nigger gal and sot down in this yer same cheer. Thar war n't nobody home but me, but I went across to her and took her by the shoulder. 'You walk out o' this,' says I. The Yankee he spoke up, and wanted to know why I did that; in his country, he said, she 'd be as good as anybody. 'Well,' says I, 'she a' n't goin' to walk in here and make herself even to me. In my country white folks is white folks, and niggers is brought up to know their place, and she can't set down in my room when I 'm in presence.'"

Leaving the farm-house, it was not long before I overtook an old negro driving a cart to Danville loaded with peaches, sweet potatoes, and chickens. The horse was very old, very thin, and galled in many places, as the horses of negroes in the South are apt to be, for they usually are harnessed with tackle made up of rope-ends, bits of hide, and old rags. The man himself was about sixty years old.

He was not going up to Danville for marketing purposes only, he said; he was going to see the provost-marshal up there. His master had turned him and his wife off the plantation, and he did not know where to go. The master had turned off several families besides his, and he supposed they 'd have to get some of their kin to take them into their houses, or else the Government would have to feed and shelter them. I asked if his employer had given him nothing as wages for his work this year, or if he had done any work. Yes, he said, he had tended the house-garden all the year; his wife was the cook for the master's family; one of the sons had been a ploughman, another had been almost a full hand, and still another had been a table-boy for two or three years. His master had fed the family and given them summer clothes, but had not given winter clothing nor shoes. I asked him if he had been working under an agreement this year. He took a paper from his pocket-book and showed it to me as his contract with his master. I copied it into my note-book:

"Under an agreement between me and James, a man formerly my property, I am to deliver him ten barrels of corn, at my residence, when shucked from the present crop, in full of all claims against me for wages this year. The same is to be delivered to any one he may sell said corn to, provided the terms of said agreement are complied with. Said payment is in full of his wages, his wife's and children's, who live with me at this time. Said agreement was made 19th of August, 1865. (Signed) J. M. W."

New corn is now selling in Danville at two dollars per barrel, and it is expected that it will be cheaper than that before Christmas. Mr. W., just after the surrender of Lee, made a verbal promise to his negroes that they should have a part of whatever crops they would raise. The reason why his written acknowledgment of debt bears so late a date, is because it was not till the middle of August that he definitely decided what quantity of corn should be given to each hand, and because he did not care to send away any of his laborers before that time. The paper was given them at the same time with a notice to quit the plantation.

The old negro declared that the people on that plantation had never worked so hard as they have this year. So it would always be, he thought, if the masters would send away the overseers, and work the farms on shares. Under such a system more provisions would be made than have ever yet been raised in Virginia. The people would like it better than wages. He would himself, and all the people would, he believed.

But the masters would n't do that. They would rather send away the old niggers and all with too many children, and hire the strong and young.

There is some truth in the assertion which I have everywhere heard made as I came through Campbell and Pittsylvania, that the negroes are flocking into the towns. In July last, in the city of Danville, 1,329 persons received rations from the Government, 1,079 of these being whites, and 250 negroes. On the 1st of August General Curtis' prohibitory order went into effect, and during that month the number of white people rationed was only 413, while the number of negroes increases and becomes 603; the destitute colored population of the town, it thus appears, having been more than doubled by additions from some source or other.

The officers of the Freedmen's Bureau here stationed say that it is true that some negroes are leaving their homes, but that in their opinion, in the great majority of cases, it is the negro who abandons his employer, and not the master who sets his servants adrift.

ENGLISH FEELING TOWARDS AMERICA.

LONDON, August 26.

THE new correspondent whom the Times newspaper has sent out to represent it in the United States, has lately been writing in a tone which contrasts strangely with that adopted by his predecessor. To do this gentleman justice, he has said a good deal which is true concerning the North, and which—to those who take their opinions ready-made from the leading journal—must have been surprisingly new. Amongst other candid confessions, he has discovered that the ill-feeling which he believes exists in America towards England is not as utterly unreasonable as it is commonly supposed to be. In a long letter of two columns, published during the present week, he has endeavored to explain why it is Americans are unfriendly towards England. As in this explanation he is perforce obliged to ignore the systematic misrepresentation of which the Times was the chief author throughout the war, his theory is not a very intelligible one to those who are unable to read between the lines. The perusal, however, of his letter has tempted me to write somewhat at length concerning the converse proposition. I should like, if possible, to explain to you what is the feeling of England towards America; to what extent and for what reasons it is an unfriendly one. In writing on such a subject, it is of no use to look out for nothing but pleasant things to say. Nor do I think that a rose-color picture of our sentiments towards you as a nation would do anything, in as far as it had any effect at all, to increase the friendliness of our international relations. Just as it is well that we should know why you as a nation have not a cordial feeling towards us, so it is well, also, you should know why we, to a certain extent, reciprocate the sentiment.

Now, in order to make my view, whether right or wrong, intelligible to you, I must explain what I mean by England. As regards foreign countries, I take England to be that distinct but not easily definable body which constitutes the "governing classes." This body, roughly speaking, comprises the peerage, the landed gentry, professional men, merchants, independent farmers, and well-to-do shopkeepers. In home questions, the uneducated and unrepresented classes have an enormous influence, but on foreign matters they exercise no influence, because they care nothing about them. I have no doubt you may have read a good deal in the speeches of mob orators, like Mr. Mason Jones, about the sympathy of the "masses" for the North. At the risk of dispelling a pleasing illusion, I must say there was a great deal of humbug about this talk. The small knot of "intelligent mechanics" who attend working-men's colleges and take the lead in trades unions, were undoubtedly earnest supporters of the Federal cause. Their support is not a matter to be ignored, still less despised; but it would be as absurd to take them as specimens of the million as it was for the historic three tailors of Tooley Street to call themselves the people of England. I wish heartily such were the case, but I know that it is not. The overwhelming majority of the English working-classes know very little and care less about America or any other foreign country. Their struggle for life is too keen a one to permit them to do so. As far, I think, as a body they had any view at all on the question between North and South, it was in favor of the former. A sort of blind instinct taught them that the war of free labor against slave was one connected with their own rights, and, what was much more, the accounts of the emigrants who have settled in the West have taught the English working-man to regard America as a sort of land of promise. But beyond this I do not truly believe their sympathy extended. In the manufacturing districts, where the working-classes, as a rule, are most educated and prosperous, this sympathy was the strongest. But, to the great bulk of our laboring population, America is a name, and a name only. At the time when the relations between England and the United States seemed most embroiled, I recollect reading in some American paper that the British aristocracy were baffled in their desire for war by the sturdy resistance of the hard-handed sons of labor—or words to that effect. I much doubt there being any substantial truth in this assertion. Somehow or other pugnacity is the one British characteristic which steadily survives poverty; and at its outset a war is never unpopular with English workingmen. I do not say for one moment that a war with America would not have called forth violent opposition from a large section of our laboring classes; but I question the opposition having been at all of an universal character.

Thus, in estimating the feeling of England towards America, I believe the sentiments of the working masses may be left out of consideration. There are many questions of a home character on which their sentiments cannot safely be ignored; but the relations of England with America or any foreign country are not one of them. With a view to the policy of the two countries, the important consideration for Americans is how our governing classes—giving the widest signification to that vague term—are disposed towards them. Now, if you wish to form any just estimate of this subject, I must warn you, as a matter of fact, not to attach too much weight to the utterances of that party of which the Morning Star is the organ, and Mr. Bright the chief exponent. On most points, I sympathize with their views; but I know perfectly well that their views are in no sense representative of English feelings. I have known Americans in former years—I do n't know whether they are to be found still—who were much more English than the English Anglo-maniacs; they held that whatever England did was right. In the same way, we have Americo-maniacs—if you will excuse my saying so—who will not admit the possibility of your being ever wrong, in any conceivable event. The exaggeration of their partizanship deprives it of any influence. I believe myself that the signal failure of the Morning Star to obtain any hold on public opinion during the war, arose not so much from the unpopularity of the views it advocated, as from the indiscriminating character of its pro-northern advocacy. As an illustration of what I mean, I think I may safely assert that you, as a nation, will be doing right or wrong according to the decision you arrive at with reference to the punishment of the leaders of the rebellion. You may be right in executing them as rebels; you may be right in refusing to exercise your full privilege of punishment. But you cannot be equally right in either case. Yet everybody knows beforehand that if you were to hang Jefferson Davis, the Star would dilate upon the dignity of your vengeance; while, if you spare him, it will dwell upon the magnanimity of your forbearance. On this account, as I have said, you must not take the views of the party represented by the Star as expressing more than the opinions of a small, though not unimportant, section of our community. If you were to do so, you would be liable to commit very much the same blunder as the Emperor Nicholas did, when he considered that the views of the Manchester peace party were those of England.

Nor do I think that you ought to attach undue importance to the friendly reception which Americans personally have received of late in England. To do ourselves justice, I think our national animosities are not of a personal character. During the time when the pro-Southern sympathy was the strongest in this country, the most ardent Northerner would not, I think, have met with anything but a cordial welcome here, supposing him to have been furnished with good letters of introduction and to have been of a class which would have ensured him civility in his own country. Americans resident in England throughout the last five years will, I believe, bear me out in saying that they find no disposition to regard them with anything but friendliness. In the same way, however, all Englishmen who were in the States during the period when the irritation against England was most vehement will, I know, agree with me, that personally their reception was of the kindest. As individuals, there are so many points of sympathy and common interest between an Englishman and an American, that it could not well be otherwise. Moreover, if I am to speak the candid truth, at a time when English interest was to a great extent absorbed in the American struggle, an American, of either North or South, was something of a lion; and the leonine genus is always popular with us socially. But, in spite of this personal good-will, the anti-American feeling was a very general one. Amongst the Dissenting community, sympathy with the North, as against the South, was very general, but I am not sure it was so upon grounds you would altogether approve. The truth is, the anti-slavery feeling is immensely powerful amongst the classes from whom the different Nonconformist bodies are composed. To a great extent this section of our public commands the borough elections, and I believe myself the maintenance of our neutrality was in no small measure due to the fact that the borough members knew their seats would be unsafe if they voted in favor of intervention in behalf of the slave-owning Confederacy. The steadfastness with which the world of small shopkeepers and tradesmen—a world habitually accused of extreme narrowness of vision—adhered to the old national hatred of slavery is, in my judgment, an honor to the country; but I do not think this steadfastness can be truly ascribed to any very distinct affection for America or her people.

My own belief is, that the attitude of the British Government expressed, as it does usually, the national sentiments with considerable accuracy. Laying aside moot questions like that of the Alabama, you yourselves admit that our policy was a sincerely neutral one. We—I am now speaking of ourselves as a nation represented by our Government—did not believe in your success in restoring the Union; we did not exactly wish you to succeed, but we had no intention of taking active measures to oppose your efforts. We were spectators of your struggle, not only neutral but unsympathetic. And this was, I think, as nearly as I can express it, the national tone of mind throughout the continuance of your civil war. You complain of our want of sympathy, and in so doing you complain justly; but it is well you should understand the true nature of that want of which you complain. I see it often stated that our lukewarmness in your cause arose from the aristocratic character of our Government, and our consequent distaste for free republican institutions. The explanation is plausible, but incorrect. Political convictions of any kind had very little to do with our sympathies as between North and South. The Tory party in Parliament and out of it are naturally enough opposed to anything which bears the name of democracy, and their traditions taught them to regard anything which threatened evil to America as a boon to their cause; but this antipathy to democracy is of too abstract a character to have much hold upon Englishmen, and, moreover, was not shared by the great majority, who profess liberal principles of some shade or other.

Political prejudices had, of course, something to do with our lack of sympathy, but they are not sufficient to account for it. The feeling was too widespread a one to be assigned to any local or partial cause. For my own part, I attribute it partly to social prejudices and still more to our passionate feeling of nationality. Till the war altered our views, there was a general impression amongst educated Englishmen that Americans were wanting in those virtues and qualities on which we pride ourselves most highly. The caricatured portraits of American life which most of our English travellers had presented to their countrymen had much to do with this, but still some of it was due to a sort of intolerance eminently characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race. We can pardon a Frenchman for not being what we are, but that a man who speaks English should not speak and dress and act exactly as we do ourselves, is in our eyes a grievous sin. We English and Americans are, I think, too like ever to do full justice to each other. Cousins in private life never think much of cousins; and the rule holds good to the relations between kindred nations. All the good in you we think due to your connection with us; all the evil we deem due to your separate existence. In the same way I have often noticed an assumption on the part of Americans that all the merits of our common ancestors have been appropriated by yourselves, while all the defects of our common character are to be credited to us. Both views are equally natural and equally unphilosophical.

But a far more potent sense of our lack of sympathy was a conviction that the United States is a power whose magnitude is inimical to the interests of England. You are the only power in the world whom we dread in any way as a rival. A foreigner reading our newspapers during one of our periodical fits of self-depreciation would fancy there was not a continental nation whose increasing strength was not to us a source of constant apprehension. But, practically, we have an innate and ineradicable conviction of our own superiority to every nation in Europe, or to all of them combined. I am not saying that this conviction is rational or just. I only say that it exists and influences the whole of our policy. But we have not the same confidence with regard to you. The very consciousness of our own strength teaches us that your strength is not to be despised. You may call this jealousy narrow and selfish, but you must fairly remember that the same instinct which has made us extend our empire round the globe makes us nervously susceptible about anything or anybody which threatens our supremacy upon the seas. You will say, perhaps, that this instinct of imperial self-preservation ought to lead us to encourage amity with the only power we see cause to view with alarm. But then—and here I come to the main motive of our want of sympathy—there has long existed amongst Englishmen a belief that you, as a nation, were unfriendly to us, and disposed to injure us whenever you had the opportunity.

This belief, I need not say, I hold to be unjust and unfounded; but it is not so irrational a one as you may possibly imagine, looking at the matter from an American point of view. For long years before the outbreak of secession the language of your public men, and of such of your papers as we saw, was hostile and often offensive to this country. It is all very well to reply that the statesmen to whom I allude were Southerners, and that the papers in question only indulged in these tirades against England to gratify their Irish readers. But Englishmen as a body could not be expected to understand these distinctions. Congress was to us the Parliament of the Union; and the New York Herald the most popular organ of the American people. We thought, too, right or wrong, that we had cause to complain repeatedly of the action of your Government. I am not going now into the weary question of the Oregon boundary, and Crampton's dismissal, and the Greytown cruisers, and San Juan del Norte, and the Ostend Manifesto, and all the other petty "misères," to use a French word, which bred ill blood between us. But I only wish to point out that these quarrels had left behind them a smarting impression on our part that we had uniformly got scant justice in dealing with your Government. We fancied that you relied upon our unwillingness to imperil the cotton trade by war in order to serve us as you would not have served less forbearing nations. We cared little or nothing about the points at issue; but we resented bitterly the idea that we had suffered treatment at your hands no other government would have ventured to inflict upon us. Whether we were right in our opinion or not, I know absolutely nothing; but I do know that the opinion was a very general one amongst us, and produced its effects. When the war broke out and you appealed to our sympathies, hundreds of times when I have been discussing this American question, sensible and liberal Englishmen have said to me: "I care nothing about North or South, all I know is that the United States were always unfriendly to England, and therefore I am glad to see their power diminished by a disruption of the Union."

This feeling, then, lay at the root of our lack of sympathy for your cause during the war. Since the suppression of the rebellion, our English estimate of your corporate strength and your individual worth is far higher and juster than it was. But to speak candidly, this latent impression that America is naturally hostile to England still exists very generally. Whether it is to be lasting or not will mainly depend upon the language and conduct of your public men and your newspapers. You were angry, and justly angry, when Mr. Gladstone went out of his way to say that "Jefferson Davis had made a nation." In the same way, you can understand that speeches like that of Mr. Chase, when he said "he should like to give Mother England a good shaking," do not breed good-will over here.

THE BREAK UP.

BY A CONFEDERATE SOLDIER.

FAYETTEVILLE TO THE END.

We knocked boldly at the best looking establishment, and were unhesitatingly received with the utmost cordiality. Dirty, wet, and weary, they took us in, and our horses too. They gave us the nicest supper I ever ate, with real coffee and cream. I was too sick to eat much, but my companions made it up. Instead of putting us in some out-house, which our forbidding appearance certainly justified, they gave us separate rooms with nice clean beds, and treated us altogether like old friends. The next morning I felt like a different man.

The ladies of Fayetteville gave the same hospitable reception to all the weary soldiers as they passed through. They stood at their doors and windows, and offered their best of everything—even the wines and preserves that had been hoarded up all during the war. At the house where I staid all day, feeling still too ill to move, the old lady and her two pretty daughters sat fanning and talking to me, rubbing my head, and anticipating every wish. They all expected a stand to be made at Fayetteville, and asked continually if we were going to drive Sherman back. Of course, we all swore we would, and we were going to make Fayetteville a Thermopylæ. The morning of the evacuation I went to the hotel, leaving Bram at the camp in the arsenal yard, but luckily telling him where to find me. I had just paid $10 for an abominable breakfast I had not yet eaten, when a courier rushed in and whispered something to Hardee, who was talking to a lady at the end of the room. He jumped up as if shot, and everybody scattered. I heard cries of "Which way are they coming?" "How many are they?" "D—n it, we must drive them back!" "They 'll get in, burn the bridge, and cut us off!" I waited for no more. How I got out of that room, whether through the door or window, I never can tell.

The street was blocked up for a quarter of a mile by cavalrymen and led horses, all completely stampeded. Seeing the crowd cutting out, I did n't intend to stay. In a side street I found an old mule hitched to a post, by a piece of rope, with an old saddle, minus stirrups. I tried to jump on him, but at each effort of mine he would duck off about six feet on one side, and repeated the manœuvre till brought up by the opposite house. Then I begged an old negro woman to "break my foot," and was in the act of triumphantly mounting, when a voice behind me growled, "What sort ob a h–ll ob a way is dis? You go off and leab me, and ebrybody de leab; and here you de fool wid dat dam ole ting. Here, tek yer hoss!" I turned and joyfully recognized Bram. It was no time to expostulate on the freedom of his address. I mounted, struck spurs into my horse, and followed the crowd. I felt quite cool, but still kept on running, though I saw nothing to run from.

A little below the market there stood Hampton, entreating the men to stop; some did, but most of them gallopped past: finally, he drew his pistol and threatened to shoot the first man that attempted to run by. Soon a crowd was collected, and forming fours, we charged till we came on the Yanks, about 75 or 100, who scattered in every direction. I saw only six or eight, whom we charged down a by-street. The whole thing did not last more than ten minutes. We took two or three prisoners. They said they supposed the town was evacuated, having encountered no pickets. Our pickets, it seems, thinking themselves unsupported, had run without firing a gun until they got into the town, and thus stampeded the stragglers and led horses. I caught up with my company at the bridge, which they were preparing to burn, sprinkling it with resin and turpentine.

That evening, when the excitement was over, I felt horribly; at last I fell off my horse. Some one kindly put me in a wagon, in which I reached camp. Next day I received an order to impress the first horse I could find; but I was unable to prosecute the search. Being too ill to mount my pony, I got into an empty ambulance; in a little while it was filled, so that men were sitting on one another. I felt as if I had been a month packed in with that crowd. Sometimes I would lose consciousness of my wretched condition, and fancy myself at home and in a comfortable bed—then an unfriendly jolt would bring me back to the sense of pain. When they stopped at night, being unable to move, I was left all alone; a surgeon, however, came along and kindly administered an opium pill, and threw a blanket over me.

The next morning I was carried to headquarters, and the surgeon, after examining me, sent me with some other sick men to a house in advance.

I had been in bed hardly an hour when orders came to move forward. Bram helped me on my horse, and we camped about five miles off. It rained all that night; the next morning I could not stir. The surgeon pronounced me a very bad case, and had me moved to a shanty hard by, where the old man was very surly, and would not let me in, till Bram, after cursing him soundly, threatened to go for the guard to arrest him. He immediately gave in. They stretched me on a blanket before the fire, and there I remained that day and night delirious. The next morning began the battle of Averysboro; I was again moved to the rear, perfectly wild with excitement at the firing and the reports of the fight, which was horribly mismanaged. Instead of putting in divisions at a time, they sent them by brigades and regiments, to be licked in detail. It was a small affair, however, only Taliaferro's division engaged.

McLaws was fortifying in the rear, which, however, he did so thoroughly, that the enemy did not care to waste life by charging him, knowing that the position must be abandoned. Everything fell back that night. I was carried in a horse-cart. Through the care of a friend, acting hospital steward, who dosed me every three hours with quinine, I began to improve, and was able to return to duty before the battle of Bentonville.

I was among the ten couriers to Hardee on the second day, and I never care to be in the same place again. Had they not practised the same manœuvre of charging by brigades reduced in numbers, there might have been a difference in the result of the battle, though there were hardly more than 16,000 men engaged on the Confederate side.

After the fight, what should I see but Haywood's brigade, which had been reported all captured! I knew I should soon get orders to return to them, and service in the ranks on foot not attracting me, I made out an application for a special transfer to the cavalry, which Gen. Hardee kindly put through with the commanding general, Johnston. Two days before my application was returned, I received orders to report to my regiment; but I held off till I got my papers of transfer. One can go "hunting" for his command a considerable time, provided he keep well away from it. As I wanted some tobacco, I thought I would just go to Smithfield, by way of Raleigh, and buy some.

I bought my tobacco, and as that took all my money, I left next day, taking a circuitous route to Smithfield. On fording the Neuse River, I got into a wagon and led my horse behind. Finding the teamster a very good fellow, I travelled with him three days, enjoying his hospitality—Bram occasionally contributing poultry and pigs which he picked up by the way. My friend belonged to Wheeler's Corps, and he and all his companions treated me to the best their train afforded, so that I was sorry when the time came to part. Wheeler's men did pretty much as they pleased; they were "sports," but I found most of them first-rate fellows and full of fun. They fought like the devil; and it must be confessed acted like him too very often, so that the country they defended dreaded them worse than anything. But they were jolly companions. Butler's South Carolinians, unless you happened to know them personally, were very surly, and never thought of such a thing as asking you to take something to eat, though it must be said they were kept so close they had no chance to forage. Living on their rations of one-third of a pound of bacon, and a pint of the everlasting old corn meal, they did not have so good a time as Wheeler's men.

I reached my command April 1st. They were camped in a miserable pine country twelve miles above Goldsboro, the horses getting five ears of corn and two bundles of fodder a day, which had to be hauled fifty or sixty miles, the country being entirely eaten out.

I talked with some friends that night, who advised me, as there was a great deal of picket duty, and my horses were low in flesh, to return home and get another, or at least go off and impress one on the order I had not yet used before reporting, Accordingly I started with my own and Bram's horse, which had almost entirely given out, and had a gall on his back as big as my head. I knew Bram would soon "capture" another; I left him in care of a friend, and that is the last I ever saw of him. He returned home. I intended to go to the country east of Tar River, where there was plenty of everything, and try my luck there.

I rode the first night to within seven miles of Wilson, and sold Bram's horse, which could go no further, for five hundred Confederate dollars, a peck of potatoes, and my night's lodging. I travelled much better, as Confederate paper was lighter than a broken-down horse even then. Next day I impressed a tolerably good beast, leaving my nag, much to the old fellow's disgust. I consoled him by the suggestion that the horse was not for me, but for "his country," which did n't awaken his enthusiasm, however. This was not a good enough horse, so I kept on towards Tarboro, looking for a better. It was sometimes dangerous to own one's self a horse-presser, on account of the number which had been stolen by men calling themselves Wheeler's.

I met an acting quartermaster with a wagon train impressing corn. I agreed to look out for him while pursuing my own search. I found little in the barns, but plenty hid away in the swamps. These hoards were readily pointed out by the poor people, who had no interest in the war, but whose husbands, sons, and brothers were conscripted, while the majority of the men better off "greased out," being bonded to furnish 1,000 lbs. of bacon to the government, and their surplus provisions at given rates to the needy families of soldiers—who complained that the rich men always swore they had no surplus, although they always had enough to sell to speculators.

Having impressed a good horse at length, I set out to "hunt" my command in good earnest, and joined at Smithfield, just in time to hear the order, "Second squadron, dismount. As skirmishers, take intervals." We had enough of this sort of thing before we reached Raleigh. The skirmish line is the devil; and if forced to run, there is no knowing where one's horse will turn up afterwards. At Raleigh, Wheeler's men were in their element, plundering the quartermaster's depot. They had good horses, and some of them drums; others wrapped themselves in large garrison flags they had "prowled," and charged through the streets, shouting and yelling, to their own great amusement, but to the dismay of the quiet citizens, whom they nearly trampled down, and whose fright only excited them to louder laughter and more daring pranks. Thus they were as much hated in Raleigh as in the rest of North Carolina, most of which they overran and harried. I met them everywhere in my wanderings. Their usual salute was, "Halloa, there, are you one of bully Joe Wheeler's dragoons, or one of Hampton's curly-headed gentlemen?" When one was travelling alone, it was most prudent to belong to their crowd.

We left Raleigh at 5.30 A.M. It was surrendered at 6. We took the road to Hillsboro, going very slowly—some days hardly five miles—halting at every good position, expecting to be attacked, but never were. At Durham Station, which is famous for tobacco, we got more than we could carry. I threw away my clothes to fill my saddle-bags. The men wasted quantities, taking more than they could carry, and then throwing it away. In some places there were piles of it in the road. We halted at Hillsboro. On Saturday, April 15, I was on vidette duty, when the first flag of truce came up in charge of some of Kilpatrick's staff. I little thought what it meant.

Lee's surrender, which at first was very much doubted, being now certain, we all knew that a miracle only would save the cause, yet we still thought things would hang on somehow, and we had no idea the whole concern was about to fade like smoke. As soon as the armistice was declared, every one began to look out for himself. Some swore they would never surrender, but a great many deserted.

As a matter of policy merely, Sherman's armistice turned out well for him, because before that Johnston's army were resolved to make one fight more, and at least sell their lives dearly as at Bentonville. But the armistice turned their thoughts the other way. Men who found unexpectedly that they had come out whole, began to consider about losing a limb for nothing, and none cared to lay down life for a dead cause.

Again relapsing, I was sent to the hospital at Greensboro, and that is the last I saw of the brigade. They all scattered on their own hook, and went home. My horse was carried along. I have since heard he was safe, but beyond my recovery; so he went up the spout with the rest.

Ten miles from Greensboro, the box-car in which we were going at the fastest Confederate speed (fifteen miles an hour) suddenly blew up. Several of us jumped off, and escaped not so badly burned; but it was frightful to hear the howls of those who could not get out. Some perished. The car had been used for transporting powder, and a quantity was lying loose in the bottom, and took fire from a spark. The skin on my hands and face peeled off, and for five hours I suffered terrible tortures. I recovered pretty soon, but was so much disfigured that some of my friends did not know me till I spoke. At Greensboro the soldiers had become a complete rabble, laying hold of as much government property as they could. Women came from all the adjacent country in buggies, wagons, and ox-carts—the most horrible crew; all smoked, chewed, snuffed, or dipped. The attraction was a quantity of factory thread, stowed away in the government stores, which they wanted as warp for their looms. A hundred of them, perhaps, would break open a car, and struggle over the contents, sometimes six or eight fighting over a bunch of thread, all pulling in a different direction for fifty yards, and the soldiers shouting and cheering them on.

Some specie was distributed to the army. My share was $1 50. Some fellows got 35 cents more! But not being present at the second disbursement, I lost that. I meant to preserve the Mexican dollar as a curiosity, and give it to my grandchildren to cut their teeth on, but I dropped it out of my pocket, to my everlasting regret. My fifty cents also I lost at poker, and so went the reward for my two years' service.

On the 1st of May I departed with the wagon train for South Carolina. We had to keep a strict guard to prevent fellows from cutting off at night with the mules.

At Yorkville myself and a companion discovered a plot of the majority of the teamsters to seize the best mules and be off. We determined not to let them get ahead of us, and leave us to walk, so that very night we grabbed each a mule and cut. We pushed on to Unionville, near sixty miles; my arm was stiff with the continuous use of my stick, the only condition on which my mule would travel. She was a staver, about sixteen hands high and large in proportion, and she had an extremely knowing look, as much as to say, "You may thump as you please, but I will go my own gait."

In the home journey I noticed one remarkable change in respect for property. Chickens and pigs could escape unmolested, whereas, hitherto, the poor citizen was considered nobody. The soldier fighting to protect the property claimed the right to help himself to all he wanted. In army life, men do all sorts of things they would never dream of doing under other conditions. I must say too that, on the return, the people everywhere received and fed me and my mule without any charge; so that I travelled the whole length of South Carolina, spending but fifty cents at one house. I made my way for Abbeville District, over the same road Jeff. Davis had travelled two weeks before.

I did not wish to burst upon my relations without preparation; and, knowing that the change from a smooth school-boy to a battered and singed dragoon would sufficiently disguise me, I "lighted" at the shanty of old Alick Cummins, a mile and a half from my aunt's farm.

The old woman said, "Stranger, won't you take a cheer?" which I did. I pretended to be very anxious for a place to put up at, and described the way to my aunt's, where I said I had been directed by a man on the road. But old Cummins, who was a sort of hanger-on of the family, was loyal to the solitary ladies, and tried every shift to avoid sending a wandering soldier, perhaps a marauder, to their house. He protested there was no habitation in that quarter, but I had best go to the widow Jones's, three miles off; I objected that my horse was too tired. Then he brightened up and urged my going back to "the Range"—a miserable collection of huts, aptly called the dark corner of the district—"there was a dance going on at Jim Beasley's, and I could have great times with the gals." I said I was too weary to dance, and I wanted to get to the nice place I had heard of—describing more fully my aunt's. Cummins pretended perfect ignorance, chewing more vigorously, and directing me further and further off. At last, however, he had to give in. He appeared suddenly to recollect—"I reckon," he said, "you mean Miss Mary, but I do n't believe you can get to stay there."

"What, is anybody ill?"

"Oh, no! but dar 's only the two old ladies at home. Louisy, I reckon, is up country at her sister's, and you had better go to Jim Beasley's."

Having found out that they were all alive, I pushed on with a light heart, and soon turned into the avenue. The trees had grown wonderfully in the two years of my absence: the roses still hung their clusters in festoons from the pillars of the piazza; the old-fashioned flowers sent up their fragrance from the garden; and the moonlight slept as placidly on the hillside as if war had not been stalking through the land, leaving wherever it passed the desolating traces of fire and blood.

My thundering knocks soon brought out my aunt's maid, Diana, who set up a dismal squall on beholding a soldier in need of a night's lodging. Her mistress, she said, was in bed and asleep; there was no provision for man nor beast. I must go on to Mrs. Jones.

The howling of the dogs soon attracted a crowd of negroes, who vociferously confirmed Diana's inhospitable statement. I persisted that I must stay. For myself, I could roll in my blanket and lie on the piazza, but my horse must get feed, and I should turn him into the wheat field. Old Andrew, the head man, who acted as spokesman, answered so mildly that that would be a pity, as they had nothing but the wheat to depend upon, the corn crop having quite failed, that I could scarcely refrain jumping off my horse and shaking the old fellow by the hand; but I restrained myself, though bursting with laughter.

My aunt, who was a spinster, having by this time replaced her night-cap by some more ceremonious head-gear, had me summoned to a parley under her window.

She excused herself that, not living on the high road, she was unaccustomed to receiving travellers. Mrs. Jones, who lived a few miles on, could take me in. The night before she had indeed sheltered six men, and they had eaten up everything. I replied it was impossible for my mule to go further that night.

"How much corn do you want?"

"One hundred ears, at least."

She groaned, and indignantly exclaimed: "You must waste a great deal!"

"Madam, I do n't waste a grain," said I.

"The men last night were very humble; they asked but for ten ears a piece, and were content to sleep in the wash-kitchen."

"They knew what their animals wanted, and I know what mine does. I'll sleep where you choose, but I only hope if you have any relatives in the army they may meet with the inhospitable treatment you show me!"

She quite forgot her rôle, and exclaimed, "Yes, I had two nephews in Johnston's army; one was killed, I am anxiously expecting the other. Did you ever meet with him?"

"Why, Aunt Mary, do n't you know me?"

"Can that be James?"

"Yes, and I am ashamed of you!"

"My dear child!" she cried. "Here, run all of you, Diana, Andrew, Charlotte, open the corn-crib; get supper!"

All the negroes pressed forward to welcome me, protesting they "had 'spected something, but did n't tink Mas' Jim would a play such a trick on dem."

And so my campaign was ended, and I hung up my pistol for ever.

Lenox, Mass., August 25, 1865.

OUR MARTYR PRESIDENT.

Now Ready, Price $2,

AGENTS WANTED.

STIER'S WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

HEARTHSTONE SERIES.

SCHÖNBERG-COTTA WORKS.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL BOOKS.

A complete library can be made up from our stock, which includes the lists of all the societies of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.

Terms as low as can be had of the publishing houses.

BOOKS FOR SALE BY

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus,	Barnes' Notes,
Lange's Commentary on Matthew,	Bush's "
Knapp's Christian Theology,	Jacobus' "
McKnight on the Epistles,	Edwards' Works,
Home's Introduction,	Woods' "
Alexander's Commentary,	Kitto's "
Hodge's "	Shedd's Christian Doctrine,
Olshausen's "	Schaff's Church History,
Henry's "	Mosheim's " "
Benson's "	Eusebius' " "
Clark's "

Also, a great variety of Theological Works, Sermons, etc. A liberal discount to ministers.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 PARK ROW, New York.

RIVERSIDE BOOKS.

WIDDLETON'S

LIST OF PUBLICATIONS.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Having purchased the stereotype plates, stock, and good-will of the RIVERSIDE BOOKS, heretofore owned by Mrs. WILLIAM VEAZIE, of Boston, we are now prepared to offer new and elegant editions of those valuable works, in full variety of choice bindings.

THE LIST COMPRISES:

SHAKESPEARE,

Complete in 8 vols. Riverside Edition, including the Poems, a Life, Notes, and a History of the Stage.

BYRON,

4 vols. Complete, with Life by Thomas Moore.

BURTON'S ANATOMY OF MELANCHOLY, 3 vols.

DISRAELI'S CURIOSITIES OF LITERATURE, 4 vols.

DISRAELI'S AMENITIES OF LITERATURE, 2 vols.

HALLAM'S LITERATURE OF EUROPE, 4 vols.

HALLAM'S MIDDLE AGES, 3 vols.

HALLAM'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 3 vols.

HALLAM'S COMPLETE WORKS, 10 vols.

(Comprising the three foregoing lines.)

MAY'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

2 vols. (A continuation of Hallam.)

HALLAM AND MAY'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY,

Together, 5 vols.

CHARLES LAMB'S WORKS, 4 vols.

LAMB'S ESSAYS OF ELIA, 1 vol.

LAMB'S ELIANA,

(Hitherto uncollected writings, 1 vol.)

MILMAN'S HISTORY OF THE JEWS, 3 vols.

MILMAN'S HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY, 3 vols.

(Nearly ready.)

With the exception of "Shakespeare" (16mo, gilt tops, price $1 75 per vol.), the above books are all crown 8vo volumes, price $2 75 per volume in cloth, and $4 in half calf, or half turkey binding. Each set of books in a box.

ALSO,

NOW READY,

EDGAR A. POE'S WORKS. 4 vols. cloth, $9. (Uniform with Riverside Press books.)

PROF. WILSON'S LIFE AND WORKS. (Noctes Ambrosianæ.) 6 vols. cloth, $15.

DR. DORAN'S WORKS. 9 vols. cloth, $20.

DORAN'S ANNALS OF THE STAGE. (A revised edition.) 2 vols. cloth, $4 50.

PRAED'S POEMS. Elegant library edition. 2 vols., $4 50.

INGOLDSBY LEGENDS. 16 illustrations, 2 vols., $4 50.

NAPIER'S PENINSULAR WAR. 5 vols., with 55 steel maps and portraits, $15.

SYDNEY SMITH'S WIT AND WISDOM. (The cream of Sydney Smith.) Edited by E. A. Duyckinck. 1 vol., $2 25.

STANLEY'S SINAI AND PALESTINE. Elegant library copy, uniform with "Eastern and Jewish Church," maps and plates. 1 vol. octavo, $4.

DEAN TRENCH'S WORKS. Uniform edition. 9 vols., $1 25 each.

SIMMS' WORKS. Uniform edition. 17 vols. (by set in box), or separate volumes, $2 per volume.

CHAPMAN'S AMERICAN DRAWING-BOOKS. Complete. 1 vol. 4to, $4 50.

CHAPMAN'S AMERICAN DRAWING-BOOKS. In Six Parts. Each part complete, paper, 50 cents each.

BLUE AND GOLD BOOKS.

REDUCED PRICES.

PRAED'S POEMS. 2 vols., $2 50.

TUPPER. (Complete.) 2 vols., $2 50.

TUPPER'S PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY. 1 vol., $1 25.

POE'S POEMS. (Complete.) 1 vol., $1 25.

We have in stock a full assortment of our books in half calf and half turkey bindings. New catalogue in preparation.

W. J. WIDDLETON, Publisher,

17 Mercer Street, New York.

M. W. DODD,

PUBLISHER AND BOOKSELLER,

506 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Publishes the following popular and important Books

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHÖNBERG-COTTA FAMILY,"

Published by arrangement with the Author:

DIARY OF MRS. KITTY TREVYLYAN,

A STORY OF THE TIMES OF WHITEFIELD AND THE WESLEYS.

By the author of "The Schönberg-Cotta Family." With a Preface by the author for our edition.

THE EARLY DAWN;

OR, SKETCHES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE IN ENGLAND IN THE OLDEN TIME.

By the author of "The Cotta Family." With Introduction by Prof. H. B. Smith, D.D.

CHRONICLES OF THE SCHÖNBERG-COTTA FAMILY.

We publish Three Editions of the above.

FINE EDITION.

Crown 8vo, printed on tinted paper, bound in extra cloth, bevelled boards, and illustrated, making a beautiful book. Per volume, $2.

PLAIN EDITION.

12mo, on fine white paper, neatly bound. Per volume, $1 50. In sets, uniform, and in boxes, $4 50.

THE NEW CABINET EDITION.

18mo, beautifully printed on tinted paper, bound in extra cloth. Per volume, $1 50. In sets, $4 50.

This is a beautiful edition, in smaller type and more compact than the larger books.

JUST READY:

MARY; THE HANDMAID OF THE LORD.

By the author of "The Schönberg-Cotta Family," etc. 1 vol. 16mo, elegantly printed on tinted paper, bound in extra cloth, bevelled boards, $1 25; gilt or red edges, $1 50.

Copies of the above sent by mail on receipt of price.

An Important Educational Work.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY;

FROM THE EARLIEST PERIOD TO THE PRESENT TIME.

With an Appendix, giving a condensed history of the Jews, from the destruction of Jerusalem to the present day. Illustrated with maps and historic charts. By JOHN MARSH, D.D. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 75.

QUESTIONS ON ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

By JOSEPH EMERSON, being a continuation of his "Biblical Outlines," revised by Dr. Marsh. An important accompaniment to the Ecclesiastical History. 18mo, 60 cents.

The present is a new and revised edition of a standard work, always highly esteemed and once extensively used. It is believed to fill a place occupied by no other work, and in connexion with the questions, now for the first time published, is worthy of a careful examination by teachers and others interested.

From the American Educational Monthly.

"In a comparatively small space all the essential facts of church history are clearly presented, and there is an evident intention to give a fair exposition of the tenets and practices of the various sects that divide the religious world. In those schools where ecclesiastical history is part of the line of instruction, this volume will be a necessary text-book."

Prof. John S. Hunt in Sunday-School Times.

"As an epitome of ecclesiastical history, no work, probably, has been more generally approved than this by Dr. Marsh. The fact that it has now reached the 16th edition is sufficient testimony to its worth. It is very compact, giving a large amount of matter in a small space. The matter is presented in lucid order, and is such as has received general acceptance."

Copies for examination sent to teachers on receipt of $1 for the "History," 40 cents for the "Questions."

Several new works of great interest and value in press.

A SCRIPTURE MANUAL.

Alphabetically and Systematically Arranged, designed to Facilitate the Finding of PROOF TEXTS. By CHARLES SIMMONS. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 75.

A new and improved edition. As an indication of the value put upon this work, we may state that upwards of 50,000 copies of it have been sold, with no effort made to force its circulation.

M. W. DODD, Publisher.

The Largest, the Cheapest, and the Best Children's Paper in America.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

A FIRST CLASS PAPER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS,

Published Monthly, in Chicago, Ill., 138 Lake Street,

By ALFRED L. SEWELL.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL contains sixteen pages of first class literary matter. It is intended that it shall contain better original Stories, Poems, and other reading for children, and more matter for the price, than any other children's paper on the continent. First No. published July, 1865.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Though the paper itself is more than worth the price, yet for the sake of offering such an inducement as will ensure beyond all doubt a very large list of subscribers to start with, I have determined to give the following beautiful present to every subscriber for one year:

A Superb Quarto Steel Engraving,

THE CHILDREN'S PORTRAIT OF MR. LINCOLN,

Size, 9½ x 11¾ inches,

engraved in the highest style of the art, expressly as a premium plate for this paper—which can be had nowhere else in this style.

This is the best portrait for children of our martyred President, and is alone worth more than many pictures that sell for one dollar, but is presented gratis to every subscriber for one year to The Little Corporal.

☞ SPECIMEN NUMBER WILL BE SENT ON RECEIPT OF TEN CENTS.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,
CHICAGO, ILL.

PREMIUMS TO CLUBS.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the above Engraving.
Other inducements advertised in the paper for larger clubs.
All pages are electrotyped, and back numbers can always be furnished,

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—This first class monthly for boys and girls is receiving commendatory notices from every part of the Union, and these, too, are from our first-rate newspapers. The following notice is from the Pittsburg Christian Advocate:

"'The first number is the best children's paper, of a high literary tone, that we have ever had the pleasure of reading. If after issues shall fulfil the promise of this avant courier, Chicago will have the honor of making the best child's paper in the nation. We bid a hearty welcome to The Little Corporal and trust it may long live to grace the catalogue of newspaper literature for children.'

"The July, August, and September numbers are before us, and we assure the Pittsburg Advocate and our young readers of the Northwestern that these 'after issues' are fully up to the standard of the first number, and more—they are far beyond it. The Little Corporal is growing in stature, and the muscles of his literary and moral arm are hardening with exercise.

"In plain terms, Mr. Sewell is determined to make his paper a success, and he has secured the services of able writers, for whose productions he pays liberally. We re-echo the words of the Chicago Evening Journal.

"'It is bright, sparkling, and promising, both in typography and contents. It already excels every children's paper that we know of in this country.'

"The periodical looks as if it had been printed by the 'Riverside press.'—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

"A NEW CHILD'S PAPER.—We have received two copies of The Little Corporal, a monthly paper for children, the publication of which has been commenced at Chicago, Illinois, by Alfred L. Sewell. Judging from these specimens, it is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America. Its whole appearance is in capital taste, and there is evidence in it that its editor has rare tact in catering for the wants of the little ones. The enterprise deserves to be a decided success."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal, Aug. 5, 1865.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Bright, sparkling, and pure; a gem, both in typography and contents. We have been accustomed to think that the West, however she might excel in agricultural products, was far behind the East in literary matters; but we begin to think it is time for the latter to look to her laurels. Certainly we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

"Judging from the appearance of the two numbers before us, The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America.—Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press.

"We have read with great pleasure the first number of this entertaining periodical. We trust The Little Corporal will continue to fulfil the promise of this first number. Will the editor accept our congratulations?"—N. Y. Independent.

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Union Press.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"The Little Corporal really excels any child's paper we have seen. The premium picture is of itself worth a year's subscription."—Sandusky [O.] Reg.

TO MINISTERS THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES:

I desire to secure the co-operation of the MINISTERS throughout the country in the furtherance of a work which cannot fail to meet their approval and appreciation.

As editor of THE LITTLE CORPORAL, I hope to induce Ministers to favor the circulation of my paper among their children as a means of doing them good; and I ask each one to send me the name of some intelligent and respectable lady (for whose integrity they can vouch), who will be willing to energetically canvass her own neighborhood for subscribers to THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Any Minister addressing me, as shown below, will receive by next mail Circulars, showing the opinions of the Press, and will also be informed in relation to the percentage allowed to canvassers.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of DUNLOP, SEWELL & SPALDING,
CHICAGO, ILL.

Refer, if you wish, to
BISHOP SIMPSON, Philadelphia.
REV. W. W. PATTON, Chicago.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen,
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

GOLDEN-HAIRED GERTRUDE,

THE CHOICEST OF JUVENILE BOOKS.

BY

THEODORE TILTON,

Editor of The Independent.

Illustrated from original drawings by H. L. Stephens. Printed on heavy tinted paper of finest finish. Nearly ready.

TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 Park Row, N. Y.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

WE are glad to find that Messrs. Roberts Brothers, of Boston, have actually in press "Robert Buchanan's Poems." His first volume, "Undertones," has been some time in progress, but the public are the gainers by any delay, because in the second edition, just published in London, he has carefully revised the poems, "perfecting the verse rather than changing it" (in the words of a critic), and has added a new poem called "The Siren." It tells the story of a life with wild and wondrous power, and is an allegory to which every one will attach his own interpretation—a riddle which will be "read aright" by all who can appreciate the poet's melody of verse and wealth of imagination. Messrs. Roberts' republication will include both volumes, "Undertones" and "Idyls and Legends of Inverburn," as wel as some fugitive poems. As publishers, they have already shown their estimation of good poetry by their elegant edition of Jean Ingelow's writings, and we doubt not that they will find that Buchanan's works will meet with an equally favorable reception.

—A complete and uniform edition of Thackeray's works may now probably be looked for within a reasonable time, as it is announced officially that Messrs. Bradbury & Evans, the publishers of his earlier works, have disposed of their interest in them to Messrs. Smith & Elder, the house with whom he was, in the latter part of his life, more nearly allied, as the originators of the "Cornhill Magazine," the medium through which nearly all of his recent works were given to the public. Messrs. Chapman & Hall, however, publish some of the "Christmas Books," "The Irish Sketch Book," etc., and there is a large mass of Thackeray's uncollected writings in the back volumes of "Frazer's Magazine," besides the "Paris Sketch Book," and some smaller works never reprinted. How far it is the duty of an editor to include all the writings of his author in what purports to be a complete edition, is one of the most puzzling questions of literary ethics. On the one hand, it seems to be the undoubted right of an author to designate the productions that he is willing to abide by, as his title-deeds to the gratitude of posterity; but in the other view, all attempts at suppression of matter once in the hands of the public are vain and of no effect, and its exclusion from the place where it is looked for only excites curiosity and leads to surreptitious republication. An actually complete edition of an author is a thing hardly known in English literature. There is no edition of Sir Walter Scott's works that contains his letters on "Demonology and Witchcraft," "History of Scotland," articles for "The Foreign Quarterly Review," etc., owing to the different ownership of these writings. Lord Byron's works are equally incomplete from other reasons. Of Pope we are only now promised his famous character of the Duke of Marlborough (which has remained in manuscript over a century), and some hundred new letters, in the edition commenced by Mr. J. W. Croker, and now carrying on by the Rev. J. W. Elwyn.

—Coincidence of pursuit and publication, shown in the simultaneous appearance of books on the same subject, when perhaps a number of years may have passed without its attracting a single student, are often noticeable in the book market. An instance occurs in London, where at the same time are brought out two books on jewels: "The Natural History, Ancient and Modern, of Precious Stones and Gems, and of the Precious Metals," by C. M. King, of Trinity College; and "Diamonds and Precious Stones, their History, Value, and distinguishing Characteristics," by Harry Emanuel, one of the most eminent jewellers of the present day. They are both handsomely got up—Mr. King's book being a noble imperial octavo, and the other a prettily illustrated duodecimo. Apart from their scientific claim to notice, there is so much interesting historical gossip current about these beautiful objects, the famous specimens and their former possessors, etc., that both books are full of amusement, and there is but little repetition in either—Mr. King dealing more with their classical and antiquarian relations, and Mr. Emanuel with the practical and commercial side of the question. It was the former gentleman who threw out, in a previous work, the startling suggestion that the precious stones in the Jewish high priest's breastplate, engraved with the names of the Tribes of Israel, being of course indestructible, are no doubt still extant, and will "turn up" some day in the treasury of some oriental monarch. We notice the two authorities are at issue on the treatment of the famous "Koh-i-noor," or Mountain of Light diamond—now chief among the British crown jewels—the spoil of the Punjab, and said in the East to be a fatal possession of ill omen to its owners. Mr. King says the re-cutting, by which it lost 85 carats weight, was "a most ill advised proceeding, which has deprived the stone of all its historical and mineralogical value, giving but a bad, shallow-shaped brilliant of but inferior water." Mr. Emanuel says, that "from a lustreless mass it has become a brilliant, match less for purity and fire."

—Signs of the passing away of the summer holidays and the recurrence to active business are already abundant. At Boston, Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. have opened the fall publishing campaign by the issue of the first and completing volume of Grant White's "Shakespeare's Works," containing a memoir, the poems, etc., with a fine steel portrait and woodcut illustrations; and also in a separate form, "The Life and Genius of Shakespeare," by the same author. Mr. Parkman's new volume, also issued by them, will be welcome to lovers of American history from its subject, "Pioneers of France in the New World," and because it is the first of an intended series, entitled "France and England in North America," devoted to the conflict of the leading European powers for the possession of this continent. Part II., "The Jesuit in the Wilderness," is now in preparation. Mr. Parkman's "History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac" takes rank, among competent judges, as the most satisfactory historical monograph that our literature has produced; and it is gratifying to find that in spite of physical disabilities—that recall the circumstances attending the studies of his friend and fellow-townsman, W. H. Prescott—he is still pursuing with vigor the line of investigation that he has peculiarly marked out for his own. Messrs. Little, Brown & Co.'s list also includes "The Life and Public Services of Samuel Adams," by his great-grandson, William V. Wells, in three vols. 8vo; a compact and beautifully executed impression of "Edmund Burke's Works," in twelve volumes, the first of which has just appeared; a reprint of Miss Frances Bunnett's translation of Professor H. Grimm's able and elaborate, but somewhat heavy and diffuse, "Life of Michael Angelo," in two volumes, small 8vo, from the London edition of Smith & Elder; "The Life and Speeches of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States," edited by Frank Moore; "The Taxpayer's Manual," by Hon. George Boutwell; and new editions, corrected by Judge Redfield, of Story's "Equity Pleadings" and "Conflict of Laws."

—Another book, announced by the same house, "Epictetus, translated by Elizabeth Carter, and edited by T. W. Higginson," is worth notice, because it shows that we are getting independent of the mother country in the matter of the supply of books. This translation, famous from the merit and repute of the authoress, appeared in 1758, and in the one hundred and seven years since, but three editions have ever been called for in England. Perhaps five thousand copies in all, at the outside, may have been printed. Finding the work still in demand, Messrs. Little & Brown, instead of hunting after the old copies, and running them up to an exorbitant price, wisely put in the market an elegant reprint, and will, we doubt not, sell more copies in five years from its date than have been disposed of in England during the century of its existence. The particulars of the first edition are preserved, and give us some insight into the subscription system of the day. Miss Carter was already celebrated for her virtues and accomplishments when she undertook the translation. Greek scholars of the "weaker sex" were then scarcer than they have since become, and attracted a corresponding degree of attention. Her subscription list consequently comprised the most eminent names of the day, to the number of one thousand and thirty-one, at a guinea each. The copies struck off were one thousand two hundred and sixty-eight, and so moderate was the expense of the paper and print at that time, when advertising, too, "was not," that, after paying the cost of producing the book (a very handsome quarto), one thousand pounds remained as the pecuniary reward of the fair translator.

—Messrs. Ticknor & Fields' announcements are at present confined to books to be published during the current month, September. If to be followed up for the remainder of the season at the same rate, they indicate great activity in this energetic, enterprising house. They comprise "Recollections of Seventy Years," by Mrs. John Farrar—a pleasant sample of this work, "A Visit to the Edgeworths," was given in the last "Atlantic Monthly;" "Lyrics of Life," by Robert Browning (a selection, we believe, from poems already published); "Life and Letters of Rev. Frederick W. Robertson," 2 volumes; "Atalanta in Calydon," by Algernon Charles Swinburne; "Hesperus," by Jean Paul Richter, translated by Charles T. Brooks; and "Poems," by Henry Howard Brownell, a new and complete edition.

—It will be some time before we hear the last of the fire so disastrous to literature already mentioned in our columns as fatal to the library of Mr. Offor and several other collections. In one case, what remains only excites commiseration for the magnitude of what was lost. The catalogue of Lord Charlemont's library was issued previous to the fire at Messrs. Sotheby's. It contained 2,477 lots. Of these 233 only were saved, partly in a damaged condition. They were recently sold with all faults, in the state that they escaped from the flames, and brought the sum of £4,100. If the produce of the destroyed part had been in the same proportion, it must have been by far the most valuable collection ever sold in England. The rarities were almost entirely in English dramatic and poetical literature, a class of subjects now in the very highest vogue amongst book-buyers. A fine copy of the first folio Shakespeare (1623), "in old red morocco binding, with tooled borders, one of the purest and cleanest copies known, measuring 12¾ inches by 8 5-16" (such are the minutiæ affection loves to dwell on), brought £455. A number of the Shakespeare quarto plays followed, but their condition was not equal to those in Mr. Daniels' library, and they sold for less prices, the highest being "Much Adoe about Nothing," first edition (1600), which sold for £155; "Gammer Gurton's Needle" (1575), bound up with five other plays by Peele, etc., went (very low) for £21 10s.; Lord Buckhurst's "Tragedie of Ferrex and Porrex" (1561), £26; Stephen Hawes' "Historie of La Grande Amour and La Bel Pucel" (1554), £56; Milton's autograph and MS. notes in a copy of "Lycophron," Gr. et Lat. (Genevæ, 1601), £42 10s.; Milton's "Comus," "printed for Humphrey Robinson at the sign of the Three Pidgeons," etc. (1637), £23; Spenser's "Faery Queen," first edition, in twelve books, two volumes (1590–6), £40 10s; Higden's "Polycronicon, Englished by Trevisa, emprinted by me William Caxton" (1480), wanting two leaves, £477 15s.; "Roman de la Rose," a MS., with thirty-five illustrations, £242 11s. We might go on giving the entire particulars of this remarkable (and all things considered) lamentable sale, as the class of books it was so rich in is sought for with as much interest in America as England, but want of space forbids. Several rare early tracts on Virginia formed a portion of it, as R. Rich's "Newes from Virginia," a unique poem (1610), £63; Captain John Smith's "Map of Virginia" (1612), £25; "Virginia Nova Britannia," etc. (1609), £13 13s.; "The New Life of Virginia" (1612), £16; "Good Speed to Virginia" (1609), £10; and several others.

—So well worn a subject as the Life of William Cowper, the poet, receives some fresh illustrations from the researches of Mr. John Bruce, the editor of the revised Aldine impression of his poems. The memoir by Mr. Bruce comprises two hundred pages, and includes Cowper's correspondence with, and early MSS. poems addressed to, his cousin Theodora, his first love, the daughter of his uncle Ashley Cowper, in whose house he was domesticated when a youth, and in accordance with whose will the connexion ceased. Theodora Cowper was never married, but survived until 1824. She was in her declining life subject to the same hereditary melancholy that poisoned the springs of existence in the poet's career. Even after Southey's diligence, Mr. Bruce has reaped a harvest of much novel information, and intends to write a biography of Cowper on a large scale, to which the Aldine memoir is a subsidiary contribution.

—A brisk competition is in progress for the succession to the chair of belles-lettres in the University of Edinburgh, lately occupied by Professor Aytoun. Among the men of mark engaged in the pursuit are sundry persons so variously gifted, that the official duties of the professorship must be of a highly elastic nature to suit such diverse qualifications. The list is headed by Professor David Masson, the biographer of Milton; Dr. William Hanna, the divine, and biographer of Chalmers; Dr. Daniel Wilson, late of Toronto University, the antiquarian, and ethnological author of "Pre-historic Man," etc.; Mr. George Macdonald, poet and novelist, author of "Phantastes," etc., and several other men of local celebrity, whose fame has scarcely crossed the Tweed or the Atlantic Ocean. The nomination belongs to Sir George Grey, the Secretary of State for Home Affairs.

—Prof. De Morgan, the eminent mathematician, who brings to the study of the deepest scientific subjects an invincible vivacity and freshness that contrast strangely with the sobriety of tone usually observed in such discussions, has constituted himself an amateur "literary (or rather scientific) detective;" and a series of papers, entitled "A Budget of Paradoxes" (shortly to appear in an independent shape), exposes some of the current fallacies that are thrust on the public by ignorant or half-learned men, which often gain a notice from the confidence that usually accompanies the want of true knowledge. Squarers of the circle, inventors of perpetual motion, etc., are treated by him without mercy, and he often finds higher game in more respectable quarters. The last number contains a remarkable instance of the difficulty of reasoning well upon matters which are not familiar. Sir George Cornewall Lewis was one of the first scholars and practical statesmen of the day. His "Historical Survey of the Astronomy of the Ancients" is a work of great learning and research, treating many interesting questions in a manner that throws doubt on questions of antiquity, as the interpretation of Egyptian hieroglyphics, etc., which has been considered settled, and exhibiting throughout unusual critical acuteness. Yet even here strange oversights are visible. In discussing the observations of the heavenly bodies attributed to Eudoxus, the Greek astronomer, Sir G. C. Lewis gives his recorded estimate of the revolutions of the five planets known to the ancients, accompanying it with "the true time subjoined for the sake of comparison." This true time is of course calculated from our present Copernican standpoint of the motion of the planets round the sun, and it never once struck him that this idea was entirely unknown to Eudoxus, whose calculations were made on the only system then accepted—the geocentric—by which the planets were supposed to move round the earth. Prof. De Morgan gives several other instances, from the same work, to illustrate "the melancholy truth that no one knows enough to write about what he does not know," while praising its general value and importance.

—The indefatigable George Augustus Sala seems determined to leave no quarter of the world unvisited or undescribed by his pen. Messrs. Tinsley Brothers have in press his "Trip to Barbary by a Roundabout Way." In his professional capacity he followed the French Emperor on his late visit to Algiers, and his new book is probably composed from materials acquired during the journey. The same publishers announce a new work by Mr. Lawrence (the author of "Guy Livingston"), whose adventures as a would-be volunteer in the cause of the Confederate States, ending with his detention and confinement in Virginia, will be recalled among the amusing incidents connected with the rebellion, as dolefully related by himself. His forthcoming novel is entitled "Sans Merci; or, The Last Stoop of a Falcon."

—The number and value of books now imported show, by comparison with the same time last year, how great is the field opened to competition by the reduction of war prices, owing to the fall in the value of gold, etc. Among the books that were for a time virtually prohibited, but now again make their appearance at our stores, are the handy and convenient "Tauchnitz" series of "British Authors," comprising some five hundred volumes, or more, of the best modern light literature, in a really "pocket form," so commodious for use that it is surprising it has not superseded the elongated pamphlet shape—awkward to read and inconvenient to carry—that is most affected by our purveyors of novels. Baron Tauchnitz, for the success of his enterprise has raised him to the rank of the nobility, deserves credit for the manner in which his business is conducted. No book appears in his collection without an agreement for compensation with the author. The effect of this, though often in reality of inconsiderable amount (we dare say), is inexpressibly soothing to a writer, who is propitiated by any recognition of his claim to ownership in the produce of his brain. The same system, to our knowledge, is now practiced by all the respectable American publishing houses who reprint foreign books. The Tauchnitz books are kept in stock and supplied by F. A. Leypoldt, the German bookseller and publisher of 646 Broadway.

—One of whom the public hear but too little, Prof. Agassiz, will shortly address, through the medium of publication, a larger audience than those who were so fortunate as to attend his "Lectures on the Structure of Animal Life," delivered before the Brooklyn Institute. The six lectures of the course comprise: I. Four different plans of structure among animals; II. Relative standing or gradation of the animal kingdom; III. Remote antiquity of animal life, as shown with coral reefs; IV. Physical history of the earth—man the ultimate object; V. Triple coincidence in the successive gradation and growth of animals; VI. Evidence of an intelligent and constantly creative mind in the plans and variations of structure. It will be seen from the contents how closely these lectures touch upon the questions mooted in the discussions of modern naturalists and philosophers. On such points the voice of Professor Agassiz is potential, and is listened to as coming from one who speaks with an authority that is respected on both continents. His new work will form a handsome octavo volume with illustrations, and is shortly to be published by Messrs. C. Scribner & Co.

—Looking back at the past, we should be inclined to say that illustration had done its best—and its worst—for Shakespeare. Mr. Howard Staunton's "Memorials," just published in a handsome folio, supplies, however, a few necessary links of the chain of materials that constitute our knowledge of the poet, and gives to distant amateurs the same facilities for their study as if the originals were before them. It contains a photo-lithographed reproduction of Shakespeare's will, with a letter-press rendering, preserving all the minutiæ of the original, and copies of all documents connected with it, from the "Act Book of the Court of Probate, Doctors Commons," never before made public, and now procured by permission of the chief judge; also, fac-similes of the legal deeds connected with Shakespeare's signature and property, as the deed of conveyance of his house in Blackfriars, and the mortgage on the same, from the Guildhall and British Museum Libraries. "Matchless" photographs from the Chandos picture, the Droeshout engraving, etc., are also given, with annotation by the editor.

—There is a remarkable identity of dissimilarity or contrariety in the careers of two of the great living writers of France, M. Victor Cousin and M. Michelet. The one started in life as a philosopher, and the other as a historian. At a comparatively late date, when their fame in each vocation was established all over Europe, the philosopher turns historian, and the historian by an equally singular change of position becomes, what for want of a more proper name may be called a philosopher, though scorning any limitations in his trackless path through nature and man. M. Cousin's history, however, is far better than M. Michelet's philosophy. His monographs on Madame de Longueville and the heroines and heroes of the stormy times of the French annals that preceded the accession of Louis XIV., show great skill and a genuine love for historical research, rare in one who has acquired so famous a name for more abstract studies. His last published work, "La Jeunesse de Mazarin," sketches the rise of the great minister, though M. Cousin declines entering into the entire subject of his administration as too large for his accomplishment.

MR. PARKMAN'S HISTORICAL NARRATIVES.*

MR. PARKMAN'S "History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac" long since established his reputation not only as a careful and exact student of some of the obscurer passages of American colonial history, but as far better acquainted than any other living writer with the habits and character of the Indian races on this continent. It showed that he was admirably qualified to treat of those portions of our annals in which the Indians were prominent actors, and to exhibit in a true light their motives and character, and their relations to the early settlers. He had fitted himself for this work not merely by thorough research, but also by personal acquaintance and familiarity with the existing descendants of the aboriginal tribes, and by personal inspection of the localities in which the chief events of their history had been transacted. The reputation thus justly acquired will be confirmed and established by the present volume, in which the qualities that distinguished the preceding work of its author are displayed in mature development.

This is the first of a series of historical narratives for which he has laboriously collected the materials, and in which he hopes to treat of the springs of American civilization. The proper treatment of this subject would be a difficult and long task for any one, however well supplied with the needed appliances and enjoying the fulness of health.

Mr. Parkman, as we learn from a passage in his introduction, has accomplished the first part of his undertaking under circumstances that would have discouraged any man not possessed of indomitable constancy and unrelaxing vigor of character. His perseverance under trials so severe as those modestly enumerated in the following passage, and the success he has attained, win for him alike the sympathy and the respect of his reader. His example is one to be admired and emulated by students wearied or disheartened by the comparatively trivial difficulties that often attend literary work.

"To those," he says, "who have aided him with information and documents the extreme slowness in the progress of the work will naturally have caused surprise. This slowness was unavoidable. During the past eighteen years, the state of his health has exacted throughout an extreme caution in regard to mental application, reducing it at least within narrow and precarious limits, and often precluding it. Indeed, for two periods, each of several years, any attempt at bookish occupation would have been merely suicidal. A condition of sight arising from kindred sources has also retarded the work, since it has never permitted reading or writing continuously for much more than five minutes, and often has not permitted them at all. A previous work, 'The Conspiracy of Pontiac,' was written in similar circumstances."

The volume before us consists of two separate narratives: one entitled "Huguenots in Florida," the other, "Champlain and his Associates." The first of these striking passages in the early history of North America has had no modern historian. It has been briefly told before, but Mr. Parkman gives it with a detail that enables him to reproduce vividly both the actors of this tragic drama and the stage upon which its bloody scenes occurred. It will be a new story to most readers, even to those well versed in the early records of our history, and its romantic incidents form a fitting sequel to the voyage of Ponce de Leon, his search for the fountain of youth, and his discovery of the flowering land named Florida. The story of Champlain and his associates has been better known and more thoroughly investigated. But Mr. Parkman has given fresh interest to his narrative by the addition of some new details, by skilfully connecting Champlain's efforts with those of the earlier French settlers in Canada, and by his special acquaintance with the scenes of Champlain's labors, and with the history, tribal relations, and customs of the Indians. Champlain's character and achievements have never before been so clearly presented and so picturesquely portrayed.

Mr. Parkman belongs to the school of picturesque and biographic, rather than to that of philosophic historians. His general remarks are characterized by good sense, and his reflections are natural and to the point.

Dealing with the beginnings of civilized society in North America, with events upon a small scale, and with personages who took but little part in the great affairs of their times, he is enabled to give a fulness and completeness to his narratives which would have been of difficult attainment had their threads been more interwoven with the main web of history. Moreover, the early settlements in North America—Spanish, French, or English—had had little influence on the course of our own history. They were not real colonies, and it is curious to observe in Mr. Parkman's volume how slowly any genuine idea of colonization developed in the minds either of the promoters or the members of the early expeditions for settlement of the country. The love of adventure, the hope of gain, and the ardor for conversion of the heathen savages, were the three great impelling motives of these early voyagers. The love of adventure was often quenched by hardship, the hope of gain was often disappointed, the ardor for conversion often burnt out; but as often as one expedition was ruined or failed, others followed, lured on by the vague mystery, the unfulfilled promise, the boundless scope, of the New World. All through the sixteenth century, fleet after fleet set sail from the harbors of Spain, of France, of England, sent forth by royal bounty, by trading companies, by individual enterprise, and carrying adventurers of every class and description to seek their fortunes, to discover gold, to find the short way to the East, to save their own souls by bringing the wild heathen within the fold of Christ. How few of these adventurers of the sixteenth century succeeded! The French killed the Spaniards, the Spaniards massacred the French, the English fought them both. It is throughout a story of great expectations, of great hopes and great miseries. It is a wretched story of noble energies wasted; of sacrifices unrewarded; of bloodshed, cruelty, and perfidy; of Christian no less than heathen crime and suffering.

Old feudal Europe, in its decrepit days, strove to lay hands on the new land that had been raised out of the deep. It sent its nobles and its priests over to carry to it the highest fruits of European civilization. It practised its old trade of tyranny, extortion, and violence. It tried to hold the New World in its grasp, by charters and patents and papal bulls. But, by the grace of God, this continent existed not for kings' Dei gratia, and was no part of the patrimony of St. Peter. Feudal Europe failed. It tried for a hundred years, and it did not succeed in planting a single vigorous colony. No colonies drawing sustenance and existence from the Old World were to succeed in North America. The colonists that were to found the new civilization, the new social order, were to be cut off from dependence on Europe, were to come to America for the sake of independence; were to come not seeking gold or adventure—not bent on conversion of the heathen—not to build up the failing fortunes of noble or king, or to enrich a company of piratical traders. They were to come bent on saving their own souls in their own way—bent on getting rid of feudalism, and living where they could be free from its oppressive influence.

The colonists of the seventeenth century were of a wholly new order. They reversed the old conditions. The pilgrims of 1620 came prepared—nay, determined—to found a commonwealth, a true city of God. They were neither traders nor missionaries, but they established their little state on the two pillars that could alone afford a sure foundation for it—the pillars of industry and religion.

The colonists of France and Spain, when, at length, real colonists came from these kingdoms to the New World, never separated themselves from the Old. They depended on it, and it failed them. Never was there a finer colonial scheme than that of France in North America. Vast sums of money were expended to maintain it. But New France had no vital energy in itself; it was worked and managed from abroad. With the resources of a kingdom to support it, it never prospered. It was from beginning to end a contrast to New England. This contrast, suggested by Mr. Parkman's book, is one of the most interesting and important spectacles in the history of the world. The principles which underlie the development of modern, New World, American civilization are involved in it; and the very character and forms of the institutions peculiar to America are hardly to be fairly understood without reference to those with which in their rudimentary days they were brought into sharpest conflict. If Mr. Parkman should, as we trust, be able to go on with his scheme, he will give us the means by which to judge of and understand the first elements of American civilization. We could not have a more conscientious and painstaking instructor.

Mr. Parkman's style is excellent; careful without pedantry, animated without exaggeration; and if his descriptions are now and then a little overlabored, they are more often truly picturesque. His book will take a place among the authorities of American history, and will add his name to the list of those historians who have done honor to American literature.

* "France and England in North America. A Series of Historical Narratives. By Francis Parkman, author of 'History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac,' 'Prairie and Rocky Mountain Life,' etc. Part First. Pioneers of France in the New World." Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1865. Small 8vo, pp. xxii. 420.

THE SCHÖNBERG-COTTA FAMILY.*

THE wide circulation obtained by this work and its successors we attribute to their clever interfusion, and, indeed, we might almost say confusion, of history and fiction with religion. They offer neither the best

* "Hearthstone Series: Chronicles of the Schönberg-Cotta Family: The Early Dawn: Sketches of Christian Life in England in the Olden Time; Sketches of the United Brethren of Bohemia and Moravia; Diary of Mrs. Kitty Trevylyan: A Story of the Times of Whitefield and the Wesleys." New York: Tibbals & Whiting. 3 vols. 1865.

"Mary, the Handmaid of the Lord. By the Author of 'The Schönberg-Cotta Family,' etc." New York: M. W. Dodd. 1865.

history, the best piety, nor the best fiction, but they appeal to a public which has long since become reconciled to compromise—that extensive public, so respectable in everything but its literary taste, which patronizes what is called "Sunday reading." We do not propose to examine the theory of this branch of literature. It is an implicitly accepted fact. We propose simply to offer a few remarks upon the works before us as its fruit.

The foremost property of the school to which these works belong is an attempted, and, to a certain degree, successful, compromise between the interests of youth and those of maturity, between the serious and the trivial. This, indeed, is the mark of a vast proportion of the efforts of modern book-making—efforts which in their aggregate may be regarded as an attempt to provide a special literature for women and children, to provide books which grown women may read aloud to children without either party being bored. Books of this class never aim at anything so simple as merely to entertain. They frequently contain, as in the present case, an infusion of religious and historical information, and they in all cases embody a moral lesson. This latter fact is held to render them incompetent as novels; and doubtless, after all, it does, for of a genuine novel the meaning and the lesson are infinite; and here they are carefully narrowed down to a special precept.

It would be unjust to deny that these semi-developed novels are often very charming. Occasionally, like the "Heir of Redclyffe," they almost legitimate themselves by the force of genius. But this only when a first-rate mind takes the matter in hand. By a first-rate mind we here mean a mind which (since its action is restricted beforehand to the shortest gait, the smallest manners possible this side of the ridiculous) is the master and not the slave of its material. It is just now very much the fashion to discuss the so-called principle of realism, and we all know that there exists in France a school of art in which it is associated with great brilliancy and great immorality. The disciples of this school pursue, with an assiduity worthy of a better cause, the research of local colors, with which they have produced a number of curious effects. We believe, however, that the greatest successes in this line are reserved for that branch of the school which contains the most female writers; for if women are unable to draw, they notoriously can at all events paint, and this is what realism requires. For an exhibition of the true realistic chique we would accordingly refer that body of artists who are represented in France by MM. Flaubert and Gérome to that class of works which in our own literature are represented by the "Daisy Chain" and "The Wide, Wide World," and to which the "Chronicles" before us essentially belong. Until the value of chique can be finally established, we should doubtless be thankful that in our literature it lends its vivifying force only to objects and sensations of the most unquestioned propriety. In these "Chronicles," for instance, it is impressed into the service of religion. In this particular instance, the healthy, if not very lively, fancy of the author, her pleasant style, and her apparent religious sincerity, secure a result which on the whole is not uninteresting. But the radical defects of the theological novel come out strongly in the "Diary of Mrs. Kitty Trevylyan," where the story is but a thin coating for a bitter pill of Methodism. We are all of us Protestants, and we are all of us glad to see the Reformation placed in its most favorable light, but as we are not all of us Methodists, it is hard to sympathize with a lady's ex parte treatment of John Wesley. Our authoress does not claim to be more than superficial, and it were better not to touch Methodism at all than to handle it superficially. It is probably impossible that such of the phenomena of Methodism as might with any show of likelihood find an echo in the daily jottings of an ordinary country girl should be other than repulsive to the impartial reader.

The "Chronicles" present a kind of tabular view of the domestic pursuits of a group of growing boys and girls, contemporaries and friends of Martin Luther. Of this, the central figure in her narrative, the authoress has discreetly given us only a portrait in profile. Her object has been to give us a household picture of the Reformation. But it is the misfortune of short-gaited writers that they are unable to carry out an idea which demands any continuity of purpose. They enjoy, however, this compensation, that if they do not succeed in one thing, they may reasonably be held to have succeeded in another. Of history in the "Chronicles" there is just as much as may have been obtained by an attentive perusal of M. Merle d'Aubigné. But there is a great deal of what has been very wittily called "her story." A very small part of the Reformation must necessarily have been seen from the leaded window-panes of an obscure Saxon printer. But a certain infinitesimal portion of it may very naturally have transpired in the quaint and wainscotted rooms behind these window-panes, especially if the printer's family happened to boast the acquaintance of Doctor Luther. When we have said that the author has conveyed the impression of all this Gothic furniture with tolerable success, we have given to the truthfulness of her work the highest praise at our command. For this a pleasing fancy was alone required; but for those more difficult portions which involved the reconstruction of feelings and ideas, there was need of that vigorous imagination and that serious reflection which can stand on tiptoe and overlook three centuries of civilization.

The author's whole tone is the tone of the retrospective present. She anticipates throughout the judgments of posterity. Morally, her young chroniclers are of the nineteenth century, or they at least have had access to it. The subjects of great revolutions are like the rank and file of great armies, they are all unconscious of the direction and force of the movement to which they contribute. Our civil war has taught us, among so many other valuable lessons, the gross natural blindness—that is, we are bound in reason to believe, the clear spiritual insight—of great popular impulses. It has intimated that if these were of men only they would often miscarry for very shame. But men's natural deserts are frequently at variance with their spiritual needs; and they are allowed to execute the divine plan not only by their own petty practices, but on their own petty theories; not only by obedience but by spontaneity. We are very apt to do small things in God's name, but God does great things in ours. The sagacious Schönbergs-Cotta are by far too divinely illumined, too well aware of what they want, and of what they are likely to get. There must have been a great deal more of feeling than of thought in the Reformation, and almost as much of action as of either. People loved and hated, and feared and fought, and—a fact, we imagine, which is near the bottom of much that is of revolutionary effect—were dreadfully nervous; but we may be certain that they did not moralize as we moralize now-a-days. Protestantism is still on the whole sufficiently orthodox; but we are all of us more or less Unitarians in spirit compared with the founders of our creed. What was done both by them and by their opponents was done in the absolute name of religion. How then should it have been done at all? "When half-gods go," says Emerson, "the gods arrive." Assuredly, when the gods arrive, the half-gods depart. When religion enters in force, moral pre-occupations withdraw. Duty was not probably an habitual topic with the Reformers. We doubt whether a simple burgher's daughter was familiar with the word "conscientious." That she had a conscience is eminently probable, but we hardly believe that she knew it. Nor can we conceive her to have been troubled with "views" or "difficulties." But however this may be, let us not bear severely on any honest attempt to revive the great facts of the past. If people must indulge in the composition of ingenious nothings, let their nothings be about a central something. Let us hang our fancies rather upon the immortal than upon the ephemeral. Works like the present affect the great figure of history as much and as little as the travelling cloud-shadows affect the insensitive mountains.

JESSE H. JONES ON SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON.*

Such is the title of a work, recently issued from the press, the object of which is to refute the philosophy of Sir William Hamilton, Mr. Mansel, and those who agree with them, as against the theories of Cousin, Coleridge, and their followers. It is a work upon the basis and in the interest of that particular form of the transcendental philosophy advocated by Dr. Hickock. Taking this system as his stand-point and base of supplies, the author proceeds gallantly to do battle against the principles of the Hamiltonian or, as he chooses to call it, the limitist philosophy.

On what ground Mr. Herbert Spencer is classed with the disciples and followers of Hamilton we do not precisely see. We have never considered Mr Spencer as belonging or professing to belong to that school. So far as regards the acceptance or rejection of the views of Cousin and the transcendentalists of that type, we presume Mr. Spencer stands on common ground with the disciples of Hamilton. But so also do very many who would by no means call themselves Hamiltonians. Indeed, the principle of classification adopted by our author seems to be the somewhat peculiar one of placing together in one class all those who bow at the shrine of Cousin, Coleridge, and Hickock, as the tutelary divinities of all true philosophy, and in the other class all those who do not worship at that particular altar—a method of classification, we submit, neither scientific nor sensible. It is the same principle on which a popular conundrum groups together the antediluvians and the elephant in Barnum's Museum, on the ground that neither could speak French.

We must say, in justice to the work before us, that it is written with a very commendable degree of vigor and sharpness. It is evidently the work of a young man, and we like it none the less for that. It is written, not as a book made to order, but, as it should be, con amore, and because the writer could not help it. No one can blame him for writing. It was a case of sheer necessity. We do not doubt that Mr. Jones would have exploded ere this had he not written. No man can drink so copiously of the waters of that fountain whence our author derives his inspiration and long survive, unless he sit down quickly and write a book.

* "Know the Truth; a Critique on the Hamiltonian Theory of Limitation, including some Strictures upon the theories of Rev. Henry J. Mansel and Mr. Herbert Spencer. By Jesse H. Jones." New York: Hurd & Houghton.

We do not propose, in this brief notice, to discuss the philosophy of the book in detail, or to enter at all into the merits of the system on which it is based. We have neither space nor disposition for such a discussion. We shall merely point out a few things which strike us, at first glance, as obvious defects in the work before us, and which seem to demand notice.

In the first place, there is about it, as in most of the productions that emanate from this school, a certain air and assumption of superior wisdom which is not warranted by any actual superiority of the system to other systems, or of its disciples to other men. It appears at first sight, and everywhere, on these pages. It is the fault, as we have said, not of the book alone, but of the school to which it belongs. To call it by its proper name, it is simple conceit—honest enough, as conceit usually is, but wholly uncalled for, and verging closely upon the ridiculous. We know of no mutual admiration society to be compared with that which, by a sort of tacit consent, seems to exist among this particular class of philosophers. Were there by any means to be a convocation of them in any one place, we should expect the whole assembly, for about the space of one hour, to cry out with one accord and one voice, "Great is Cousin, great are Coleridge and Dr. Hickock, and great are their disciples."

Now we would by no means withhold the tribute of a just admiration for any true and earnest thinker—and such, we freely admit, are those now mentioned—but there are also others equally earnest and equally profound who are not of that school; and for any clique or coterie, however respectable or numerous, to set up itself and its idol as the men, and its philosophy as the true system of the universe, is, to say the least, a piece of assumption that is not in good taste. But we have no wish to be severe in the matter. The fault which we criticize is amusing rather than otherwise. It reminds us of the philosopher who, when asked why he allowed his wife to beat him so furiously, replied, "Oh, it amuses the little woman, and does not hurt me." On this principle, we submit without further protest, and with all due resignation, to such utterances as the following: "Since the followers of Sir William Hamilton, whom we will hereafter term limitists, have neglected to take the great truths enunciated by the American metaphysician (in his work), and apply them to their own system, and so be convinced by their own study of the worthlessness of that system, it becomes their opponents, in the interest of truth, to perform this work in their stead," etc. (page 4). "Believing this system to be thoroughly vicious in its tendencies—being such, indeed, as would, if carried out, undermine the whole Christian religion; and, what is of equal importance, being false to the facts in man's soul as God's creature, the writer will attempt to achieve the just named and so desirable result" (i. e. the destruction of the Hamiltonian system of philosophy"), page 8.

It is always well to know what to expect; and it was certainly kind in our author to give his opponents due warning of their impending danger.

The head and front of the offence committed by the system of philosophy which Mr. Jones feels himself called upon to demolish is its refusal to acknowledge the existence in man of a faculty of knowing, by immediate or intuitive perception, the infinite and the absolute, or, in other words, the faculty of the unconditioned. This, according to the philosophy of Cousin, Coleridge & Co., is, under the name of the Reason, the chief and crowning faculty of the human mind—a faculty as far above the understanding as the heavens are above the earth. By it the human mind perceives, by direct vision, and not through the slow process of the understanding, not only all first truths or principles, but the infinite and absolute Being in whom these first truths inhere. It knows him not by inference, comparison, conclusion, but by direct vision. It "intuits" him, to use a favorite term of our author. The reason, he constantly assures us, is the eye by which man directly and immediately perceives all first truths, and deity as the source and centre of all.

Now that Hamilton, in common, it must be said, with the great body of philosophers, ancient and modern, denies the existence in man of any such faculty as that now described, a power of immediate perception of the infinite and absolute, direct vision of deity, and the like, is very true. It has seemed to him, and to them, that there are limits to the human mind—that it cannot pass those limits—that the infinite, the absolute, the eternal, can be known but imperfectly, and in part, not by immediate perception, and not as he is in himself; that, for the present, we see only through a glass, darkly; and not by direct vision, as face to face.

If, however, it should be inferred from this that the Hamiltonian philosophy denies the existence of first truths, or of the power of the human mind to perceive and recognize first truths, and that by immediate knowledge, or intuitively, it would be a great mistake; and it is precisely this mistake that our author uniformly and persistently makes. One would never infer from his pages that the existence of such a thing as a first truth had ever been admitted by those whom he combats, if, indeed, by anybody outside of his own little coterie of thinkers. It is everywhere assumed, if not in so many words affirmed, that Hamilton, and those who follow him, entirely ignore this whole class of truths; whereas the fact is entirely opposite. No class of writers, of whatever school, period, or nationality, English, French, or German, have so uniformly and constantly held the doctrine, and have so fully and successfully elaborated the problem of this class of truths, as that whole school of philosophers commonly called the Scotch, from Reid downward. Not only have they explicitly maintained the existence of first truths, but they have expressly pointed out universality and necessity as among the marks or conditions of such truth. So also Reid, Stuart, Hamilton, Mansel, et id genus omne. That these truths are perceived not by comparison and reasoning, but immediately and intuitively by the mind, is also held by those of this school. They do not, however, as already stated, include the infinite and absolute, nor deity as a being infinite and absolute, among the first truths thus perceived by intuition or immediate knowledge, and herein they differ from the school to which our author belongs.

"Give me to see, that I may know where to strike," is the motto affixed by Mr. Jones to his book. We fear that, in this instance, the prayer has not been granted; since, in the form of the facts as now stated, we find him making such assertions as the following:

"It is the essential tenet of their whole scheme that the human mind nowhere, and under no circumstances, makes an affirmation which it unreservedly qualifies as necessary and universal." (Page 12.)

Mr. Jones seems to have fallen unconsciously into the not uncommon error of reasoning in a circle in respect to the divine existence and the veracity of our faculties, as Descartes and other great thinkers have also done. The reason, he maintains, gives us God as an object of direct perception. That he is, and is what he is, lies among the first truths of the reason. We cannot prove his existence. We know it by consciousness, by immediate vision; but how do we know that this organ of immediate vision, this eye of the soul, is itself trustworthy? The answer is, We know that it is so, because God, who made it, will not deceive. Thus, on page 16, speaking of a standard of beauty as instinctively affirmed by the mind, he remarks: "And this conclusion is true, because God, who made us, and constructed the ground whereon this affirmation springs, is true." The evidence of the divine existence is thus made to depend on the veracity of our faculties, and the veracity of our faculties in turn on the divine being and character. We do not know that God is true, except as the reason perceives him to be so; and we do not know that the reason is trustworthy, except as God is true.

We have a more serious difficulty with the position which our author assumes respecting the divine consciousness. He maintains that, in the divine mind or consciousness, subject and object are identical. As man, the finite person, in the process of self-knowledge, is himself both subject and object; so deity, or the infinite and absolute spiritual person, is always, and in all his knowledge and consciousness, himself at once subject and object of that knowledge. We do not see how, if this be so, we can escape the conclusion of a thorough-going Pantheism. If the divine being, as self-conscious subject, is identical with all that comes before his mind as object, then he includes all things, and is all things, in himself. In fact this is expressly admitted by our author:

"He distinguishes his self, as object, from no what else, because there is no else [the italics are ours] to distinguish his self from; but having an exhaustive self-comprehension, he distinguishes within that self all possible forms of being each from each" (p. 62). To the same effect: "Because, possessing all fulness, he is actually everything, by this characteristic feature of completeness he distinguishes himself from nothing, which is all there is (if nothing—void—can be said to be) beside him, and forming part which there is within him" (p. 69).

It would hardly be possible to state more explicitly the essential doctrine of Pantheism than in the above language. Suppose, then, the object of the divine knowledge to be that peculiar personage whom the Scriptures call Satan—Mr. Jones, we presume, believes in the existence and reality of such a personage, and that as real existence he is an object of divine knowledge. As thus known, does deity distinguish this being from himself, or are they identical?

We have not space for further criticism. If we dissent from the fundamental positions of our author, it is in no spirit of unkindness nor from any desire to find fault. We recognize the candor and earnestness of the writer and admire his boldness. With many of his criticisms upon Mr. Spencer we heartily agree. But to demolish the philosophy of Sir William Hamilton, should such a result in the progress of human events become desirable, will require other weapons than those of this book or the school from which it emanates.

MILITARY SURGERY.*

When the time comes for striking a balance in the account of profit and loss which the country has sustained through the war which has been so happily brought to a successful termination, the advantages which have accrued to the medical sciences will be no inconsiderable items in the sum total of benefits. Many doubtful points have been settled, many old doctrines demolished, many new principles established, and thus in those departments of knowledge which especially relate to the preservation of life and the alleviation of human suffering, as well as in others, the world has profited to an extent which now can scarcely be estimated at its full value.

Like all sciences which exhibit real progress, military surgery has been of slow growth. Three hundred years ago amputations were performed with red-hot knives, and the bleeding stumps were dipped in boiling oil or melted pitch for the purpose of arresting hemorrhage; the wounded were often killed to put them out of pain and save trouble; and less than twenty years have elapsed since the barbarous practice of enlarging gunshot wounds by free incisions was insisted upon as highly necessary.

But with each improvement in the means of destruction employed by armies, the surgery of war took giant strides, until at present—although very far from having attained to perfection—it is greatly in advance of its position at any former period. The minié ball is the last refinement upon the devices of mankind for injuring each other in battle, and to it we also owe many of the more important principles of treatment which have recently been established. And thus it is always. A distinguished French military surgeon has remarked that "the circumstances which contribute most to the destruction of man are likewise those out of which he deduces the best measures for his preservation."

But whilst other nations were able to do much for the progress of military surgery, we in this country had, until the rebellion, done almost nothing. The Revolutionary war, that of 1812, the numerous Indian wars, and the campaigns fought out on the plains and mountains of Mexico, were literally barren of results for the science in question. Why this was so, it is needless to enquire at present. The imputation cannot, however, in justice be made with reference to the war which has just been brought to a close, for never in the history of the world has a great struggle been so fruitful in ameliorations in the treatment of the sick and wounded of armies as that which, for four long and dreary years, brought sorrow to many a loyal and disloyal household.

It would be out of place for us to point out specifically the matters in which advancement has taken place. Many of them are fully discussed in Dr. Hamilton's excellent treatise, and we must leave to the medical journals the duty of still further elaboration. Dr. Hamilton is the first who has made a systematic attempt to bring together the facts and results belonging to military surgery, which the late rebellion enabled our medical officers to collect. That he will not be the last, is very certain. The material is so great in amount, and the field so extensive, that we shall expect to see the book before us followed, ere long, by others giving us the results of their authors' experience, and adding to the reputation which American military surgeons have already acquired. Dr. Hamilton's work does much to free us from the reproach under which we have heretofore labored. It is an eminently practical treatise, clearly written, and filled with the details of cases not only interesting in themselves, but important as conveying much sound information on difficult and mooted points. The author is certainly not a venturesome practitioner. He prefers laboring quietly and securely, to dangerous and brilliant, though oftentimes successful, experimentation in his attempts to save the lives and limbs of his patients. As a guide for students and young or inexperienced practitioners, his book can scarcely be too highly commended; and, as to the experienced, though they will certainly find much in Dr. Hamilton's treatise to interest them, it is not at all probable that they will accept it or any other book as an infallible guide. No class of men of our acquaintance are so self-reliant as military surgeons, and those who have gone through the late war have a right to form their own conclusions upon most points connected with the profession to which they belong. Dr. Hamilton, however, has labored with them, and it is due to him that they should give an attentive consideration to his opinions. They will be the more inclined to do this when they discover that the author knows what he is talking about, and that he states his views with the modesty so becoming to us in all things, and especially in matters of a scientific character.

* "A Treatise on Military Surgery and Hygiene. By Frank Hastings Hamilton, M.D., etc." New York: Baillière Brothers. 1865. pp. 648.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Favorite Poems by English Poets. (The Cottage Library.) Bunce & Huntington, New York.

France and England in North America. By Francis Parkman. Part First. Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

Know the Truth. A Critique on the Hamiltonian Theory of Limitation. By Jesse H. Jones. Hurd & Houghton, New York.

Fine Arts.

THE DRAMA.

MR. AND MRS. CHARLES KEAN.

The audiences which nightly fill the Broadway Theatre are of the most diversified character—old devotees who remember Mr. and Mrs. Kean when they made their début at the old Park Theatre some twenty years ago, and who recall the pleasures of that time by the suggestions of to-day; young persons who are influenced by curiosity to see the stars who have been so long before the public; and a few whose love for Shakespeare is so great that his plays are welcome even if all the parts are not well performed.

Nature did little for Mr. Kean. She made him quite small, and gave him a feeble voice. No art nor training could therefore make him a great actor. He has, however, developed his powers to the utmost, and deserves praise for the success he has attained in spite of his physical deficiencies. He is a perfect artist. We have watched him with unceasing vigilance, and can find no fault with him as an actor. Every gesture is correct, every glance of the eye is exactly timed and expressive; every change of position and posture is the result of minute study, and so well practiced that the details of the rehearsal are not observed. He avoids gestures unless the result of passion, and is so attentive to what is said to him, and so prompt in his replies, that the words seem more like his own than those of the author. He has earnestness and pathos. He is simple and refined. He has almost entirely overcome those peculiarities of voice and manner which used to make him the subject of burlesque imitation. He interests, he excites, he charms, he controls the sympathies of his audience by his consummate art.

In the scene between Shylock and Tubal, in the Merchant of Venice (third act), Mr. Kean is especially effective. The rapid transitions between the emotions of the miser at the extravagance of his daughter and the exultations of expected revenge excited by the news of Antonio's misfortunes, are made with unsurpassed skill. While speaking the lines after his estates are confiscated for seeking the life of Antonio (act fourth),

> "Nay, take my life and all; pardon not that:
> You take my house when you do take the prop
> That doth sustain my house; you take my life
> When you do take the means whereby I live,"

the wretchedness expressed in attitude and voice is so touching that the resentment naturally aroused by the merciless vengeance of the Jew yields at once to pity for his crushed condition.

Mr. Kean does not make the heart leap with violent passion, because he has not the force of voice requisite; but he always delights, and leaves in the mind the most pleasant remembrance.

In a parlor, behind a table, Mrs. Kean would still delight by the purity of her reading; but her once beautiful voice has lost so much of its power, that the contrast with former days is constantly in the mind of those who remember her as Ellen Tree. Her figure has become very large, and is painfully unsuitable for the young, romantic, and lovely Portia. There are many characters which she can still take with effect, and we hope to see her in them. But as Mr. and Mrs. Kean do fill the theatre, it is natural to suppose that Portia and Juliet will occasionally appear as advanced maidens of more than ordinary stoutness.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.
JOSEPH W. WILDEY, Secretary.

FIRST CLASS FIRE INSURANCE

ON THE PARTICIPATION PLAN.

MARKET FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

37 WALL STREET, CORNER OF JAUNCEY COURT.

CONDITION OF THE COMPANY.

ABSTRACT OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF DEC. 31, 1864.

TOTAL ASSETS		$414,729 18
Viz.—Bonds and Mortgages	$134,672 00
Temporary Loans	92,630 00
Real Estate	10,000 00
100 Shares Mer. Ex. Bank	5,000 00
Government Sec., value	144,514 00
Cash on hand	18,042 34
Interest due	3,085 58
Premiums due	6,785 26
PRESENT LIABILITIES		$15,995 92
NET SURPLUS		198,733 26

This Company will continue, as heretofore, to insure respectable parties against DISASTER BY FIRE

At fair and remunerating rates; extending, according to the terms on its Policies, the advantage of the

PARTICIPATION PLAN OF THE COMPANY,

pursued by it for several years past, with such great success and popularity, and profit to its customers: whereby

(75) SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT. (75)

of the Profits, instead of being withdrawn from the Company in Dividends to Stockholders, is invested as a "SCRIP FUND," and held for greater protection of its Policyholders; and Scrip, bearing interest, is issued to Customers therefor: thus, IN THIS COMPANY, those who furnish the business, AND PAY THE PREMIUMS, derive the largest share of advantages; and when the accumulations of the SCRIP FUND shall exceed

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,

the excess will be applied to PAY OFF the Scrip IN CASH in the order of its issue.

☞ The liberal and prompt adjustment of Claims for Loss, WHEN FAIR AND SQUARE, is a specialty with this Company.

NOTE.—This Company does not insure on the hazards of RIVER, LAKE, or INLAND NAVIGATION; confining itself strictly to a legitimate FIRE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

ASHER TAYLOR, President.

H. P. FREEMAN, Secretary.

ATLANTIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY,

51 WALL STREET, cor. of William, NEW YORK,

JANUARY, 1865.

Insures against Marine and Inland Navigation Risks.

The WHOLE PROFITS of the Company revert to the ASSURED, and are divided ANNUALLY, upon the Premiums terminated during the year; and for which Certificates are issued, BEARING INTEREST until redeemed.

The Dividend was 40 per cent. in each of the years 1863-4 and 5.

The Profits for 22 years amount to the sum of	$19,691,020
Of which there has been redeemed by Cash	12,653,730

The Company has—

ASSETS, OVER ELEVEN MILLION DOLLARS,

Viz.:

United States and State of New York Stock, City, Bank, and other Stocks	$4,974,700
Loans secured by Stocks and otherwise	2,187,950
Premium Notes and Bills Receivable, Real Estate, Bond and Mortgages, and other securities	3,140,530
United States Gold Coin	541,890
Cash in Bank	288,430
	$11,135,500

TRUSTEES:

John D. Jones,	Daniel S. Miller,	Cornelius Grinnell,
Charles Dennis,	Joshua J. Henry,	C. A. Hand,
W. H. H. Moore,	Geo. G. Hobson,	Watts Sherman,
Henry Coit,	David Lane,	B. J. Howland,
Wm. C. Pickersgill,	James Bryce,	Benj. Babcock,
Lewis Curtis,	Wm. Sturgis,	Fletcher Westray,
Charles H. Russell,	Henry K. Bogert,	Rob. B. Minturn, Jr.,
Lowell Holbrook,	William E. Dodge,	Gordon W. Burnham,
R. Warren Weston,	Dennis Perkins,	Frederick Chauncey,
Royal Phelps,	Joseph Gaillard, Jr.,	James Low,
Caleb Barstow,	J. Henry Burgy,	Charles H. Marshall,
	A. P. Pillot.

JOHN D. JONES, President.
CHARLES DENNIS, Vice-President.
W. H. H. MOORE, 2d Vice-Pres't.

J. H. CHAPMAN, Acting Secretary.

GENERAL SOUTHERN LAND AGENCY,

NEW YORK OFFICE, 62 BROADWAY.

FOR SALE OR LEASE,

VALUABLE LANDS IN ALL THE SOUTHERN STATES.

KEMP P. BATTLE, Secretary.

AUTHORIZED REFERENCES:

PETER COOPER, Esq., New York.
JAY COOKE, Esq., Philadelphia.
A. A. Low, Esq., Pres. Chamber of Commerce, N. Y.
GEO. H. STUART, Esq., Philadelphia.
His Excellency Gov. HOLDEN, of North Carolina.

VERMILYE & CO.,

BANKERS,

44 Wall Street, N. Y.,

GOVERNMENT LOAN AGENTS,

KEEP ON HAND, FOR

IMMEDIATE DELIVERY,

THE ISSUES OF

7.30 TREASURY NOTES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS.

We BUY and SELL all classes of GOVERNMENT SECURITIES at market rates ORDERS from BANKS and BANKERS executed on favorable terms, and with dispatch.

Also, receive DEPOSITS, and ALLOW INTEREST on current balances.

VERMILYE & CO.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,

108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital,	$1,000,000
Surplus, over	400,000

This Company insures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND INLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

IF PREMIUMS ARE PAID IN GOLD, LOSSES WILL BE PAID IN GOLD.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
EDWARD A. STANSBURY, 2d Vice-President.
JOHN C. GOODRIDGE, Secretary.

BILLS ON LONDON

At Sixty Days' Sight and at Three Days' Sight, for sale by

WARD, CAMPBELL & CO.,
56 Wall Street, New York.

AETNA INSURANCE COMPANY, OF HARTFORD,

INCORPORATED 1819. CHARTER PERPETUAL.

Paid up Capital,	$2,250,000 00
Assets, July 1, 1865,	3,850,351 78
Losses Paid in 45 Years,	$17,485,894 71

T. A. ALEXANDER, Pres't. L. J. HENDEE, Sec'y.
JONA. GOODWIN, Jr., A. Sec'y.

Insurance against loss and damage by Fire, and of Inland Navigation.

NEW YORK AGENCY, 62 WALL STREET.

JAS. A. ALEXANDER, AGENT.

THE

MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY,

COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.

JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.

CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE.

Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

B. C. MORRIS, President.

WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,

46 PINE STREET, NEW YORK,

BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

The National Park Bank of New York.

CAPITAL - - - - $2,000,000. | SURPLUS - - - - $1,200,000.

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.

J. L. WORTH, Cashier.

NEW YORK, Aug. 21, 1865.

BAIRD & BRADLEY,

CHICAGO LOAN AND COLLECTION AGENCY.

Investments for a term of years made for Eastern Capitalists. Corporations and Estates amply secured by First Mortgage on Real Estate in Chicago and vicinity, with semi-annual interest payable at any point East.

Real Estate purchased, managed, and sold for Eastern parties.

Notes collected and avails promptly remitted.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL - - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000 00

ASSETS - - - - - - - - - - - - - 1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.

PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

E. W. CLARK & CO.,

BANKERS AND BROKERS,

35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS,

COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,

56 WALL STREET,

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY A.M.

SINCE our last report, the official statement of the public debt of the United States to 31st August has been published. The figures compare as follows with the previous statement of the 31st July. They are received in financial circles most favorably as the evidence of the ability of the Treasury to pay its own way, from taxation and customs, without further borrowing:

	July 31.	August 31.
5-20s original	$514,780,500	$514,780,500
5-20s new	91,789,000	91,789,000
6 per cents., 1881	282,961,450	282,609,000
10-40s, 5 per cents	172,770,100	172,770,100
Old 6 per cents	19,339,592	19,339,592
Old 5 per cents	27,022,000	27,022,000
Total gold-bearing	$1,108,662,642	$1,108,310,192
7-30 per cents	$830,000,000	$830,000,000
6 per cents., compound	212,126,470	217,024,160
5 per cents., notes	39,954,230	33,954,230
6 per cent. certificates	106,706,000	85,093,000
6 per cent. stock to Pacific Road	1,258,000	1,258,000
Deposits on interest	99,116,845	107,148,713
Total currency-bearing	$1,289,156,545	$1,274,478,103
Greenbacks	$433,160,569	$433,160,569
Fractional	25,750,032	26,344,742
Requisitions	15,736,000	2,111,000
Total free of interest	$474,646,601	$461,616,311
Less on hand	*116,739,632	*88,218,055
Net free of interest	$357,906,969	$373,398,256
Debt past due	1,527,120	1,503,020
Total of all debts	$2,757,253,276	$2,757,689,571
Annual interest in gold	$64,521,837	$64,500,596
Annual interest in currency	74,740,630	73,531,037
Currency	$84,401,775	$42,782,284
Gold	35,337,887	45,435,771
Total	$116,739,632	$88,218,055

* On hand.

The associated banks in the New York Clearing House report as follows this week:

Local capital	$9,535,665
National	68,847,700
Total in Clearing House	$77,383,365
Loans	$211,394,370
Specie	14,443,827
Deposits	180,316,658
Legal Tender	57,271,730

The whole stock of gold and silver in bank and in the New York Treasury Office compares as follows with this time last year:

	August 31, 1865.	August 31, 1864.
In the Sub-Treasury	$38,381,820	$12,731,793
In city banks	14,443,827	20,136,548
Total	$52,825,647	$32,868,341
Increase since September 1, 1864		$19,957,326

The favorable statement of the public debt was published early in the week, and created an agreeable surprise from the fact that, for the first time since April, 1861, it showed no increase on the previous statement. This has given increased confidence to the Government funds. The circumstance that the New York (reformed) Democracy, in convention at Albany, have pledged the party to the integrity of the war debt of the United States, has also afforded much satisfaction to certain timid holders, who were apprehensive of some sort of attempt at "repudiation," as a party issue.

The Stock Exchange has been moderately active through the week, though the railway list is the subject of a pretty even contest between the Bulls and Bears of the Exchange, and the advantage gained in prices one day is lost the next, so that, as a general remark, very little improvement is shown over last Saturday.

The merchants and the Custom-house are still kept very busy with the fall trade. The customs for the week will reach about four millions in gold, and for the first eight working days in September nearly five millions, which is largely ahead thus far of July and August. Owing to the heavy average of duties, these customs do not point to a very excessive importation, though some concern begins to be felt that the movement is stronger than it should be in the present state of the country, unless cotton goes forward to Europe more freely by way of exchange. The receipts of cotton at this port the present week are 25,754 bales, while the export is only 1,882 bales. About 12,000 bales per week are believed to be taken for our domestic mills, which still leaves a large weekly accumulation of cotton stock on hand. There are now probably 250,000 bales at the ports of New York, New Orleans, and Mobile, exclusive of the amount in transitu coastwise.

Money was partially firmer about the middle of the week, and some of the lenders to the Stock Exchange were able to get 6 per cent. The rate has fallen back, however, to 5 per cent., as the rate of the Street on call, and 6 to 8 per cent. on prime paper 60 days to 4 months in date. Exchange continues below the specie-exporting point, and bills on London were done yesterday, for the steamer sailing this morning, at 108¾ to 109¼. The price of gold remains 144⅛ to 144⅝ per cent., the demand to pay customs being in part supplied from sales by the Government.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The original 5-20s have advanced to 107½ on an improved London quotation. The new issue is up to 105⅝; the 6s of 1881, 107⅞ to 108; the 10-40s, ex dividend, 94¼ to 94⅝. No change in the 7.30 currency loans from 99⅝ to 99½ and accrued interest. The new certificates of indebtedness have advanced to 99 per cent. on the unexpected showing of the public debt. The compound legal tender notes are wanted at 105 for the June, 1864, issue, and 102½ to 101 for the later 1864 months.

STATE SECURITIES.

New York 7 per cent. scrip is 99 to 99½, including interest from July. Tennessees have further advanced from 75 to 80 per cent.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Ohio and Mississippi certificates advanced from 28 to 30, but fell back to 28 to 28¼ per cent.; Erie shares 86½ to 91½ and back to 88½; New York Central, 93 to 92⅞; Reading, 106¾ up to 107½ and back to 106¾; Michigan Southern, 65½ up to 67½ and back to 66¼; Michigan Central, 108½ up to 110, and back to 109; Pittsburg, 72½ up to 73½, and back to 71¾; North-west, 28½ to 28; North-west Preferred, 63¾ down to 61¾; Fort Wayne, 97 to 97½; Rock Island from 108½ up to 111¼ and back to 110¼. The market unsettled at close of the week.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

Bank stocks are dull this week. Atlantic Mail, down to 145 to 147; Canton, Cumberland, and Mariposa, steady; Quicksilver down to 48 and up to 49¾ to 50.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Gold, 144⅝; bills on London, 109 to 109⅛ for Bank names.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW,
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL,
JOHN G. WHITTIER,
SAMUEL ELIOT (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford),
PROFESSOR TORREY (Harvard),
DR. FRANCIS LIEBER,
PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH (Oxford),
PROFESSOR CHILD (Harvard),
HENRY JAMES,
CHARLES E. NORTON,
JUDGE BOND (Baltimore),
EDMUND QUINCY,
PROFESSOR W. D. WHITNEY (Yale),
PROFESSOR D. C. GILMAN (Yale),
JUDGE DALY,
PROFESSOR DWIGHT (Columbia College),
PROFESSOR TAYLER LEWIS (Schenectady),
JUDGE WAYLAND,
FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED,
REV. DR. MCCLINTOCK,
REV. DR. JOS. P. THOMPSON,
REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS,
REV. DR. BELLOWS,
C. J. STILLÉ,
HENRY T. TUCKERMAN,
BAYARD TAYLOR,
C. A. BRISTED,
C. L. BRACE,
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON,
SYDNEY GEORGE FISHER,
THEODORE TILTON,
JAMES PARTON,
GAIL HAMILTON.

TERMS:—Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER,
130 Nassau street, N. Y.

STATIONERY.

TO STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS, AND NOTION DEALERS.—The undersigned, being the oldest envelope manufacturers in this country, and having the amplest facilities, are always ready to supply, by the thousand or by the million, envelopes of every variety of size, pattern, and color, at the lowest prices.

Samples furnished when called for.

WM. P. LYON & WHITTEMORE,
537 Pearl St., New York.

FINKLE & LYON'S
IMPROVED
LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

BOYNTON'S FURNACES.

Boynton's Brick and Portable Furnaces, Fire-place and Parlor Heaters, Kitcheners, Ranges, Parlor and Office Stoves, are warranted to give satisfaction. Send for circular.

RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,
234 Water Street, near Beekman, New York.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!
Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees
IN EVERY STYLE,
MANUFACTURED BY
ROBERT PATON,
24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,
45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,
STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS,
AND
BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

DECKER & CO.

MANUFACTURERERS OF PIANO-FORTES,

419 BROOME STREET,

One Block East from Broadway, N. Y.

Our instruments combine all the improvements of REAL WORTH known in their manufacture, and are warranted for the term of seven (7) years.

W. H. Schieffelin & Co.,
SUCCESSORS TO
SCHIEFFELIN BROTHERS & CO.,
Importers and Jobbers of
DRUGS,
Indigo, Corks, Sponges,
FANCY GOODS, PERFUMERY, ETC., ETC.,
170 and 172 William Street, N. Y.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

Celebrated Gold Medal

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,

AND

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL.

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

GARDEN & CEMETERY ADORNMENTS.

FOUNTAINS, VASES, ETC., ETC.

SUMMER HOUSES,

ARBORS, CHAIRS, SETTEES, ETC.

Wire Trellises and Arches

FOR VINES, FLOWERS, ETC.

IRON FURNITURE,

Bedsteads of every description

For Dwellings, Public Institutions, Hospitals, Prisons, etc.

Patent Spring Beds, Mattresses, etc.

STABLE FIXTURES,

Hay Racks, Mangers, Stall Divisions, etc.

IRON RAILING,

For enclosing Cemetery Plots, Offices, Dwellings, Public Squares, etc.

Having purchased the business of the New York Wire Railing Company, HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM late Agents, we are now the exclusive Owners and Manufacturers of

Patent Wire Railing & Farm Fencing, Window Guards, etc.,

And we offer to the public the largest variety of ORNAMENTAL IRON GOODS to be found in the United States.

Particular attention given to Export trade.

CHASE & CO.,

Warerooms 524 Broadway,

OPPOSITE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, NEW YORK.

Great Improvements in Sewing Machines.

EMPIRE SHUTTLE MACHINE!

Salesrooms, 536 Broadway, N. Y.,

250 Washington Street, Boston.

This Machine is constructed on entirely new principles of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements, having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION COMBINED.

It has a straight needle perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither RIP nor RAVEL, and is alike on both sides, performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nansook Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is

EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE!

AGENTS WANTED where none are established, to whom a liberal discount will be given.

T. J. McARTHUR & CO.,
Manufacturers and Proprietors,
536 Broadway, N. Y.

NATIONAL

LIFE AND TRAVELLERS' INSURANCE CO.

OF NEW YORK.

The National starts forward into life at peculiarly the right time, when national ideas and institutions are uppermost in the public mind. The company displays new life and unexampled activity. With an authorized capital of Five Hundred Thousand Dollars, and with a Board of Directors well and thoroughly known, and energetic officers, it has also adopted a popular mode of conducting the business of insurance, so that, with all these advantages, its success is assured. Its mode of payment of premiums deserves especial attention, and may be described as follows:—

"Premiums may be paid annually, semi-annually, or quarterly, in cash. Where the annual premium amounts to or exceeds forty dollars, two-thirds of the same may be paid in cash, and the remaining one-third remain as a permanent loan on the policy, without giving a note. The annual premium, if desired, may be divided into three instalments, payable at intervals of four months, two-thirds to be paid in cash, and one-third to be endorsed on the policy as a loan."

Again:—

"After the whole of the first year's premiums have been paid on any policy, thirty days' grace will be given on the succeeding payments, if desired. As payments often fall due at times when it is most inconvenient to meet them, this privilege will, by giving the assured a little extra time, during which the policy continues binding, prove quite valuable."

The liberality and the certain advantages of this company are in this way clearly and conclusively displayed.

Its method of making dividends is also just and liberal. Its Directors

"Have decided to divide the whole of the profits made upon policies issued under the tables 'with participation' among the holders of such policies. In most companies having a subscribed cash capital, the stockholders receive one-fourth or one-fifth of the profits, the remainder only being distributed among the policy-holders; but this company agrees to give to the latter the entire benefit of what will be the result on all business conducted with the MUTUAL SYSTEM."

And all of the profits will be paid in cash, or may be appropriated, as explained in the following statement, which presents many new and interesting features:

"The insured, to whom, at the periodical division of profits, a dividend of $100 cash value is due, can take his choice to receive it in the following manner, supposing his age at that period to be forty-five:

"1st, To apply the $100 to the payment of any indebtedness to the company.

"2d, To receive a policy for three years of $2,100, at the end of which time the policy will expire; but a new division taking place, he will obtain a new one for a similar term, and being then forty-eight years old, a dividend of $100 will produce one of $1,881.

"3d, To take a policy for life of $245, with similar additions to the same every three years. In the two latter cases, the policies are not entitled to a participation in the profits, and will only be obtained upon evidence of insurable state of health.

"4th, To have the next three premiums reduced to the extent of $35 49; a new reduction being made for the following three years at each periodical settlement.

"5th, To have a permanent annual reduction on life premiums of $7 56, and to be increased by further reduction at every triennial division, so that they will, in the course of some years, absorb the whole annual premium, and become an annuity payable to him by the company during the continuance of the policy.

"6th, He may receive a deferred annuity policy, the company undertaking to pay him annually $26 58 when he reaches the age of sixty, and during the remainder of his life. Every three years a fresh amount corresponding with his age at the time of the division will be added to the policy, so that the result of his over-payments, or share in the profits, will be applied to a provision for old age for his own benefit."

The National is also empowered, by its general charter, to insure against accidents of all description; and it proposes to pursue this branch of the business as well as Life Insurance. For a moderate annual premium, it pays a liberal compensation to the families of those who are cut off by accident, as to those who are disabled by the same ever present and active cause. The President of this company, Mr. Edward A. Jones, possesses in an eminent degree the qualifications necessary to fit him for this office, having long been engaged in the Life Insurance business. He devotes all his talents and his time to the interests of the company, which will assuredly take an eminent position among kindred corporations. Its Secretary, Mr. Asher S. Mills, formerly of the Mutual Life, is thoroughly conversant with the business, and will be extremely serviceable in this office. The company is also fortunate in the selection of Mr. E. H. Jones as Superintendent of Agencies. He understands Insurance in all its details, has an extensive acquaintance among Insurance agents all over the country, and will be a host in himself for the furtherance of the company's beneficent designs.

Thus soundly organized, ably managed, and thoroughly well represented, the success of the National is sure. We commend it to its brilliant future.—Insurance Monitor.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH

B. T. BABBITT'S

Pure Concentrated Potash,

OR READY SOAP-MAKER.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.

B. T. BABBITT,

64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

T. C. SELLEW,

MANUFACTURER OF DESKS AND OFFICE FURNITURE,

107 FULTON ST., near NASSAU ST., N. Y.

LIBRARY AND SCHOOL FURNITURE MADE TO ORDER.

Archer & Pancoast,

9, 11, 13, 15, AND 17 MERCER STREET, NEW YORK,

Manufacturers of Gas and Coal Oil Fixtures, Chandeliers, Pendants, Brackets, Lamps, etc., etc., for home trade or exportation, as also the Patent Convex and other Lanterns for burning coal oil without a chimney.

Dealers are respectfully invited to examine our goods. Warerooms and Manufactory, 9, 11, 13, 15, and 17 Mercer Street, New York.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,

1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of GIFFARD'S INJECTOR,
For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

CRUSHERS AND PULVERIZERS,
FOR WET OR DRY WORKING,
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.
MANUFACTURED BY THE
BOSTON MILLING & MANUFACTURING CO.,
105 STATE STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Miners should not purchase machinery before seeing, or sending their friends to examine, the practical working of this series of machinery.

☞ The Whirling Table, or Crusher, weighs less than two tons, and crushes from ten to twelve tons of ore per hour to fine gravel, or two hundred and fifty tons in twenty-four hours.

The Pulverizer weighs two tons, and pulverizes to dust, infinitely finer than stamp work, one ton of ore per hour, or twenty-four tons per diem, equal to the yield of twenty-five or thirty stamps; and the first cost and wear, as compared to this number of stamps, is about one-tenth;—the entire yield being fit for amalgamation without further reduction. The fine dust is not obtained by screening, but by the immediate action of the Pulverizer.

Fifteen horse-power, net, is the maximum power required for one machine.

The cost of the wear, per ton, is less than by any other machine. All wearing parts are now made of Franklinite iron.

Let miners and their friends carefully study the practical working of all other machines and processes offered, and then see ours working in East Boston, Mass. We ask only this.

All of our machines are now made in our own shop. No CONTRACT WORK.

OFFICERS OF THE COMPANY:
President—HORATIO R. STORER.
Gen. Agent and Treasurer—JACOB J. STORER.
Consulting Engineer—JAS. D. WHELPLEY.

DIRECTORS:
John A. Blanchard, Benjamin P. Cheney, Bradley N. Cumings, Ichabod Goodwin, Horatio R. Storer, Jacob J. Storer, James D. Whelpley.

Agent in New York,
CHAS. H. GARDNER,
16 CORTLANDT STREET.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,
Importers and Dealers in
TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;
Manufacturers of
COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,
19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

DECKER BROTHERS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PIANO-FORTES.
FACTORY AND WAREROOMS,
91 BLEECKER STREET,
(MARBLE BUILDING,)
One block west from Broadway,
NEW YORK.

MARVIN'S
PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.
Superior to any others in the following particulars:
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by
MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.
Send for a descriptive Circular.

JESSUP & MOORE,
27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,
PAPER MANUFACTURERS,
Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

DEMULCENT SOAP,
FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,
FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.
MANUFACTURED ONLY BY
J. C. HULL'S SON,
32 PARK ROW, N. Y.
Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Benedict's Time,
171 BROADWAY, COR. CORTLANDT ST.,
NEW YORK.
TO SOLDIERS.
AMERICAN (WALTHAM) WATCHES.
Let every soldier, before he returns home, provide himself with an AMERICAN WATCH; no better use can be made of money than to invest it in one of these durable and accurate time-pieces. It is a kind of property that constantly returns good interest, and its money value is so well-known that a pocket full of silver dollars wouldn't be as useful.
For sale and warranted by
BENEDICT BROTHERS, Jewelers,
Keepers of the City Time, and Agents for the sale of the American (Waltham) Watches,
171 Broadway, cor. Cortlandt St.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.
THE WEED MACHINES,
With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.
Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.
WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,
STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

OAKLEY & MASON,
PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS,
AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS,
21 MURRAY STREET,
OLD STAND OF PRATT, OAKLEY & CO.,
Between Broadway and Church Street, New York.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines
FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.
THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,
ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,
629 BROADWAY.
Agents wanted.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,
625 BROADWAY, N. Y.,
MAKE THE
LOCK-STITCH,
and rank highest on account of the elasticity, permanence, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching, when done, and the wide range of its application.—Report of American Institute.

CARTER, KIRTLAND & CO.,
Manufacturers and Jobbers of
CLOTHING,
340 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK,
OFFER TO FIRST-CLASS BUYERS A LARGE AND VERY COMPLETE STOCK OF
FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING
OF ALL GRADES,
EMBRACING FINE, MEDIUM, AND LOW-PRICED GOODS.

Having made extensive purchases at a time when all were sellers and very few were buyers, we are in a position to supply our customers upon the most favorable and advantageous terms.

Jobbers, Merchant Tailors, and Dealers generally will find it to their advantage to call and examine our stock before purchasing.

Particular attention paid to the execution of orders.

SAM'L CARTER, WM. H. KIRTLAND,
JOHN ROSE, CHAS. B. PEET,
JOHN H. WERTS, Special.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS
OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.
TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.
or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.
New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.
TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.
For sale by JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,
FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.
R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,
STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,
WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. / 42 JOHN STREET, New York.
Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.
CAUTION.
These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.
R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

Economical Housekeepers Use
PYLE'S SALERATUS. | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.
Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.
ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.
"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.
"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.
"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.
"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.
Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.
WM. B. BRADBURY,
425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 12. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1865. $3 PER ANNUM

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 353
The Danger of the Hour 357
Our Revolutionary Fathers and the Conquered Tories 358
The Muddle, and the Way out of It 359
The Parson and the Attorney 360
Mr. Harlan on Reconstruction 361
Vitality of the Freed Negroes 362
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Basis of Suffrage 362
Testimony of Prisoners in their own Defence 364
An Extraordinary Funeral 364
The South as It Is 365
England 368
Sunbaths 369
Pithole 370
LITERATURE:
Literary Notes 375
Christian's Mistake 376
A New Novel 377
Pegasus in Traces 378
The Truth concerning Rebel Prisons 378
Current Literature 379
FINANCIAL REVIEW 382

Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

AN official account of the attempt to reinforce Fort Sumter subsequently to the failure of the Star of the West, has been made public through the Chicago Tribune. Captain Fox, the present Assistant-Secretary of the Navy, in a report to the head of the Department under date of February 24, 1865, explains what part he took in devising and executing a plan for the relief of Major Anderson. It was in January, 1861, that he first gave his attention to the subject, when he sought unsuccessfully to obtain command of the Star of the West. Having carefully studied the approaches to Charleston harbor, he proposed, with two or three men-of-war stationed outside as a basis of forcible operations if necessary, to run between the batteries on Morris and Sullivan's islands in the darkness with the ocean steamer Baltic, specially fitted out with a superior crew and with launches, troops, provisions, munitions, etc., so organized as to complete the landing in one night. Certain steam-tugs were to be used as auxiliaries, in case the weather proved too rough for boats. This scheme found favor and received promises of co-operation in New York. Meanwhile Captain Fox was summoned to Washington to consult with Gen. Scott and Lieut. Hall, direct from Sumter. Mr. Holt, the then Secretary of War, was about to lay Captain Fox's plan before President Buchanan, when news came of the election of Jefferson Davis, and the whole matter was dropped. It was taken up afresh by the new Administration, and Captain Fox obtained permission to visit Fort Sumter and inspect its approaches, which he was able to do by the land route. He learned from Major Anderson that the 15th of April would be the latest day on which the garrison could hold out. It was not till the 4th of that month that the President issued positive orders for the relief. The Secretary of the Navy placed all his available force at the disposal of Captain Fox—the Pawnee, Powhatan, Pocahontas, and the revenue-cutter Harriet Lane. The Baltic was engaged of Mr. Aspinwall, and three tugs obtained at exorbitant prices. Reliance was wholly placed upon the Powhatan, for boats and crew for landing the supplies, and she sailed for the rendezvous two days in advance of the rest of the fleet. Captain Fox arrived on the 12th off Charleston harbor in thick and heavy weather. He waited anxiously for the Powhatan, but did not learn till the next day that she had been sent by the President, on recommendation of Mr. Seward, to Fort Pickens—the former not being aware of her attachment to Captain Fox's expedition. On the 13th the bombardment of Sumter was begun, and on the 15th the Baltic received the surrendered garrison. From the official orders it is clear that the design was, in accordance with President Lincoln's promise to the South, to put in provisions only, if unmolested; in case of obstruction and resistance, to add also men and munitions.

PENNSYLVANIA is credited by the War Department with having furnished 361,939 recruits to the armies of the Union, embracing the extreme terms of service—three months and three years. To this total are added 90,000 for the State defence in special emergencies, 25,000 who enlisted out of the State for higher bounties, and 2,500 colored soldiers, likewise attracted elsewhere; in all, 479,439. Her admiring children also assert that this is the largest contribution made by any State to the national forces; that she suffered most materially during the war; and that her military expenditures were, proportionately, less than those of any other free State. It is certain, and it is a remarkable fact, that she has in the past four years diminished her public debt nearly two millions, of which $745,811 has been extinguished this year—a greater amount than in any preceding twelvemonth on record. The debt thus reduced is $38,634,891. It may be compared with that of Massachusetts, which is about twenty-five millions, with an interest of one million and an annual State tax of four and a half.

THE Maine election took place on the 11th. Not only did the State agree with Vermont in securing a Republican majority relatively larger than that of last year, but even absolutely (20,000 against 16,000), on a vote one-third lighter. The South Carolina election for delegates to the State Convention passed off quietly on the 4th. Of the twenty delegates chosen in Charleston, only five could be reckoned as Union men, not including Mayor Macbeth, who heads the list. A Union candidate was returned from Chester, Gen. Wade Hampton from Columbia, Gen. Bratton from Fairfield, and Col. Morgan from Orangeburg. The convention met at Columbus on the 13th, numbering about a hundred members. One dispatch says they are regarded as the ablest body ever convened in the State; another, that at least three-fourths of them were original secessionists and active participants in the rebellion. Only five, however, were ready to pass certain resolutions of discontent. The Governor's message sustained the President's policy. The Alabama election was likewise marked by a small vote and perfect order, on the 31st ult. The "conservative" party was easily and almost universally victorious. At Montgomery, Gen. E. Y. Fair and Col. J. A. Elmore were chosen delegates by about seven to one. The convention assembled in that city on the 13th, with 128 members present, all of whom had taken the prescribed oath of loyalty. It was voted, 58 to 34, not to repudiate the Confederate State debt. The Massachusetts Republican Convention met at Worcester on the 14th. Senator Sumner presided. Two of the vice-presidents testified powerfully to the change in the times—Gen. Benjamin F. Butler and Rev. L. A. Grimes, the colored minister of Boston. Alexander H. Bullock was nominated for Gov. Andrew's successor without opposition, and great unanimity prevailed in the other nominations. The resolutions promise support to the President "in his efforts to restore order among the communities so lately in revolt, and to re-establish government there on the basis of good and exact justice to all;" re-affirm that slavery was the cause of the war and will be the disturbing element of peace unless extirpated; agree with the Pennsylvania Convention that the people of the South "cannot safely be entrusted with the political rights which they forfeited by their treason, until they have proved their acceptance of the results of the war by incorporating into their constitutional provisions, and securing to all men within their borders, the inalienable right of liberty and the pursuit of happiness;" and call upon Congress to exact the most perfect guarantees of the safety of loyal whites and blacks, before any final step is taken in restoration.

Senator Sumner's speech dwelt upon the conditions necessary to the national security hereafter, namely: the unity of the Republic; civil and political enfranchisement of the blacks; the recognition of the national debt; repudiation of the rebel debt; impartial suffrage for all men; education of the people. To obtain these, time is necessary; for the present, all rebels must be excluded from political power—"they must not be voted for, and they must not vote;" Congress must be confidently invoked, which has plenary control of the whole subject, "whether through the war powers, the duty to guarantee a republican form of government, or the necessity of the case." Gen. Butler also addressed the convention, expressing, among other things, his distrust of oaths and amnesties for the late public enemies.

It seems that Governor Wise did not say, "Long before the war, indeed, I had definitely made up my mind actively to advocate emancipation throughout the South;" which would have needed a pretty stiff exclamation point after the "indeed," in memory of certain events appertaining to Harper's Ferry, in a period not so remote. The hangman of John Brown is a convert of the revolution which both hastened, and the phrase should read—"Long before the war ended," etc.

Here is a very interesting fact, related in a business letter from Augusta, Georgia, August 14, 1865:

"A Government sale of horses and mules brought large numbers to the city to-day. It is estimated that not less than 10,000 persons attended the sale, two-thirds of whom were freedmen. The stock brought enormous prices, one team, six mule, selling for $1,265—much higher than previous to the war. Freedmen bid freely and bought largely. There were numerous conflicts between the two races, but I hear of no serious injuries. The former slave begins to assert himself in some cases too much."

The Army of the Potomac, in the six months' campaign from May 5 to Nov. 1 of last year, lost in killed and wounded 64,549 officers and men, or about a third of Grant's command when he left Culpepper, with reinforcements included. The total number of missing was 23,858, to offset which there were taken 15,370 prisoners. The severest action was that of the Wilderness, which lasted seven days, where the loss in killed and wounded was 22,566, and missing, 6,844. More desperate was the battle of Spottsylvania, which exhibited 2,146 dead for only 7,956 wounded and 279 missing. The Army of the Mississippi, in the campaign which began with the departure from Dalton, and ended with the capture of Atlanta, lost 31,413 in killed and wounded, and 5,786 in missing—this ratio being strikingly in contrast with that of the Eastern army. Twelve thousand nine hundred and eighty-three prisoners and deserters were either taken or received in this campaign, the latter amounting to about one-fourth of the whole. From May 1 to the middle of September, 52,217 of Sherman's soldiers, besides the wounded, were medically treated, and only 420 died of disease.

From whatever cause, the apprehension of conviction and death or the consciousness of his unconcealable blood-guiltiness, the prisoner Wirtz is fairly broken down under his trial, which is delayed by his prostration. It is stated, we know not on what authority, that the line of defence which his counsel will follow will be—the "dead-line." In other words, that they are confident a military commission will appreciate the necessity imposed upon a commandant of a large prison with a feeble guard, especially if it can be shown that similar lines were enforced in Northern prisons. We think there will be fatal objections to this argument. Wirtz's cruelty was not confined to any part of the pen at Andersonville, and the victims of the "dead-line" bore a trifling proportion to the whole number. Indeed, we are not sure that it was not the most merciful contrivance of the place, as it opened a door through suicide to an escape from slow murder.

The Indians have been summoned to a council at Fort Smith, Arkansas, and the Osages, Seminoles, Creeks, Chickasaws, Cowskins, Senecas, Shawnees, Choctaws, and Quapaws, signed on the 14th a treaty of permanent peace with the United States, in which they promise to refuse their allegiance to any other power, and revoke, cancel, and repudiate their acts of rebellion and secession. The United States promises on its part to protect them amply, to enter into treaties with them, and to settle all differences growing out of the war. It purposes also a grand consolidation of all Indian tribes in one nation in the present Indian Territory, involving of course the removal of the tribes in Kansas and other regions. One stipulation of this arrangement is, that slavery shall be immediately abolished, and freedmen have the right of being incorporated into the tribes on an equal footing with other members.

Considerable attention is paid by the press to the movements of a party of English gentlemen, identified largely with railroad interests in the two hemispheres, who are now on a visit to this country, specially in connection with the Atlantic and Great Western Railway, and who are being ridden, fêted, and complimented half across the continent. Thus far they have escaped the perils of ordinary travellers, as it is to be hoped they may to the end of their journey. They betray a wise precaution in taking a physician along with them.

Symptoms of a revival of delicacy in the sensibilities of our Southern brethren are pleasant to record. Such were the questions put by a Mr. Lewellen, of Richmond, in behalf of himself and others, to Gov. Peirpont: Was it probable Congress would admit any delegate from Virginia without taking the oath it has prescribed for its members?—what would be the effect on Virginia of her having no representation in Congress?—can a man sit in either branch of the State legislature who has held office under the Confederate or any rebellious State government? The governor answers no to the first and third interrogatories, and as for the second, seems to think it will be more detrimental to Virginia to be excluded from Congress than it will be advantageous to obtain admission. The stockholders of the Richmond and Danville Railroad longed to make Gen. Johnston their president, but were overcome by the vote of the State proxy, who concluded "that his selection at this time would be exceedingly injudicious."

The mayor of Mobile resigned his office on learning that negro testimony was likely to be admitted in all the courts, as proposed by Gen. Swayne and seconded by Gov. Parsons. He was too solicitous by half for "the laws of Alabama, and the order, peace, and dignity of the city." Would that every Slough were removed as easily from the progress of the freedmen! Gen. Gillmore and Gov. Perry have just arranged that the civil courts of South Carolina shall be restored to their former jurisdiction, except in cases which involve the people of color, which will be tried in courts of the provost-marshals. A month has elapsed since one of Gov. Holden's justices of the peace in Chatham County, North Carolina, ordered an unoffending freedman to be so inhumanly flogged that the jailer refused to obey except under compulsion. The poor victim—whose wife was permitted to stand by him during his torture!—has been missing ever since. At last an effort has been made to arrest the guilty parties.

The speech of the Hon. Montgomery Blair at Clarksville, Md., on the 26th of last month, contained charges against certain members of the Administration calculated rather to excite amazement than to inspire belief. When Secretary Stanton was accused of complicity in the rebellion, everybody smiled, or if one was indignant he perhaps wrote publicly in defence of our much-abused, matchless war minister, who, as is his custom, let "the turbid stream of rumor flow" unheeded and uncared for. Judge Holt was also too high a mark to be reached by slander, and the refutation which he now makes of Mr. Blair's statements concerning him will be regarded as less necessary for his own vindication than salutary for the correction of his antagonist. He has had time to collect documentary evidence on every head of his indictments, and has deprived Mr. Blair of the comfort of reflecting that, of such liberal though groundless abuse, something must surely stick. Judge Holt calls on him to produce that "armistice with the rebel Secretary" which he asserts was made "by order of Buchanan, under the signatures of his Secretaries of War and of the Navy."

Simultaneously with the effort in Connecticut to get rid of color-distinctions altogether, the people of Newport, in the adjoining State, have at last overcome their prejudices and thrown open their schools to white and black children impartially. It cannot be long before Providence must imitate her sister-capital in this respect.

Secretary Seward has been making a pleasure trip to Richmond, which the war has enabled him to do without riding in a hangman's cart when there, or wearing Virginia homespun, i. e., tar-and-feathers. A great cry is raised to induce the President to follow his example. A visit to Plymouth Rock were much more to be desired.

A friend has sent us a pamphlet on animal decomposition as the chief promotive cause of cholera, published in Philadelphia, in 1855, from an article in the Medical Examiner for August of that year. The author, Dr. Henry Hartshorne, collates facts to show that while cholera is not contagious, in the true sense of the word, and may be propagated without human contact, it finds in the decay of animal matter one of the best conditions of its development. Imperfect sewerage, bad ventilation, the close packing of city populations, are potent and infallible attractions of that "unknown contingent" in whose presence only is cholera generated, and "whose capriciousness of migration, partial subjection to temperature, and other habitudes, suggest the probability of the animalcular hypothesis." The most elevated sites, if these sanitary conditions are neglected, do not escape the disease, nor is difference of elevation of much account in itself. The odds in mortality between the districts above and those below the entrance of the sewers on the Thames in 1849 was very marked.

The speech of the Hon. Thaddeus Stevens, at Lancaster, Pa., on the 6th, was devoted to a defence of the policy of "reconstruction" as against that of "restoration." According to that distinguished leader, the only safety lies in Government treating the seceded States as conquered and alien, and in discarding the theory that they have never been outside the Union. They were combated during the war as foreign belligerents would have been—they themselves invited the contest on these terms; we are at liberty to avail ourselves of the privileges of victors. On no other principle of procedure can trial and punishment of traitors be had, since they would then be presented before civil courts in the States which were the scene of their treason. Not otherwise can the trial of Wirtz before a military commission be justified. Not otherwise even the action of the President in imposing conditions upon the conventions which are to remodel the State governments: for this is reconstruction, not restoration, which must be full and impartial. This position fortified, Mr. Stevens advances to another: "The property of the rebels shall pay our national debt, and indemnify freedmen and loyal sufferers." To effect this he would confiscate the real estate of 70,000 rebels, who own above 200 acres each, together with the lands of their several States. Realizing thus, from a small fraction of the population, 394,000,000 acres out of the aggregate of 465,000,000, he would divide this territory into convenient farms, giving (say) 40 acres to every adult male freedman, or 40,000,000 in all. The residue, 354,000,000, he would likewise divide, and sell to the highest bidder. An average of $10 per acre would net $3,540,000,000. The odds should go toward the payment of pensions and the indemnification of loyal men North and South; the billions, toward liquidating the national debt. Probably we shall hear more of this project in the House next December. Mr. Stevens incidentally described the genus Blair, and did it so tersely, if not so truly, that we quote it entire:

"They are a family of considerable power, some merit, of admirable audacity, and execrable selfishness."

The members of the Mississippi Constitutional Convention wanted Jefferson Davis forgiven, because "he was the representative of the sentiments of the people of the (rebel) States, and his acts were those of the great body of the people." Four ladies of Holly Springs, in the same State, have united in a similar petition to the President with no better and no other reason. This equalizing of guilt does no good to the arch-criminal, while it reacts upon the levellers. If the spirit of the Southern people remains the same as that of Jefferson Davis, we may well despair of Union and fraternity in our generation. We doubt if there ever was an instance of such monstrous and inexcusable mendacity as he exhibited in his high office, whether to deceive foreign nations or to perpetuate the delusion of his own followers. Is he but a sample of all that host who daily take the oath of allegiance, and upon whose constancy depends the whole contrivance of reconstruction?

Our humorous neighbor and contemporary, Mrs. Grundy, expires in this the twelfth week of her short-lived existence. The publishers, it appears from the valedictory, found no safety in the multitude of counsellors, and failed to secure the patronage of the public. The ill-success of the paper is due very likely in part to a want of any definite political tone, but it is fortunate in not going down, as did its immediate predecessor, from having sold itself too cheaply to the worse side in politics. One thing it lacked conspicuously, nor will any other comic journal endure without it—one first-rate artist who could be relied on for a refined yet forcible cartoon.

We shall furnish hereafter, from an authentic source, a weekly survey of the doings of the Freedmen's Bureau. For completeness' sake, we here append a condensed review of its official existence:

It was established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1865, under the title of "A Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands." Major-General O. O. Howard was subsequently appointed to its head, and his first circular is dated May 15. It announces his entrance upon his duties and the location of the Bureau. Circular No 2, May 19, announces the scheme of subordination and official duty, in connection with the charitable, industrial, and educational aims of the Bureau. Circular No. 3, May 29, orders the retention of abandoned lands then under cultivation by freedmen, at least until the growing crops are secured to them, and their labor fully and justly remunerated. Circular No. 4, May 29, is a special call for a meeting of officers and teachers of freedmen in the Department of Washington. Circular No. 5, May 30, contains rules and regulations for assistant commissioners, among which are a provision for adjusting difficulties which would not be settled equitably for the negroes in the courts, and a guaranty of the freedom of the blacks in choosing their own employers and making voluntary agreements. Order No. 110 of the War Department, June 7, directs all officers of the Treasury and all military officers to turn over the abandoned lands in their possession to the Freedmen's Bureau. Circular No. 6, June 13, appoints sundry officers. Circular No. 7, June 13, directs the assistant commissioners to make estimates of the supplies needed for the coming quarter, and allows teachers to purchase rations on the same terms as commissioned officers, instead of receiving them gratis as hitherto. Transportation and quarters are also provided for. Circular No. 8, June 20, fixes the ration for refugees and freedmen. Circular No. 9, July 6, prohibits the transportation of refugees except where humanity evidently demands it, and then only by the requisition of the Commissioner. Circular No. 10, July 11, provides for monthly reports of refugees and freedmen, for land and school reports, and rosters of all officers and civilians on duty. Circular No. 11, July 12, conveys instructions to assistant commissioners and other officers. Circular No. 12, July 14, directs the agents of the Bureau to co-operate with the Army and Navy Claim Agency of the Sanitary Commission, which desires to extend its gratuitous services to colored soldiers and their families. Circular No. 13, being prematurely issued, was rescinded. We gave a synopsis of it last week. It is superseded by No. 15, below. Circular No. 14, Aug. 17, contains instructions to medical and other officers. Circular No. 15, Sept. 12, defines what is meant by abandoned lands and what by confiscated. When any assistant commissioner is satisfied that the United States has acquired no title to land by abandonment, confiscation, sale, or otherwise, he will formally surrender it to the authorized claimant or claimants. Accurate lists are therefore to be kept, and monthly reports made of lands under the control of the commissioners. As much of them is to be set apart as is needed for the immediate use of loyal refugees and freedmen, selecting those which most clearly belong to the keeping of the Bureau. The steps for recovering abandoned lands to be taken by those who are pardoned by the President, are prescribed. Evidence of special pardon, or the prescribed oath of amnesty, as the case may be, must be forwarded with proof of title to the assistant commissioners. The same restriction in regard to the surrender of lands under cultivation is imposed as in circular No. 3.

The Bureau is now operating, more or less systematically, in all the insurrectionary States except Texas, to which Gen. Gregory was despatched more than a month ago, but he has not been heard from. Gen. Saxton has been relieved of the charge of Florida, which is now assigned to Assistant Commissioner Col. T. W. Osborne. The latter writes from Jacksonville on his way to Tallahassee, where he is to meet Gens. Foster and Newton, and arrange for the establishment of his branch of the Bureau. Gen. Saxton's last report concerning Florida states that only about five hundred freedmen will be fed by Government during the present month, against twice that number in August. Schools have been started all over the State, with an attendance of eight hundred children, for whom there are only fifteen teachers. Some two hundred white refugees have also been gathered into schools, and have six teachers. There is an orphan asylum at Fernandina, superintended by Miss C. Merrick, of Syracuse, N. Y. It is supported by voluntary contributions, has sixty-six inmates, and is in a flourishing condition.

In Georgia and South Carolina some contracts are made between the planters and the freedmen, but these States have been the scene of much violence. Capt. Healy, an agent of the Bureau at Augusta, was lately murdered by three assassins, who shot him on his way home from his office in the evening, and then mutilated his body with knives. An unsuccessful attempt has also been made on the life of Gen. Wild, and Capt. Bryan has been threatened. Gen. Wild has been superseded as superintendent of freedmen's affairs in Georgia by Gen. D. Tillson, who has held a similar post at Memphis for some time past, with entire satisfaction to Gen. Howard.

Col. Whittlesey reports the favorable working of the Bureau in North Carolina. Contracts are making, and the negroes evince a disposition to maintain themselves industriously.

Col. Brown discredits entirely the rumors of an apprehended insurrection among the blacks of Virginia. Gen. Terry has his forces so disposed as to render it futile if attempted.

Gen. Fisk, in his recent tour through Tennessee, met with many former slaveholders disposed to be reconciled to the revolution, and asking how they can co-operate with the Bureau. Yet a school for the freedmen was burnt down at Decherd on the night of the 6th, and the teacher obliged to flee for his life.

Commissioner Thomas, of Mississippi, reports that more whites are drawing rations in that State than blacks. The colored population of Vicksburg have publicly voted to assist each other in maintaining schools.

Gen. Sprague, assistant commissioner for Missouri and Arkansas, says nearly all the freedmen in Missouri are supporting themselves, and, in many instances, their teachers; in Arkansas as well, as an instance will show: At Little Rock a colored preacher announced, at the close of the services, that eight teachers at twenty dollars a month, and some other items, made the burden of his congregation $175 for the month of July. There was a deficiency of $78, which he requested them to make up in a collection. The amount thus raised was $43 in excess.

Gen. Swayne states that nine colored schools are already under way in Mobile; others have been established at Montgomery, with an attendance of two hundred; and at Wetumka the colored people have themselves established schools and furnished teachers. Of these last, however, there is great need throughout the State, and if societies at the North will only supply them, the commissioner will do the rest. He is receiving by every mail the acceptances of judicial officers and magistrates, under the order (noticed last week) which recognizes them as agents of the Bureau for the administration of justice. "Negro testimony may now be said to be received in all the courts of the State." He has also directed each of his superintendents to select some justice of the peace in whom he has confidence, to open an office near the agency, where cases can be at once adjudicated. "This position is eagerly sought for." Reports of violence come in from the counties of Clark, Choctaw, and Washington, along the Mississippi border. More whites than blacks are drawing rations in Alabama.

Commissioner Conway, of Louisiana, reports that he called on the churches in New Orleans for contributions of clothing for the destitute blacks. Not one white congregation responded, but the colored churches furnished fifty barrels and ten boxes of good garments, which have been sent to the Red River and Teche countries.

The sanitary condition of the colored people of Washington has been examined by Dr. Reyburn, Surgeon-in-chief of the Colored Bureau for that department. He finds them densely settled, not quite exclusively, on the "island," so called, which is subject to miasmatic influences from the Potomac and the canal. There is no proper drainage, and there is an unwholesome accumulation of garbage and other filth. These causes, with the over-crowded population, who pay exorbitant rents for the meanest of shanties, account for the sickness and mortality which have always prevailed in that portion of the city. Many complain of a lack of employment, yet few are disposed to beg or to avoid exertion in self-support.

Gen. Howard has returned from his vacation at the North. His brother, Col. C. H. Howard, has been assigned to duty under Gen. Saxton. Lieut.-Col. S. L. Taggart, in charge of the office at Washington, is about to retire from the service. He will be succeeded by Col. Max Woodhull, late A. A. G. of the Army of the Tennessee.

From Europe we learn that the Atlantic Telegraph Company have formally renounced any attempt to recover the cable this year; and the underwriters have settled insurance on it, as if it were a total loss. Meanwhile the directors have unanimously accepted the offer of the Telegraph Construction Company to manufacture and lay down a second cable and complete the one temporarily abandoned, and the work has already begun. Captain Anderson and the Great Eastern have been secured for five years for telegraphic service. M. Hamelin proposes, in a Paris paper, some novel routes for a cable, which will allow of sections. He refers to two small islands, omitted in later charts but still believed to exist, called Verte and Jaquet, which are both in latitude 47° N., and respectively 29° and 42° west of Paris—the latter being situated in the Gulf Stream, not far from the Grand Bank, and almost in the track of the European steamers. By using these stations between Valentia and Newfoundland, the distance would not be materially lengthened. He also suggests a line from Lisbon to the Azores, thence to Jaquet Island and Newfoundland, with a larger aggregate but smaller sections, save the last. The surmise of the London Times that the cholera might be a local epidemic for the Mediterranean basin, including the connecting waters, appears to be correct. The latest news indicates no advance beyond these limits, but rather points to a subsidence in the direction of its origin. The finishing blast which served to open the grand tunnel between Nice and Villefranche, on the railroad line from Nice to Monaco, Menton, and Genoa, was celebrated by a distinguished company with imposing ceremonies on the 21st of August. The tunnel is nearly a mile in length.

One of the questions to be treated at the fourth congress of the International Association for the Advancement of the Sciences, which met at Berne on the 28th of August, was as follows: "What is the influence of the guardianship of the woods and waters of the high countries of Europe on the lower? Would it be possible to establish a community of legislation among the different countries which depend upon the same river, to protect their respective interests? What ought to be the basis of such legislation, and by what means could it be realized?"

The prospects of a revival of the commercial activity of the Mediterranean basin, foreshadowed by the opening of the Suez Canal, has caused a ripple in the placid bosom of Rome itself. The Pope is highly delighted with the notion of restoring Ostium as the entrepôt of the imperial city. A huge canal, docks, and warehouses are among the works contemplated.

Let no one say that anti-Cæsarism is not tolerated in Paris. On the afternoon of the 20th of August, the gay populace who promenaded the Champs Elysées, the Place de la Concorde, the Rue de Rivoli, and the Rue de Charenton, watched without molestation from gendarmes the slow progress of a colossal statue of Vercingetorix, which lay upon a long and substantial car with low wheels, and was destined, as all the world knew, to be set up eventually in that Alisia (Alise-Sainte-Reine of the Côte-d' Or) where Cæsar was long baffled, even if at last he then and there completed the subjugation of Gaul.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE DANGER OF THE HOUR.

THE whole question of the wisdom or folly of President Johnson's plan of reconstruction, as he is at present carrying it out, turns upon the amount of confidence which ought to be reposed in the good faith and good intentions of the Southern people. He is evidently of opinion, if we may judge by his action in the Sharkey-Slocum case in Mississippi, as well as by his language to the Southern delegations, that there is not and ought not to be any limit to this confidence. We are given to understand that before very long he means not only to permit the militia to be called out in all the Southern States, but to recall the Federal troops, except a few garrisons, and leave our Southern brethren entirely to their own devices.

Those who defend his course and his opinions do so by ridiculing the notion that there is any danger of a renewed attempt at insurrection in the South, but this is simply fighting a man of straw. There are very few people at the North who apprehend anything of the sort. The Chicago Tribune the other day showed, by an elaborate calculation, that the permission to call out the Southern militia would place 161,000 men under arms, most of them disbanded rebel soldiers, smarting under their defeats and still fired by the passions of the struggle, and gave its readers plainly to understand that it was fair to anticipate from these people a fresh effort to throw off the "Yankee yoke." We think this arming of the Southern militia to be unquestionably a very unwise and dangerous proceeding, but not because we expect it to lead to a fresh revolt.

There is nobody who has the least knowledge of the actual physical and moral condition of the South but must treat all such apprehensions as chimerical. There has probably never been a people, since the Gauls, so thoroughly beaten in war as the Southerners have been. The completeness of their overthrow has been in the exact ratio of the vigor and obstinacy of their resistance, and resistance more vigorous and more obstinate was probably never offered by any population of the same size. This generation is certainly completely at the mercy of its conqueror, and incapable of offering the least opposition to his mandates. Should it be able to bequeath its passions and hopes to the next one, there might be a possibility of the latter renewing the struggle, but the next generation is twenty years away, and we are not disposed to look forward so far.

What we fear from the President's policy is, not a renewal of the war, but the restoration of the state of things which led to the war. We, of course, do not anticipate a revival of slavery "pure and simple;" but it was not the fact of slavery in itself which led to the revolt, but the state of feeling and of manners which slavery bred—the hatred of democracy, the contempt for human rights, the horror of equality before the law, the proneness to violence which always results from inequality, the tone which all these things communicated to Southern manners, literature, education, religion, and society. What we fear now is the reconstruction at the South, not of "slave society," properly so called, but of a society so closely resembling slave society as to reproduce most of the phenomena which made slave society, politically, so obnoxious, and so dangerous, to the public peace and prosperity. The great lesson which we have learned from the war, if we have learned any lesson at all, is that homogeneousness, social as well as political, is the first condition of our national existence. This government, we now know as well as we know anything, cannot be carried on, if any portion of the population which lives under it is legally kept in degradation, or legally excluded from the enjoyment of any of the rights or privileges possessed by the rest of the community.

The great question to be answered, therefore, by those who propose handing the South over immediately to the control of the Southern whites, is not whether they can be trusted not to revolt again, or not to restore slavery again—we know them to be physically unable to do either of these things—but whether they can be trusted to establish among them that form of social organization which we know to be necessary to the peace and happiness of the nation, to the vindication of our own principles before the world, and to secure which we have spent millions of treasure and torrents of blood. Nobody will venture to answer this in the affirmative. Nobody has answered it in the affirmative. The partizans of the South content themselves with calling attention to the resignation with which they gave up slavery, after it had been destroyed by force, and the alacrity with which they laid down their arms, when further resistance meant slaughter or starvation. But can they be trusted to take measures for putting the negro fairly under the protection of the laws—that is, giving him, weak, helpless, and degraded as he has been, those guarantees for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness which the white race, strong, rich, powerful, and energetic as it knows itself to be, declares to be essential for its liberty and security? Can they be trusted with the sole management of one of the most difficult and delicate of political processes, the endowment of slaves with the feelings and aspirations of freemen, when they have up to the last moment fought against it sword in hand, and at this moment make no secret of the loathing and rage which it excites in them, of their confidence that it will fail, and of their hopes that it may fail?

He must be a very sanguine or very simple person who will say yes to all this, when we see that all through the South the men whom the people elect to take charge of the work of reconstruction which Mr. Johnson is committing, as we believe, most recklessly to their hands, are those who are notoriously most thoroughly impregnated with the old pro-slavery vices, the old pro-slavery passions, hates, and prejudices. The most popular man in South Carolina to-day is Wade Hampton, and there is not another in the South who hates freedom, and the North, and the Union more thoroughly. We might go through every one of the revolted States and cite cases of the same kind. The men who are animated by Northern ideas are either nobodies or persons in whom their neighbors have no confidence. The men whom President Johnson has put in office are often like the redoubtable Perry, persons who make speeches in Charleston which are not intended to be heard in Washington. This personage, as our readers may remember, avowed himself at Greenville a humiliated, outraged, unrepentant, Yankee-hating Southerner, who believed that "freedom would be a curse to the negro;" but on receiving his appointment as provisional governor, two days afterwards, he made his appearance at Washington, with eight friends, in the character of a "wandering sheep," and matched himself to bleat "Union sentiments" against any loyal wether in the capital.

What we fear is, that we are now about to witness a phenomenon for which many calm and shrewd observers have all along looked with fear and trembling: the free States once more overcome by that disposition to temporize, compromise, and put off the evil day, and hope for the best, to which whatever of shame, humiliation, and disaster there has been in the history of the last forty years may be directly traced. We are all more or less affected by the languor which was sure to follow the prodigious efforts of the war. The public mind is a little weary of contention and agitation; trade is rapidly reviving, and Southern orders are just as sweet and as soothing, Southern tongues just as glib and as smooth, as ever they were. The restoration of a Union of some kind or other seems within easy reach, and it is no more difficult for Southern orators and traders to persuade their Northern friends that all trouble is over and that the political millennium is at hand, than it was to persuade them ten years ago that the very existence of Northern society depended on Southern favor and encouragement. We are but witnessing to-day, in the impression produced on Northern opinion by Southern professions, a fresh display of that consummate political ability which, for half a century, laid a large, acute, intelligent, and industrious community prostrate at the feet of a few thousand slave-owners, the product of a society on which civilization had left only the faintest traces. And we run great risk at this moment of being dragged into compromises, the consequences of which our children will rue, as we have rued those of our fathers.

OUR REVOLUTIONARY FATHERS AND THE CONQUERED TORIES.

THERE appears to be much danger that our views in regard to the crime of treason, and the punishment due to it, may become so diluted from a variety of causes as seriously to impair the vital force of that public opinion which must decide our policy in reference to some of the most important practical questions of the day. The tendency evidently is to belittle or palliate the crime, to seek excuses for the offender, and to invoke for his protection amnesty, if not oblivion of the past.

If we trace the history of that confusion of moral ideas which undoubtedly prevails on this subject, we shall find that it has a modern origin. Leniency towards victims of an unsuccessful rebellion first came into fashion during the period of the French Revolution, when the changes in the government of that country were so sudden, so frequent, and so violent, that it seemed monstrous to punish even the leaders of the revolt of to-day, because of an unsuccessful attempt to overthrow the usurpation of yesterday. The influence of the doctrine, however, did not extend beyond the philosophers, for each successive faction as it grasped the brief authority fell readily into the "easy sin of vengeance" and proscription. Exile or death was the fate universally reserved to the conquered. The frequent recurrence of these frightful scenes in France, their shocking cruelty, made more hideous as the prize of victory usually fell into the hands of the basest demagogues; the extraordinary extension which the doctrine of constructive treason had reached in England; and, more than all, perhaps, the influence of that modern humane spirit which has sought to mitigate the barbarous cruelties of the old criminal code, have all combined to produce a great reaction in public opinion throughout the civilized world, not only in regard to the punishment due to treason, but as to the nature of the crime itself. With the exception, however, of the declaration made by the short-lived Provisional Government of France in 1848, at the suggestion of Lamartine, that no one should thenceforth be put to death for a "political offence"—in plain English, for treason—we believe that no instance can be found in the legislation of modern Europe or in this country in which philosophical theories in regard to the right of revolution have been allowed to modify in the least the old established law of treason. While by means of discussions, designed to bring about a mitigation of the severity of the penal code, almost every other crime in the calendar has been analyzed in the spirit of an enlightened humanity, with a view of grading the punishment in such due proportion as the moral heinousness of the offence or the safety of society seemed to require, the crime of treason and the punishment due to the traitor (except in the omission of a certain barbarous mutilation formerly connected with his execution) have remained unchanged on the statute book. In this country particularly, where everything social and political has changed since the adoption of the Constitution, treason against the United States, as it is sharply, clearly, briefly defined in that Constitution, has withstood all attempts to weaken its force and directness by the sophistries of interpretation. At the same time, it cannot be denied that either because we have known hitherto nothing practically of the real enormity of treason, or because, perhaps, we have been somewhat staggered by the very stupendous proportions it has attained, we are by no means decided how far the letter of the law should be vindicated.

It has long been the fashion to appeal to the wisdom, moderation, and justice of our Revolutionary fathers as furnishing us with a true rule of action in many things; particularly are we pointed to their policy in time of war, both towards domestic and foreign enemies, as indicating the course we should pursue. There are few matters connected with the history of the Revolution less generally known than the measures adopted by the various colonists concerning those of their countrymen who were adherents to the Crown—Loyalists, or Tories, as they were called. It seems to us that, at the present juncture, we may study with profit the legislation not only directed against these loyalists, during the war, but persisted in after peace was declared and immediate danger was passed. The subject has been most luminously treated by Mr. Sabine, in the preface to his valuable work on "American Loyalists," from which we shall borrow from illustrations we may need for that purpose.

Passing by the numerous outbreaks of popular violence prior to the commencement of hostilities, which serve to show the widespread disaffection towards the Royal Government, we come to the formal acts o legislation adopted by the various colonial assemblies in reference to the adherents of the Crown, as soon as the popular party got control of them. These acts are remarkable in many respects—in none more so than in the unanimity of sentiment which they indicate as prevailing in all the colonies as to the proper policy to be pursued, not only towards those guilty of the technical crime of treason, but also towards those who in any way, direct or indirect, afforded aid and comfort to the public enemy.

In Massachusetts, a person suspected of enmity to the Whig cause could be arrested and banished. Three hundred and eight of her inhabitants, who had fled from their homes, were threatened by act of Assembly with imprisonment and transportation in case of their return, and for a second offence with death, without benefit of clergy.

In New Hampshire a similar act was passed. Seventy-six of her inhabitants were banished, and the estates of the most obnoxious were confiscated.

In Connecticut, affording any aid or information whatever to the enemy involved the loss of the offender's estate and his imprisonment for three years.

In Rhode Island similar offences were punished by death and confiscation of estate.

In New York, county committees were authorized to apprehend and to decide upon the guilt of those suspected of correspondence with the enemy, and to banish them if found guilty. The effects of fifty-nine persons, of whom three were women, passed in this State by confiscation to the "people."

In New Jersey the persons and estates of the loyalists were governed by a similarly rigid code, while in Pennsylvania the number of persons who were attainted of treason by special acts, or by proclamations of the President and Council, was nearly five hundred.

Maryland confiscated and appropriated the property of all persons in allegiance to the British Crown, and Virginia passed a resolution that persons of a given description should be regarded as aliens, and that their property should be sold, and the proceeds paid into the public treasury.

In North Carolina and Georgia similar laws were enacted, while those passed by South Carolina on the subject exceeded in severity those of any member of the Confederacy. The loyalists were divided by the law of this State into four classes, their relative guilt determined without any judicial enquiry whatever, and penalties were imposed upon the different persons embraced in them, from a fine of twelve and a half per cent. of the value of their estates, to their absolute confiscation, and the perpetual banishment of their owners.

Measures such as these appear of merciless severity when contrasted with the provisions of our recent Confiscation acts, and certainly very little heed was paid by our fathers to those "inborn rights" of which we have heard so much of late, trial by jury and exemption from military jurisdiction. Yet we never hear that they were regarded at the time by any one save their victims as too severe. On the contrary, they were considered by all good patriots as essential to the public safety and the success of our arms. So deep was the conviction on this subject, that these proscriptive measures were persisted in long after peace was declared, and in the face of the provisions of a formal treaty made between Congress and Great Britian, which stipulated that the various State legislatures should be urged to repeal their confiscation and banishment laws, and to grant compensation to the loyalists for the losses sustained by them through the operation of these laws. This recommendation was absolutely unheeded. Not a single State repealed her confiscation laws, or made restitution to the unfortunate Tories. We may suppose that strong personal animosities engendered before the war, and made intensely bitter by the events of the contest, may have had something to do with this determination, but we think it is fair to infer that a deeper and more statesmanlike motive indicated the policy to be pursued. The leaders of the Revolution no doubt thought that in establishing a new government upon a popular basis, the success of the experiment would be gravely compromised by the presence and influence of those whose notions of royal prerogative were so deeply rooted as to be wholly irreconcilable with any true theory of popular sovereignty. They very justly feared the influence of the talents, the personal character, and of the large landed estates of their opponents. They determined to establish a republican form of government, and logically (whether justly or unjustly to individuals) they made up their minds to eliminate from the country every disturbing element by which they thought that the success of the experiment would be hazarded. The result proves, we think, that they acted wisely in adopting such a policy. We may mourn, if we choose, over the injustice of the proscription and exile of many of the loyalists, and may pity the many hardships they were forced to endure in the wild regions of Canada and New Brunswick, where new homes were provided for them, but nothing can be clearer than that the most deep-rooted principle of our American life, its intense nationality and love of independence, owed its birth and rapid development to the general agreement of opinions which then prevailed in regard to the great principles of self-government. How different might have been the result had the Tories been allowed to assist in bringing order out of chaos in 1789, it is easy to conjecture.

When Napoleon, after his return from Elba, was preparing the Acte Additionel, designed by its provisions to secure the support of the liberal party in France, he refused, in opposition to the opinion of many of the wisest men in the Council of State, to declare formally that, under the new system, the penalty of confiscation for political crimes should be abolished. "I do not mean," said he, "to make use of this tremendous power to harm the hair of a human being, but I wish to hold it in terrorem over the head of Talleyrand at the Congress of Vienna, over certain of my former officers, now courtiers of Louis XVIII., at Ghent, and over certain doubtful prefects here, because it is just now the most effective instrument for the real good of the country that I can employ."

THE MUDDLE, AND THE WAY OUT OF IT.

We believe it is Hoyle—it may be Mathews; at any rate, some supreme authority—who says that a good whist-player knows how to observe the rules of the game, while a great whist-player knows when to break them. This maxim is as true of war and of politics as of whist. A good general or a good statesman is one who has well studied the science of war or of government, and knows how to apply its practical rules to the ordinary experiences of military or civil affairs. A great general or a great statesman is one who can pierce through to the principles which lie beneath those sciences, and divine precisely when the state of affairs exists which can be only fitly met by disobeying their canons. This nation is now in precisely the crisis which calls for such an intervening intelligence, to extricate it from the very bonds and ligaments with which it has bound its own limbs—as its enemies hope, to be offered up as a sacrifice to their malice and revenge. There is a general instinctive feeling of this necessity pervading the loyal part of the nation, and as general an inability to discern whence and how the deliverance is to come. The Anglo-Saxon reverence for established institutions and old prescriptions and recorded precedents, which forms so striking a feature in the American character, makes us shrink from refusing to follow whither they seem to point, in spite of our misgivings that it may lead us to destruction. It is the collision between this feeling and veneration for the past with the sense of the instant necessities of the present that produces the hopeless muddle in which too many good men now feel themselves, and in which they will be apt always to find themselves whenever they set about making two incongruities coalesce.

This confusion of ideas arises from an inability or unwillingness to see that the rebellion has put the States engaged in it in a totally different relative position to the nation from that they occupied before they revolted. Many excellent persons cannot see where the new wine of impartial liberty which the nation has trodden out of the red wine-press of the rebellion can be put, excepting into the old bottles of State rights, though they have fearful forebodings that the bottles will burst to the utter spilling of the wine. The doctrine of the independence of the several States, including the right to regulate their own internal affairs as seemed good (or evil) in their own eyes, was a political axiom which everybody accepted. Even the most extreme Abolitionists scrupulously avoided asking Congress to interfere with slavery in the States, because they believed it had no constitutional power in the premises. A very small portion of them, led by Gerrit Smith, held a different doctrine; but, as a general thing, the public opinion of the nation was unanimous on this point. The necessity of the case has changed public opinion as to that matter, so that the abolition of slavery, because necessary to the exclusive and highest welfare of the nation, is as unanimously accepted. But, on the mistaken supposition that the rebellion is ended, many conscientious persons are in doubt how the nation can do anything else than restore the rebel States to their old sovereignties, if they give the assent, which they cannot refuse, to the abolition of slavery. Of course, all the Copperheads at the North, who have been giving the rebels all the aid they dared during the war, are eager in their endeavors to rehabilitate them in their old pre-eminences as far as possible, now it is over. But men of acuteness and sense, of the most tried and undoubted loyalty, are exercised in their minds as to how the citizens of the rebel States can be hindered from settling at their pleasure the political condition of the dwellers within their borders, whatever the consequences to the nation may be, by citizens meaning only those who exercised the right of citizenship before the rebellion.

The remedy, we apprehend, is provided by the necessity of the case. The Government of the nation, having taken the steps necessary to suppress the armed rebellion, is not to be excused from taking such further ones as are necessary to make that suppression effectual and permanent. The only reconstruction which Congress has a right to consent to is one which shall secure the nation and all its inhabitants, North and South, black and white, in the possession of the equal rights and privileges which can alone give strength, security, and peace to the nation. The duty of the Government, including all its co-ordinate branches, is to consult the safety and welfare of the whole nation, and not to pander to the prejudices and passions of the rebellious portion of it. The safety and welfare of all the inhabitants of the nation cannot yet be trusted to the care and protection of the rebel States, restored to all their sovereign rights as exercised before the insurrection. That the rebellion is not killed, but only scotched, is evident enough from the hardships and cruelties to which the freedmen are subjected in all those States. Nothing but the presence and the fear of the interference of the United States troops prevents their reduction to a condition of virtual, if not nominal, slavery, as bad as that from which the nation has pledged itself to deliver them. And should the troops be withdrawn, the constitutional right of the citizens of each State to be regarded as citizens of every other State will be as dead a letter as Mr. Hoar found it in Carolina, and Mr. Hubbard in Louisiana, a dozen years ago; and as did the black citizens of Massachusetts and New York who were sold into slavery by those States, whose rights they went to defend before the courts of the nation. As long as the vicious and rebellious state of mind which the President's experiment in reconstruction has developed exists, neither he nor Congress has a right to regard the rebellion at an end and deliver the nation into the hands of those impenitent rebels and their Copperhead allies, or even into the fear of it. The sword has cut the knot which seemed inextricably to bind the whole nation to the triumphing wheels of the slaveocratic Democracy, and it must be its own fault if it permits itself to be tied again by the ravelling strands of the parted coil.

If the President and the two Houses of Congress had the right to take all measures necessary for the reduction of the rebels, including even the abolition of their most sacred institution of slavery, the same right, and the co-ordinate duty, still inheres in them to take such further measures as shall make that reduction complete and perpetual. And this ex necessitate rei. As truly so as the necessity of the case extorted the emancipation of the slaves by the President under the war powers of the Constitution. This was justifiable, politically, because the life and honor of the whole nation demanded it. So its life and honor demand that it shall be protected now from having its victory turned into defeat by the cunning of the intestine enemies who have succumbed to its force. Constitution and laws, whether prescriptive, statutory, or popular, are not the life of a nation, but its raiment only. The life is more than the raiment, and it is not to be sacrificed to a superstitious veneration for its vesture. All political progress towards freedom has been made by departure from old ideas when the critical moment came. Nothing could be more venerable than was monarchy in the eyes of the English people, and yet Cromwell decapitated it in the person of Charles I., and it has never, since that stroke, been what it was before. Kings were taught, as Boswell's father told Dr. Johnson, "that they had a joint in their necks," and have been the better for the lesson ever since. The Convention Parliament exiled Catholicism and despotism in the person of James II., and re-arranged the laws of descent, in utter contempt of divine right and the statutes and customs of the realm. A century ago our ancestors were sincerely loyal, and it was but here and there a sagacious eye foresaw that the crisis was coming upon them which would compel a reconstruction of American government upon the ruins of loyalty.

We cannot but think that President Johnson has complicated matters by his theory that the States have never been out of the Union. For he is himself obliged to contradict his own theory. If true, and if the rebellion was confined to individual traitors, why does he not leave the States in the hands of the loyal men and the pardoned rebels? Simply because he knows that it would be only to confound confusion worse than ever. The rebel States did, by their own solemn action, take themselves out of the Union in fact, and kill and murder hundreds of thousands of loyal men to sustain their action; and no abstract political theory should be allowed to put them in a better position than that in which they elected to place themselves. They are not actually, and we believe Congress will declare that they are not theoretically, States in any proper sense of the word. They are neither States nor yet Territories; but collections of men in an entirely abnormal political condition. They are conquered rebels, individually and collectively, at the mercy of the nation they have so heinously offended and grievously injured. Congress has no right to erect them again into States until they have proved themselves capable of the republican form of government the Constitution requires it to guarantee to all the constituents of the nation. This will be done when political privileges are granted on equal terms, satisfactory to the sovereign nation, without distinction of race or color, to the inhabitants of the several jurisdictions; when the oath of every man is equal before the law; and when the ordinary tribunals to be organized are competent to protect the life, property, and rights of all the people. Until then a military force must be maintained in every so-called State sufficient to preserve the peace and protect original loyalists, white and black, with military courts to do the justice in all cases in which justice can be nad in no other way. And this as much for the real benefit of the South as of the North, and it is this that loyal men there, as well as here, entreat at the hands of Government. The accepted time for doing this is now, and will soon be past, and if not used aright, the last end of this nation may be worse than the first.

THE PARSON AND THE ATTORNEY.

We think that our contemporaries of the press have hardly done their duty by the public, during the late hot weather, in not refreshing it more generally than they have done with the correspondence between Governor Brownlow and Mr. George T. Curtis of this city. Nothing could be more refreshing during the heated term than the original letter of Mr. Curtis, were not its contents made yet more refrigerate by the pail of cold water emptied in his face by the reverend Governor. We freely admit our own laches in the premises, and can only crave pardon of our readers for not having been more instant in ministering to their ardent necessities. It seems that an unhappy patriot in Tennessee, W. C. Kain by name, is in the clutches of the law for the trifling indiscretion of treason and murder. For some reason best known to himself, either that he could get no counsel nearer home willing to undertake his case, or that there was some particular adaptedness to it on the part of Governor Brownlow's correspondent, it appears that he has had to resort to this city for legal assistance. Mr. Curtis was the counsel learned in the law on whom this honorable distinction fell. We presume very few of our readers ever heard his name, unless any of them should happen to remember him as the fortunate man who had the happiness to postpone the rebellion by the sacrificial offering of a black victim, Thomas Sims by name, under the beneficent auspices of the Fugitive Slave Law. It happened to be almost the first case in the City of Notions under that humane statute, and accordingly excited intense interest, and gave to the name of Mr. Curtis the only general notoriety that ever attached to it. Whether it was that this notoriety was not of a sort to benefit his practice, and that one of the notions of Boston was that negro-hunting, however useful, was not ornamental to the character of the legal profession, so that she turned her cold shoulder to him, at any rate the Sims Commissioner (which honorable addition to his style and title was conferred upon him for the gallant and meritorious service just mentioned) shook off the dust of his feet against her and sought the more congenial atmosphere of New York, several years since. He recently gave notice of his continued existence by the following characteristic epistle:

"New York, August 5.

"His Excellency Governor Brownlow:

"Sir: I have been retained as counsel to assist in the defence of W. C. Kain, now under indictment in one of the courts of your State for murder and treason. No one has requested me to write to you; but when I last heard from Mr. Kain he mentioned the manner of his confinement, and I could not help being shocked by its unnecessary rigor. I am not ignorant of the state of feeling in Tennessee towards persons on the Confederate side who may be more or less justly obnoxious to popular indignation. Into the merits or demerits of their cases I do not wish to enter, excepting in the instance of Mr. Kain, as I may have a duty to discharge on the issues which the State has formally made with him in its legal tribunals. But I cannot think it unbecoming in me to suggest to the authorities of the State that indictment and trial on capital accusations, and the detention necessary therefor, are punishment enough in advance of the possible end of such proceedings; and that all unnecessary rigor attending the confinement, whatever the supposed provocations, is what all men may justly deplore. I am sensible that the Union people of your State have endured great suffering, but the dignity and humanity with which it shall administer its laws and vindicate its sovereignty, will have much to do with its good name.

"Let me beg you, sir, to use your influence or your authority, and to see that this person is treated with no more severity than his detention requires. I am, sir, very respectfully,

"Your obedient servant,

"George T. Curtis."

It were worth a journey to Nashville to have seen the face of the militant minister and Governor when he first opened this epistle and gradually absorbed its contents. Being a minister, we trust he had the grace to forbear swearing, though if he had not, we think too well of the Recording Angel to doubt for a moment that he would have dropped a tear upon the word and blotted it out for ever. The phlegm of the New York attorney in writing such a homily to Governor Brownlow was only to be equalled by his intrepidity in attacking so unequal an antagonist. But we apprehend his courage was somewhat cooled by the parson's response, which was as follows:

"State of Tennessee, Executive Department,
"Nashville, August 18, 1865.

"George T. Curtis, Esq., New York:

"Sir: Your favor of the 5th instant is received. Upon some letter or message from one W. C. Kain, a felon in jail at Knoxville, you are shocked by the unnecessary rigor of his confinement, and suggest that 'the dignity and humanity with which the State shall administer its laws have much to do with its good name.' I know nothing of the nature of the report your client may have made to you, but I know the sheriff of Knox County, to whom your letter should have been addressed, and know him to be an excellent man, who has rendered gallant service as an officer in our army, and I am confident that any statements of your client, charging the sheriff with barbarous treatment of prisoners, are untrue. Your client, no doubt, thinks it very hard that he should be confined at all for the conscientious (?) discharge of his duty as an officer, in such insignificant matters as hanging and starving a few Union citizens, whipping others at the stake or at the cart-wheel, and stripping Union ladies who were passing through the rebel lines of all their clothing, except what they had upon their persons, for the heinous offence of thinking the rebellion wrong. In this opinion you may agree with him. I, who do not profess to be so deeply versed in Vattel and Puffendorf, cannot.

"I shall endeavor to see that the State vindicates its sovereignty by administering its laws with dignity and humanity; and while profoundly grateful for the solicitude you manifest for the reputation of Tennessee, I must be allowed to say that, when fully convinced that I, or the subordinate executive officers of the State, need instructions as to the proper discharge of the grave official duties devolving upon us from attorneys residing in other States, of your well-known proclivities, I will give you due notice, but until that time such gratuitous, patronizing lectures as yours can be regarded in no other light than as unwarrantable impertinence.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"W. G. BROWNLOW,
"Governor of Tennessee."

We should judge from this specimen that Parson Brownlow's dealings with sinners must be sharp and effectual, and we hope, rather than expect, that this labor may be blessed to the spiritual improvement and growth in grace of its object. If it cannot impart greater modesty, it may produce more reticence. Governor Brownlow speaks of the "well-known proclivities" of Mr. Curtis, from which we infer that the one famous act of his life has reached his ears. He infers that Mr. Curtis's tastes and character remain unchanged, which, for all we know to the contrary, may be so. But what a change, and how blessed a one, has come over him since Commissioner Curtis sent Sims back to Savannah! And no one would admit it more candidly, or rejoice over it more sincerely, than he. We will here take leave of the subject, by congratulating Mr. Kain on his choice of a counsellor, Mr. Curtis on his good fortune in such a client, and Tennessee and the world at large on a governor like Parson Brownlow, so eminently competent to deal with them both.

MR. HARLAN ON RECONSTRUCTION.

SECRETARY HARLAN, of the Department of the Interior, lately wrote a letter to a friend in Iowa, for the purpose of showing that "the President's policy" on negro suffrage does not conflict with the resolution of the Iowa Republicans to strike the word "white" from the franchise clause of their State constitution. "The real question at issue, in a national point of view," says the secretary, "is not whether negroes shall be permitted to vote, but whether they shall derive that authority from the national Government, or from the State governments respectively." Theoretically Mr. Harlan may be right, but practically he is entirely wrong—and for this reason: not one of the Southern States is prepared, or ever will be prepared in our time, to allow negroes to vote. The whole matter is the completest of foregone conclusions, if the Southern States are to decide what is to be the status of the colored man. From Virginia to Florida, they are all ready to declare that the colored race shall never be admitted to the polls. Under the pressure of the sword, which proceeds from our exercise of the right of conquest, the States that were in rebellion admit that the blacks are free, but they go no further—and they go so far as that only because they cannot help themselves. Suppose the President had carried his constitutional scruples a step further, and had remitted to each of the conquered States the decision of the question, "Has slavery any longer an existence here?"—does Mr. Harlan suppose they would have decided that slavery did not exist? Of course he does not. No man, with his faculties in a tolerably clear state, could come to the conclusion that any Southern State would have declared that slavery did not exist merely because the victors in the civil war had so declared in advance, but still left the question to be decided by the vanquished. Whatever should be left for the decision of the vanquished, they would be sure to decide in accordance with their feelings and prejudices, and their supposed interests.

It must have been clear from the beginning that the colored race had nothing to hope from the Southern whites. To remit the settlement of their condition to those whites, their late masters, in the belief that those masters would act humanely and justly, was as wise as it would have been to expect that a community of wreckers would be especially tender of the moral rights of shipwrecked mariners. What should have been done was this: the conquered States should have been required to admit their colored inhabitants to the enjoyment of all the rights that belong to their white inhabitants. We had as good a right to impose such a condition on them as we had to impose the condition that they should abolish slavery, or, which is the same thing, admit that we had abolished it. We disregarded State rights when we made use of our military power to abolish slavery, and we could have done no more had we insisted that the late slaves should be recognized as men and as citizens. Such a course would have settled, at once and for ever, a matter that now threatens to vex the country as long as it was vexed by the slavery question itself. It would have been the treatment of a bold surgeon who cuts away a foul excrescence, and would have borne no resemblance to that quackish treatment which converts such excrescence into a permanent sore, through which the strength of the body is drawn away. Every week something is done to show that the conquered States are governed militarily, than which nothing could be more opposed to the requirements of the Constitution. If the Constitution is to be disregarded in secondary matters, why should it become so sacred whenever it is proved to stand, or is supposed to stand, in the way of justice and liberality? In fact, if there is anything in what is called "the President's policy," the President's course is all wrong. Under that policy he is bound to withdraw every soldier from the Southern States, and to permit the people of those States to decide every question that concerns them precisely as they shall please to decide it. Even if they should declare that slavery still exists, we cannot see how he could object to such action, for slavery has not been constitutionally abolished, and, therefore, if his principle is sound, he has no right to say to any State that it must and shall admit that slavery has no existence within its borders. To insist that each conquered State should start on its new career only after having recognized the right of every negro to full citizenship, would be no more subversive of the rights of that State than would be that other condition which has been enforced, namely, that each conquered State should start on its new career only after having recognized the abolition of slavery, such abolition being the result of military violence, and no more a constitutional proceeding than it would have been constitutional to have made Gen. Grant dictator, in order that he might have had perfect power for the perfect prosecution of the war. It is a mere sham and a delusion to suppose that questions like those which have proceeded from the occurrence of the secession war are to be settled by resort to quirks that might answer for a political discussion in a debating society in Virginia in days when '98 was yet a magical number, but which are entirely out of place when a great people is seeking repose after a season of revolution; but who are not so anxious for that repose as to be ready to disregard the claims of justice, or indifferent to their plighted faith.

Mr. Harlan writes:

"President Johnson maintains the doctrine that the Constitution of the United States does not confer on the federal Government the right to interfere primarily with the right of suffrage in any State of the Union; that the question may arise, and properly be decided by Congress, when senators and members present themselves for admission to seats in that body, under the clause of the Constitution which makes each House the exclusive judge of the qualifications and elections of members, and that other clause of the Constitution of the United States, which provides 'that the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government.' I infer that if any State shall adopt a law on the subject of suffrage which would clearly show the State government to be other than republican, it would be the duty of Congress to reject applicants for seats, and to adopt whatever legislative remedies would in their judgment be necessary to carry out the guaranties of the Constitution."

"That the Constitution of the United States does not confer upon the federal Government the right to interfere primarily with the right of suffrage in any State of the Union," may be a perfectly sound proposition, but it has no practical connection with the question of negro suffrage. If the Constitution is to be observed, slavery itself is not abolished; and if it is not to be observed, why should not negroes be voters as well as white men? That Congress—that is, a part only of the federal Government—will have it in its power to undo that which, Mr. Harlan tells us, the entire federal Government cannot prevent being done, is a strange position, to say the least of it. The Constitution, it is true, says that "each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members;" but could this provision be made to apply to so extraordinary a case as that which will present itself to the next Congress? This case is to be one that must differ entirely from such cases of contested elections as occurred under the old polity, when there was no dispute as to principle, but only discussions as to modes of procedure, and so forth. If Congress should set aside persons claiming to be members of that body, because chosen in accordance with "the President's policy," would not there be a collision between the Executive and the Legislature? The question would come up, "Are these States in the Union?" If they are in the Union, as the President holds, how could Congress refuse to receive their members? And how could the President side with Congress, supposing that body to refuse them admission, without condemning all that he has done?—without admitting that he had stultified himself? Such admission would be a confession of failure that we have no right to expect from a President of the United States, and, least of all, from a President who has so strong an individuality as every act of Mr. Johnson's shows him to possess. He would be at war with Congress at once. On the other hand, what would become of the colored population if Congress should admit the Southern members to seats, though that population had been disregarded when those members were chosen? The matter must be a most troublesome one, let it be settled either way; and all the trouble that will come from it might have been avoided had the matter been firmly treated from the first—as firmly, let us say, as the abolition of slavery question was treated.

Mr. Harlan's reference to the "republican form of government" provision of the Constitution does not help the matter. His inference that Congress would not admit applicants for seats who had been chosen under a suffrage system clearly not republican, may be enough to satisfy himself, but it can satisfy nobody else; for the question would immediately present itself, "What is a republican government?" How this would be answered in Congress nobody can as yet tell. All we know is that it will furnish matter for endless discussion. Time that might be usefully employed will be devoted to the discussion of a question that ought literally to be beyond the possibility of debate; and anger will be excited among men who ought to be the firmest of friends, because they will not be able to agree on a point which need not have been introduced into Congress at all. One is bewildered by the thought of the vast amount of historical learning—duly "crammed" for the occasion—that will be brought to bear upon this "republican" discussion, and all of which will have as much real bearing on the subject of negro suffrage as an elaborate history of the Argonauts and the Golden Fleece would have proper place in an oration before a convention of wool-growers.

VITALITY OF THE FREED NEGROES.

Want of space prevented us, in our last number, from fortifying our conclusions in regard to the probable extinction of the freedmen, by a reference to the history of the colored population of the British West Indies. It was a prevalent supposition not many years ago that emancipation had ruined the commerce and material prosperity of those islands. We imagine that the general impression at the present time, as to the population of those islands, is that it is dwindling away, and only kept up by the importation of coolies. Mr. Sewell's thorough work on "The Ordeal of Free Labor in the British West Indies," showed conclusively that emancipation had advanced them commercially and materially as well as socially and morally. It is our pleasure to exhibit the increased progress of the population, which has also resulted from emancipation. In Mr. Bryan Edwards' standard history of the British Colonies, a table of the populations of the different islands in 1791, including the Bahamas but not including the Bermudas, St. Lucia, and Trinidad, gives as the total population of the rest of the islands 544,000, in round numbers. By Parliamentary returns for the year 1826 and neighboring years, the population of the same islands footed up only 689,000, that is, 135,000 more than in 1791, though between 1791 and 1807, when the slave trade to all British possessions was stopped, from 160,000 to 240,000 slaves must have been introduced and retained. This estimate of the number of slaves introduced may seem high, but Humboldt states that at the time of the French Revolution 38,000 slaves, of whom these islands would take more than half, were annually absorbed by the British West India Colonies, and a Parliamentary return for the two years of 1802 and 1803 gives an annual mean of 10,500 slaves imported into and retained in these islands. From 1826 to 1844, when the next census was taken, a period embracing eight years of slavery, four of apprenticeship, and six of freedom, the increase of the whole population in all the islands was 48,000 on a population of 734,000, or 3.5 per cent. for a period of ten years. The last Parliamentary return of the population of the British West Indies is for the year 1862. The total black and colored population was then 874,604. In 1844 no distinction was made between the white and the colored part of the population, except in Jamaica, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, and the Bahamas. If we take the white population in the other islands at the same number that it was in 1834, whatever error there will be will tend to reduce the real increase of the free colored between the years 1844 and 1862, since the white population in these islands somewhat increased between 1834 and 1844. Thus calculated, the white population in 1844 was 48,339, and the colored population was 733,736. The gain of the colored population in the 18 years was 140,868. The number of coolie immigrants included in this number (estimating from the data given by Cochin for all the islands up to 1856, and from the numbers stated by other authorities as being in several of the islands in 1860) cannot be more than 45,000. The increase of the colored population from 1844 to 1862 will then be reduced to 95,800, which gives a decennial rate of increase of 7.37 per cent. This increase was made in spite of the general insalubrity of great portions of the islands, of which an idea can be gained from the fact that the annual mortality among the British troops is as high as one in twenty, and in spite of cholera epidemics in Jamaica and Barbadoes, which were said to have carried off nearly 60,000 inhabitants in all. The increase of the white population during the same period was not more than 4 per cent. If the accuracy of the return for Jamaica, which makes the population 66,000 greater than in 1844, and very much greater than Mr. Sewell estimated it in 1860, be questioned, we will throw Jamaica altogether out of consideration. Taking only the other islands, and calculating the increase by the same means as before, the increase, after deducting 25,000 for the coolies who may have swelled the sum, is 49,000 over a population of 373,000 in 1844, or at the rate of 7.37 per cent. for ten years. To sum up the results we have exhibited, while in 35 years of slavery the population of the British West Indies diminished one and a half to five per cent. every ten years, and in 18 years, two-thirds of which were passed under slavery or the apprentice system, it increased only at the rate of 3.5 in ten years, in the following 18 years of freedom the colored population increased at the rate of 7.37, a rate more than double the preceding.

Correspondence.

THE BASIS OF SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

One of the weightiest arguments in favor of the extension of the elective franchise to the colored race is the disproportionate power that the whites of the South will otherwise have in Congress when their States come to be represented according to their whole population. The danger, it is true, will not become an immediate one until the next decennial census; still, it is important that we should consider the subject thoroughly now, and find the surest means of preventing this result.

At present, the public mind seems to be settling in favor of the plan which is supported by the high authority of Dr. Lieber, Senator Sumner, and General Schenck, that the Constitution should be so amended as to make representation depend upon the number of voters, instead of the number of inhabitants. This would, it is thought, make it the interest of the people of the South to admit the colored people to the suffrage; and we should thus obtain our object by the direct and voluntary action of the Southern people themselves. This would certainly be a result whose importance we could hardly estimate too highly. The free gift of the suffrage by the States directly concerned would be an act which would work powerfully for harmony, while there is danger that the imposition of a rule by national power would be a constant source of dissatisfaction. It is to be observed, however, that the proposed measure is at best an expedient; that it is proposed, not as just and right in itself, but as a means to obtain the end which happens just now to be uppermost in our minds. It ought to be remembered, further, that the suffrage would, under these circumstances, not be a free gift, but a bargain; that the passage of this amendment would be nothing more nor less than a bribe offered to the Southern whites to induce them to grant a certain privilege to the blacks. It may be doubted whether, under these circumstances, the act would have the harmonizing effect ascribed to it. We ought, therefore, before deciding in favor of this proposition, to satisfy ourselves that it is a good and wise one in itself—not merely a convenient way of accomplishing this special object.

Have the people of the United States really considered the subject of the proper basis of representation, and made up their minds that this ought to be the number of voters instead of the number of inhabitants, as at present? There is no pretence that they have done this. Some forty years ago they did consider the subject in some of the States (New York for instance), and deliberately abandoned this very principle which is now proposed for readoption, as well as the more aristocratic one of taxation, and since that time population has been universally assumed as the correct basis—the only question having been, how to obtain the exactest possible proportion between population and representation by the formation of equal districts. It may be the people were wrong at that time, and made an unwise change; the fact, at any rate, shows that this sudden disposition to go back to the old method is a temporary whim—not a conviction reached by the observation of actual inconveniences and disadvantages in the present one. If it were not for this new issue coming up just at this time, it is not likely that any one would have thought of changing the basis of representation.

We ought, therefore, first of all, to discuss the question upon general grounds. What is the most just and satisfactory principle on which to establish the rate of representation in a republic? If we should decide that the number of voters is the true basis, we should be ready to favor Mr. Sumner's proposed amendment. If, on the other hand, there should appear to be no reason in theory or in experience to be dissatisfied with our present system, we should be slow to abandon it. It would then be our duty to see whether there is not some other way of securing to the colored people their rights, without making a change in the Constitution which we might afterwards be sorry for.

The burden of proof is, of course, with those who propose the innovation. They are bound to show that it is fairer and more philosophical to represent the voters alone than to represent the whole population. We, who oppose the amendment, cannot in justice be called upon to defend the established practice of the country, until some actual charges are brought against it, which has not yet been done. I shall, therefore, content myself with pointing out two objections in point of expediency that lie against the proposition.

The first is, that by its adoption the new States of the West would acquire disproportionate power in Congress, because of the larger proportion of adult males in their population. Let us compare, for instance, Massachusetts and Missouri, two States which are very nearly equal in population, and which would probably have the same number of representatives now that Missouri is a free State. Missouri has (according to the census of 1860) 1,182,012 inhabitants; Massachusetts, 1,231,066; so that Massachusetts might possibly have an extra member in virtue of a fractional excess. The number of males, however, reverses this proportion; e. g., Missouri, 622,201; Massachusetts, 596,713; and, supposing half of these to be voters, we should have Missouri, 311,100; Massachusetts, 298,356. If, then, one member were allowed to 30,000 voters—a very probable ratio—Missouri would have ten, and Massachusetts nine. Taking population as a basis, Massachusetts has a slight advantage; taking the number of voters, Missouri would certainly gain a member. In the States and Territories further west the proportion of males is still greater: in Colorado, 32,654 out of 34,231; in Oregon, 31,451 out of 52,160. We in the East have no desire to discriminate against the Western States; but we have a right to demand that, if any distinction is made, it shall not be in favor of new and immature commonwealths against the old, compact, orderly, and cultivated communities of the East.

Another objection is of a more fundamental nature. It is proposed, by this measure, to hold out an inducement to all the States to extend the suffrage as widely as possible. But the suffrage has already been extended too widely, and the object should rather be to diminish than to increase the number of voters. At the same time, and for the same reason that we admit the thrifty and intelligent colored people to the elective franchise, we ought to exclude the ignorant and vicious whites. It cannot be repeated too often that the suffrage is not merely a right, but also a trust and a mighty power, and that no person has any claim upon it who will not exercise it conscientiously and understandingly. It is nothing but our irrational practice of allowing incompetent whites to vote, while we refused the privilege to competent blacks, that has enabled men like Vallandigham and the Woods to get political power into their hands. There are already temptations enough to extend the suffrage widely; there are enough precincts ruled by jail-birds, unnaturalized foreigners, and men who cannot write their own names. Only two or three States in the Union make any attempt to require in their citizens a guaranty of their fitness. There has been reason to hope, in the natural progress of events, that others would see the wisdom of requiring some degree of education in their voters, and would, one after another, follow this example; but the adoption of the proposed amendment would at once check this wholesome reform, and start the various States off on a frantic race to see which would throw its doors open widest and register the largest number of names on its poll-books.

It ought to be observed, moreover, that this procedure, with all its objectionable features, might not, after all, bring about the desired result. It would still leave the power to the Southern people themselves, and if they retain the spirit of aristocracy in full strength, especially if they still cherish their old State-rights feelings, they might very likely choose to rule as an aristocracy in their own States rather than to obtain for those same States increased power in the national councils—councils which would be no longer controlled by them.

Having shown the objections that lie against this particular plan for obtaining negro suffrage, it is, perhaps, no more than fair that I should try to point out a better.

There are five ways of dealing with this subject. The first is, to leave it entirely to the States themselves, as at present. This is not so utterly hopeless as is generally assumed. There is a small but growing party in the Southern States which is in favor of educated suffrage for whites and blacks; and it may be best to wait a while, before taking any action ourselves, to see whether our object may not be obtained without any interposition on our part. If this should fail, as is likely, we can then adopt whatever course seems best.

The second method is that which has been discussed above—to persuade the States to do justice by the offer of a sort of bonus.

The third is for Congress to take the matter wholly into its own hands, as argued by "T. F." in THE NATION of August 24. His very able and ingenious argument failed to convince me that the obvious and accepted interpretation of the Constitution is not the correct one. It seems to me that nobody can study the debates of the convention, and especially those of the various State conventions called to ratify the Constitution, without arriving at the conclusion that any so centralizing provision as giving the national Government the power of determining the basis of suffrage for State elections could not by any possibility have received their approval. In this I consider the question merely as one of interpretation; apart from this, however, any proposition to give to the central Government power to fix the qualifications of voters for State concerns, would be equally objectionable, as being inconsistent with the healthy and harmonious relations of the national and State governments.

There is, however, one way in which it appears to me that Congress can meet this present issue without assuming any general control over State laws upon the subject. "T. F." assumes that, under the accepted theory, the power of Congress ceases completely and for ever as soon as the State is once admitted to the Union. This is, of course, true as a general principle. But there is an important exception: suppose that a condition is imposed upon the admission of a State—not tacitly, as when California was admitted as a free State, but in so many words—it would seem self-evident that Congress would have a right to enforce the observance of the condition. The admission of Missouri, for instance, was delayed for a year until a particular provision was struck out from her Constitution; will it be maintained that Missouri had a right to re-adopt that provision as soon as she was once safely in the Union? If the doctrine I have maintained is true, there would be nothing to prevent Congress from laying it down as a condition to the rehabilitation of the seceded States as members of the Union, that they shall modify their laws of suffrage in accordance with the principles of equality.

The power of Congress to do this may, however, be denied, and this method is open at any rate to the objection that it would apply only to the Southern States, leaving untouched the even more atrocious laws of certain Northern States. The fifth course seems to me, therefore, to be preferred; i. e., to procure an amendment to the Constitution giving Congress the power to establish the qualifications of voters for national elections. The States would then still have the right, which legitimately belongs to them, of making the laws of suffrage in State elections as liberal or as discriminating as they please. In order, however, to secure full rights to the colored people, in State as well as national concerns, it would be desirable to pass a second amendment, prohibiting any discriminations on the ground of race or color. An amendment to this effect, as proposed by Mr. Wendell Phillips nearly two years ago, would cover the whole ground. Kill slavery, with all its attendant abominations, and establish the suffrage at once upon a just basis. Indeed, if this were adopted, there would be no urgent need of the other one, giving to Congress the power over the qualifications of voters. It would be well, however, still to insist upon this, inasmuch as we might reasonably expect to carry it within no very long time, while the grand and generous principle of Mr. Phillips's proposition would be likely to be some years in making its way to popular favor. It should not be assumed, however, that the colored people would necessarily be obliged to wait all this time for their rights. The right to vote in national elections would speedily bring after it the right to vote in State elections; just as the right to testify before military tribunals, which General Howard is giving the negroes, must soon be followed by the right to testify in State courts.

If the national right of suffrage should be thus made uniform, the chief objection against basing representation on the number of electors would lose its force. In this case, however, it is doubtful whether any one would take the trouble to urge the amendment, inasmuch as there would no longer be any political object to gain by it. MARCEL.

TESTIMONY OF PRISONERS IN THEIR OWN DEFENCE.

NEW HAVEN, Sept. 11, 1865.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

In your issue of the 7th inst., you state that "the Legislature of Maine, at its last session, passed an act which permits a prisoner, arraigned for murder, to testify in his own behalf," and you add that "a State which has more than once been a pioneer in our American legislation again excites our interest, and, we cannot err in saying, secures our commendation by a novel experiment in criminal legislation."

Without designing to rob the State of Maine of any credit that may be due to her, I would, nevertheless, desire to interpose a word in favor of Connecticut, which, more than twenty years ago, tried the "experiment in criminal legislation" which you speak of as "novel" and peculiar to Maine. The time was, in Connecticut, as in other States, when the testimony of parties in interest was not allowed in our courts, nor were accused persons allowed a hearing upon their own trial. An act was passed about the year 1832 permitting both these classes to tell their own story. It was found, however, in regard to criminal prosecutions, to work badly. The accused were great sufferers upon a skilful cross-examination, and, in mercy to them, the law was repealed, as that in Maine doubtless soon will be. The case you quote in support of the law will prove one of the exceptions in its favor. In this State there is doubtless much "hard swearing" by the parties in interest, but, on the whole, it is supposed that the benefits of the law outweigh its objectionable features, and there is, therefore, no opposition to it.

Connecticut is also the pioneer State in her legislation upon the law of libel. No other State has such an act for the protection of the newspaper press. This act, passed ten years ago, requires the proof of malice in the alleged libel. In other States the malice is inferred from the proof of the libel, and in all such cases nominal damages at least must be given to the plaintiff. In other words, an editor, with the best intentions, is liable to a criminal conviction for the publication of an erroneous statement. I say it is not so here. The malicious spirit, the design to injure, the animus, must be shown by the circumstances, in order to obtain even nominal damages. Special damages, however, if proved, may be obtained, as in other States; but these must be set forth in the declaration of the plaintiff. This is a great advance on the dark ages of English jurisprudence. Our Supreme Court, however, through the influence of one of the judges, an able but crotchety man, who is pitted against the liberal rulings of a brother member of the bench, has almost killed the law by its encroaching decisions. The Legislature will soon have to come to its defence, unless this antique judge shall be transferred to some other orbit of duty.

Connecticut took the initiative against the law allowing imprisonment for debt—against the act allowing the creation of lotteries and the sale of lottery-tickets. But Maine has the credit of her well-meant liquor law, and Connecticut the discredit of following her example in enacting a similar most unfortunate statute.

You will see, therefore, Mr. Editor, that Maine is not the pioneer State in every legal reform, but that Connecticut is ahead of her in experiments in the right direction. TRUMBULL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Noticing in No. 10 of your journal a brief article in which reference is made to some recent ameliorations of the law regulating criminal trials in England and in the State of Maine, I am induced to call your attention to the recent changes made by the last Legislature of the State of New York in respect, namely, to the testimony which may be admitted in such trials. I would state, in the first place, however, that you seem, in the article referred to, to be in error in supposing that in the State of Maine the right of the accused to testify in his own behalf is restricted to capital trials. On the contrary, by the act of the Legislature of that State, passed in 1863, this right is secured to the accused "in the trial of all indictments, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes or offences," and in the number for August, 1865, of the "American Law Register," new series, may be found a letter of Chief-Justice Appleton, of that State, to a member of a committee of the Senate of Massachusetts upon the subject, in which he gives his weighty and unqualified approval of the law.

The Legislature of New York, at their last session, continued the work, which has been going on at every succeeding session since the adoption of our Code of Procedure, of amending that statute. Amongst other things, they amended section 399 of the code, so that it now reads as follows: "A party to an action or special proceeding, in any and all courts, and before any and all tribunals, and before any and all officers acting judicially, may be examined as a witness on his own behalf, or in behalf of any other party, in the same manner and subject to the same rules of examination as any other witness." . . . "And nothing contained in section 8 of this act shall be held or construed to affect or restrain the operation of this section." The section 399 also contains provisos and limitations not material to be here cited.

A careful comparison of the different sections of the code as thus amended will demonstrate that the change introduced by the last Legislature is startling, not to say appalling. I proceed to point out the effect of this amendment.

It is to be observed, in the first place, that section 399 is contained in that part of the code designated Part 2, and by the eighth section of the code, mentioned in the amendment, the second part is declared to relate "to civil actions" . . . . "except when otherwise provided therein." But section 399, as amended, both by its general language and by the special expression of its final clause, as cited above, does "otherwise provide." The operation of section 399 is no longer limited or affected by section 8.

Now, "actions" are declared by section 4 to be of two kinds:

1. Civil.

2. Criminal; and by section 5 a "criminal action" is defined to be one which "is prosecuted by the people of the State, as a party, against a person charged with a public offence, for the punishment thereof."

It follows, of necessity, that a person charged with a public offence "may," both upon his trial and upon the preliminary examination before a magistrate, "be examined as a witness on his own behalf, or in behalf of any other party"—a person charged or indicted jointly with him, for example—because, in the first case, the proceeding is a "criminal action;" and, in the second case, a "special proceeding."

It is not perceived that there can be any escape from this conclusion. It is, on the other hand, in no degree probable that the Legislature contemplated this result of their work, any more than they contemplated the disastrous results of their legislation in 1860, which opened the prison doors and "gave enlargement" to more than one convicted murderer. But we think it is abundantly clear that the author of the amendment not only understood exactly what he proposed to do, but also exactly how to do it.

We would not wish to be understood as committing ourselves against the amendment. It may be expedient, wise, just. But we do stand committed, now and always, against this style of legislation, and reprobate it as rash, because there was no need of haste; and blind, because it neither sought nor had the light afforded by public discussion. Certainly this most important legislation, touching in some degree the life, the liberty, the reputation, and the security of all, has been passed upon a people unaware of what was proposed and done for them and in their name.

We have not learned that this legislation has been hitherto brought under judicial discussion or decision; probably for the reason that its existence is not generally known.

The amendment suggests many and grave considerations bearing upon its propriety, from an exposition of which we at present refrain.

BRIEFLESS.

BROOKLYN, September 10, 1865.

AN EXTRAORDINARY FUNERAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

BEE FUNERAL.—A correspondent of an English paper transmits the following: "On Sunday morning last, I had the pleasure of witnessing a most interesting ceremony, which I desire to record for the benefit of your readers. While walking with a friend in a garden near Falkirk, we observed two bees issuing from one of the hives, bearing between them the body of a defunct comrade, with which they flew for a distance of ten yards. We followed them closely, and noted the care with which they selected a convenient hole at the side of the gravel walk—the tenderness with which they committed the body, head downward, to the earth—and the solicitude with which they afterwards pushed against it two little stones, doubtless 'in memoriam.' Their task being ended, they paused for about a minute, perhaps to drop over the grave of their friend a sympathizing tear, when they flew away, and, as John Bunyan says in his dream, 'I saw them no more.'"

The foregoing reminds me of a bit of experience in connection with a few months of shepherd-life in California. The record given is one of literal facts. Let our naturalist friends, therefore, take note of the same, and, if deemed worthy, write them down in their books.

All cattle-kind, in those days, unhampered by the conventionalities of fences and particular farms, were left to wander free over the plains, with no other restrictions than the attendance and general guardianship of a shepherd.

I was down one day to where the Little Butte Creek sinks on the prairie. The Little Butte on the one side, and a succession of sloughs on the other, gradually curving, came at length together, forming a sort of peninsula covered with oak timber. It was a most beautiful locality, and afforded a favorite watering-place for the cattle that were wont to range thereabouts.

Under a tree I found an ox that had apparently just died of a disease known as murrain. At the time I discovered the dead animal there was but one living one in sight, and he was following me in from where I had forded the slough. While I was busy in examining the dead to see if possible whose it might be, he halted; but as soon as I passed on out of the way, he began cautiously to approach it, and then, in a peculiar way, to smell of it, which he continued for some time, as if to ascertain what was the matter. After having satisfied himself, apparently, that his friend was indeed dead, he set up at first a low piteous howl, which gradually increased in intensity and power, until it ended in a piercing and terrific scream. The next moment the whole country around resounded with the tramp of bellowing cattle. That terrific knell had broke on the ears of the multitudes that roamed over those plains, was responded to, and in the short space of ten minutes no less than one hundred were either present or in the immediate neighborhood.

Then came the ceremony. Never having been before the witness of the performance of funeral rites among the brute creation, I naturally scrutinized this with not a little interest; especially so as it promised to be on a decidedly extensive scale.

They commenced first going up to the "deceased," two by two, though sometimes three at a time, when each would smell about him for a moment, and then bid him a final farewell by each setting up a roar which always terminated in a scream. At length, those standing far outside, doubtless waxing impatient at the slow progress made, and in not readily getting access themselves to the dead, began on all sides to join their full sonorous voices in the chorus, by lowing and bellowing and screaming, chanting thus, as it were, a requiem full of power and pathos over their departed companion and friend.

What other interpretation could I give to this truly novel, yet touching and impressive scene? These animals had all traversed the burning plains together, together they had toiled their weary way over yon rugged mountains. Here, at last, in the midst of verdant plains, running waters, and the grateful shade of the promised land, one of their number perishes untimely. Why not this expression of grief on the part of the survivors?

There are evidently connected with the habits of the brute mysteries calculated to perplex for some time yet, if not for ever, the keenest search of man's scientific ken.

H. R. H.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

X.

DANVILLE, VA., Sept. 5, 1865.

DANVILLE is built upon the crown and northern slope of some steep hills which lie along the south bank of the Dan River. It contains rather less than four thousand inhabitants, of all colors, but, on account of its conspicuous site, produces the impression of a larger and finer place than it is. As one approaches it from the north, and, looking across the river at his feet, sees its many handsome residences standing among trees and gardens, and recalls what he has observed of other towns, or of the absence of them, in his travels through Virginia, the general aspect of the place is quite pleasing.

The river contributes as much to this effect as any other feature of the landscape, for it holds less of earth in solution than most of the other streams which I have seen, and is able to reflect the sky and change with it. The Dan is here about sixty rods wide, shallow and full of rocks, that everywhere show above the surface of the water. It is spanned by two ugly covered bridges, over one of which passes the railroad to Richmond, and the other is a toll-bridge for ordinary travel. The stream is rapid, and the water-power furnished by its current once set in motion the machinery of several tobacco factories, but they are now all idle. Business of every kind is said to be dull; most of the tobacco has already come in from the neighboring counties, and the people have almost nothing to sell. No national bank has yet been established, and there is an embarrassing scarcity of money, so that a large part of the local trade is transacted by way of barter—wood, corn, and other country produce being exchanged for salt, dry goods, and groceries.

The interior appearance of the place is not different from that of other small Southern towns. Queer-looking equestrians, on good, bad, or indifferent horses, riding over the ill-paved streets; three or four men sitting or standing at the doorway of every shop; negro men, with short cotton aprons, rolling casks, or carrying sacks; sunburnt boys, with long bleached hair, guarding country wagons, while the father exchanges a bag of wheat for a bag of salt, or the mother trades eggs for dry-goods; venders of vegetables—these scantily fill the business street; and over everything, street, houses, shops, and men, is diffused an air of languor, and neglect, and half-decay, for which, perhaps, the relaxing influence of heat and glare is a good deal responsible. The liveliest figures to be seen are the quartermaster's wagon teams, and the corporal's guard, with bright bayonets, at the corner by the pump, who lie in wait to pick up every negro that has no pass, and march him away to do an hour's work at policing camps or sweeping quarters.

As I stood and watched the amusing incidents of the arrests, I was addressed in sonorous tones by an elderly and ill-dressed gentleman with a very brown face and a red nose:

"My good sir, will you be so kind as to direct me to the Tunstall House? It must be that there is mint somewhere in this town, and they tell me I shall find it there if anywhere." I was going to the hotel he wished to find, and on the way, as well as after we reached the place, the gentleman talked freely. He was from Columbia, and on his way to New York.

"I am going on, sir, to offer a great speculation to some of their rich men there. Friends of mine who have been North since the war ended tell me they found the business men very well intentioned and liberal, and rolling in wealth, sir. They have been coining money up there while we have been gradually coming down, down, down to our last mill. I 'm from Bolivar County myself, State of Mississippi. I hail from Columbia, but that 's not my native place, nor where I mean to live. I was in Bolivar up to '63, and I own just as good a tract of cotton-land out there now as any man wants. Why, I 'll tell you, sir; in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-one, with ninety-nine workers—not hands, mind! workers—I made six hundred and ninety-one bales of cotton! Well, I've heard of better doings than that, but I never saw them. But I can brag of that much. And I can do the same thing again, sir. But I have nothing left, you know, but my land and my experience; not a thing. The Confederate government, in 1862, issued one of the most blundering, foolish orders that was ever issued by any government on God's earth—to burn all cotton within five miles of the river. My place, you see, is more than ten miles from the river; but the dirty rascal charged with the execution of the order owed me a grudge; hated me as—well, almost as much as I hated him; and he burnt every ounce of cotton I had. Nearly thirteen hundred bales he burned; a fortune, sir, if I had it to-day. But it 's gone. It was n't a great while after that before the Yankees came and carried off all my mules but five, and destroyed about everything else on the plantation; so I concluded I 'd pull up stakes and get away from there. I settled with all my niggers near Columbia. But by-and-by Mr. Sherman came along, and what was left me before I lost then; all my meat went, all my corn, all my mules, and some of my niggers. Most of them stayed, though, and it became a question what to do with them. I must tell you about that. You see I had brought them out of a good country into a devilish poor one, and though I might have turned them all loose when they became freedmen, that 's not my way, so I got a place out in Edgefield, and then I called them up and made a little speech. 'Boys,' said I, 'I got you into this place, where you 're like enough to starve, and though we are all going back to Bolivar some day, we can't go just at present; so I 've prepared a place for you out in Edgefield district; that 's a better region than this, and we 'll start for there next week.' But no, sir, they said they did n't wish to go; they 'd stay there where they were. 'Stay here? Very good. But how are you going to live? You 'll starve; for I won't undertake to feed you.' 'No, master, we won't starve; we 've got something.' 'Yes,' said I, 'but you have n't enough to keep you till harvest.' Well, sir, to my astonishment, I found that they had provision for a twelvemonth. The d—d rascals had gone in and helped to sack Columbia. They had everything, sir, from a pound of tobacco to a porcelain egg; bacon, flour, any quantity of clothes. And I found out that Sherman's men, when they broke open my smoke-house and corn-house, had left a share of the plunder with the niggers. I had no more to say. The niggers did n't go to Edgefield, and are there yet, waiting for me to take them home to Mississippi. They 're mightily afraid I'll be slipping off and leaving them there, but I 'll do the fair thing, and they shall go back. Now this is what I 'm going to do in New York. I shall say to some of those capitalists, 'Gentlemen, I 've got a good plantation, and not a cent of money. The war has stripped me. I 've got no mules, no carts, no blacksmith's shop, no farming implements. I want some of you to loan me ten thousand dollars to get these things with, and within a twelvemonth I engage to give you forty thousand dollars for your ten. Let me have cash enough to stock my plantation so as to set one hundred good niggers to work, and next year I 'll pack six hundred bags of cotton, five hundred pounds to the bag.' I might go further, and guarantee more than that, but six hundred bags will do, with cotton where it is now. There 's no investment like it. Why, sir, there 's untold money in this thing for men with five, ten, and fifteen thousand dollars to lend. The man who loans me the money ought to come right down on the plantation with me or send down an agent. Then he can keep accounts of everything, and see that he is not cheated; he can keep accounts with the hands, and look after things generally. The niggers do work better—there 's no use denying it, and I do n't blame them—they do work better for a Yankee than for one of us. No doubt, you think, I can get the money? My friends in Columbia say I can, but I 'll have to get a pardon first. That I 'm not going to do. I do n't believe it 's necessary, and I 'm not going near Washington. The d—d thing is all over, and I 'm glad it is; but I sha' n't bother about a pardon."

This gentleman thought that the negro, poor devil, was fated to disappear; that slavery, if it had oppressed him, had at the same time protected him; give the negro political and social equality, that would make no difference; being left to stand or fall alone in a competitive struggle for life with a superior race, he would be sure to perish; a system bad for the individual negro had been the preservation of the negro race in America; philanthropists, with their schemes for elevating the man, would find they had exterminated the species. A troublesome question would, at any rate, be removed from American politics.

REIDVILLE, N. C., September 6, 1865.

"A right smart o' fixins at the railroad thar," was the encouraging description of this place given me by a man who declined to give me a night's lodging, and, moreover, it is laid down on my map of the Southern States, so I was expecting to see twenty or thirty houses and a tavern; but I rode some hundreds of yards beyond the village, and only on enquiry discovered that I had gone through it. Two cars on the railroad, a small way-station, and a store where liquor is sold, is all I could find of Reidville. But going further on my way was a house at which travellers are entertained, and at which I stay for the night.

I have travelled to-day no more than twenty-five miles, having ridden slowly and stopped often by the way to talk with the people. The country is the poorest I have yet seen, with crops that seem less abundant and healthy than those further north, and with less timber. But the road lies along a high and unproductive ridge, so dry that, during the whole day, I have found no brook or spring, and the good land, I am told, is by the side of the creeks and the Dan River. Large plantations were very few, and the greater number of houses had around them no negro quarters at all, while others had two or three cabins, which, in many cases, were but little inferior to that occupied by the white family. A large part of the population of the counties of Caswell and Rockingham, I was assured, were "them triflin' people," of whom many were Unionists. The avowal of their sentiments, however, they never attempted, though I am told that such persons were well known to each other, and, during the war, formed secret societies for mutual protection of members, by sharing information and aiding each other's families when it became necessary for the men to flee from the rebel conscripting-officers, or to go away into military service. All the people with whom I have talked profess to have been secessionists. I should think that the majority of the people in these counties belong to the class of small farmers. From the high ground I could often get a view of the country for several miles around, and everywhere was repeated the unvarying scene with which the roadside had made me familiar—rolling ground covered with forest, a d here and there, at long intervals, a clearing of one or two hundred acres. Corn, ill-tended, and apparently richer in leaf than in ear, was the chief crop. The blades, in great quantities, were burning up on the stalk. I tried at two plantations to get a feed for my horse at noon, but could not, and I was told this evening that the people most generally were too busy with tobacco to pay much attention to saving fodder. But this year it must be from the force of habit that fodder is spoiling, for I saw only one field of tobacco, and that contained less than two acres.

A third attempt to procure a feed was more successful. The niggers could let me have some, and I could leave fifty cents to pay for it, the farmer said. He was just going down the road a piece, to the church; they were having a "protracted" meeting, and he had been aiming to go for two or three days. So he drove off; and, while the horse ate his chopped oats, I sat in the house-porch talking with his wife, a very fat woman, who laughed continually.

Her husband was a carpenter by trade, she said, but he owned a hundred and thirty acres and farmed as well. He used to raise tobacco right smart; but for three or four years he 'd only made corn. She was proper glad to get back to flour again; she told her husband her teeth were done gone chawin' corn-bread, and she reckoned 't was the corn-meal made the children's throats sore, scratchin' as it went down. She was thankful peace had come. Their land would n't bring tobacco without guano. Her husband intended to put in a good crop next year, and she reckoned he 'd peddle it out in South Carolina. He'd go thar now if he had n't sold his tobacco, for it was reported that there was a right smart o' specie in South Carolina, though Sherman did go through.

No, she reckoned he would n't do much with his own niggers. He 'd always be able to hire some in the neighborhood when work pressed, and he intended to keep only two of his men with him. And some of the young white men had been talking about hiring themselves out to him; but he did n't know, he was thinking about it. He 'd sent off two families, and there was another woman, with five children, that had got to go next week, for her keep cost more than her labor would ever pay for. The woman wanted to stay; so did all their niggers; but 't was no use; her children were all small but one, and that one had a dreadful har lip, so she could n't talk plain, and Mr. L. told her she and her train must start at once, for he could n't keep her. She reckoned if all the niggers had been sent right away from home immediately after the surrender, they 'd ha' found out by this what freedom was like, and they 'd ha' been all glad enough to get back with their masters and stay. But they listened to what the Yankees told 'em. This same woman she was speakin' of said to her husband, when he told her to leave, that it seemed like it was mighty hard; she 'd been made free, and it did appear as if thar must be something more comin'; the Yankees would n't never leave her so. That was the way with 'em all; but they 'd find their mistake. There was a man up there a piece that had gone to Washington city with some of the Yankee soldiers, and he come back a while ago. He told how the niggers was treated thar. He said there was a law so that if a nigger stole five dollars' worth he was put in the penitentiary for five years, and if he stole ten dollars' worth he was put in for life, and if he stole anything over ten dollars he must be hung. There was another law that no nigger should have water to drink without paying for it. That, she thought, was too hard; niggers never was treated so cruel down here; water was free to everybody.

It was dusk when I reached this house, which appears to be the residence of a farmer of the better class, and supper was already on the table. The meal consisted of butter-milk, corn-bread, and cold boiled bacon, with peas, and was eaten in complete silence, by the light of a brownish tallow candle. In the evening, sitting in front of the house, the farmer's brother became more talkative, and related to me his experience of life in a Federal military prison. Being asked for news, I said that I believed they were busy in Washington trying Captain Wirtz, the Andersonville jailer.

"I wish they 'd let us try the fellows that were jailers at Elmira," said the young man; "they 'd get a cussed short trial, and a grape-vine would be the end on 't. 'T would n't last no ten days."

"Were you confined there? How did they treat you?"

"Treated me mighty bad. I was a prisoner for thirteen months. The Yankees took me at Spottsylvania, and first they sent me to Point Lookout. I was used pretty well thar, but by and-bye they moved us up to Elmira. That was in August, and I never got home till last June; so you see I know what a Yankee prison was. We never treated them any worse than we was treated. There was forty-two men taken when I was, all out of our company, and there never was but fourteen came back home; so you may know. They killed twenty-eight out o' forty-two, and they tried to kill us all."

"Were any of them wounded?"

"Wounded? No. 'T was bad food, and usin' 'em hard. The durned weather was enough to kill anybody; the awfulest cold I ever felt. They kept us in tents till a'most Christmas time, and we was about froze to death. Lots of the men had their feet and hands frost-bit, and had to have them cut off. When they did put up quarters for us, they did n't put up half enough. They built great long houses, each one to hold two hundred men, and they only put in one stove at the end of one. Of course we could not keep warm, nor begin to. They did n't mean we should; for they gave us a little bit of wood that would n't make ten men comfortable."

"How were the rations? What did they give you?"

"They 'd knock down some old cows at the kitchen, and cut 'em up there and then, and fling the meat right so, without washing or anything, into the kettles, and never put in a grain o' salt. That was just their cussed meanness, because they had a plenty. When the meat was boiled, it did n't taste like beef, you know; it tasted of the cow, and heaps of our men could n't get it down easy anyhow. But they used to cut up the whole of it—the allowance for all the prisoners—and throw the lumps into heaps—great high piles they was—and by the time they 'd stand over night the meat would be sour. 'Twas n't good not once in ten times. They gave each man a little small rasher; no account anyhow. We was just half starved."

"Were the men ill-used in other ways?"

"Why, they 'd punish us for nothing at all. Every time a commissioned officer came into any room, every prisoner had to jump up and take off his hat and keep standin' till the blasted Yankee was gone. If he did n't, they 'd put a barrel-shirt on him. They need n't talk; I know what a Yankee prison is. But I tell you what was the meanest of the mean, worse than the Yankees—them fellows that made application to take the oath. They wanted to take it as soon as they was captured, but they would n't go into the Yankee army, and they would n't let 'em. But they used to sneak 'round, and lie, and inform on our boys—about tunnelling, you know, and them things. I 'd like to come across some o' them fellows now; one in particular."

"You had to take the oath of allegiance, had n't you, before you came away?"

"Took something. Ha' n't done nothin' but take oaths lately. Have to take an oath for everything I do. What 'll you do with me if I do n't take it? says I; keep me yer for ever? They 'd find something to do with me, they said. I wanted to get home; General Lee had surrendered, yer know; and I concluded I would n't let their durned oath stop me, but I 'd cuss along with the rest. So I took it and came on home. Do n't reckon that 's much."

GREENSBORO, N. C., Sept. 7, 1865.

To-day's ride has been pleasanter than yesterday's, though, on account of my having lost my way, it was a little longer. It has lain through a better country, watered by several streams, and containing more bottom-land. The general features of the landscape have reminded me as much of South Carolina as of Virginia. The surface begins to be more level; among the timber there are more gums and pines; the road often runs among stumps and close past the stems of the forest; tall, dead trunks, girdled when the land was cleared, stand thick together, bleaching in the cultivated fields; the dark-colored loam has not wholly disappeared, but often the soil is light and sandy; in the low grounds the trees may be seen rising out of black pools of stagnant water, and in such places the cardinal-flower forces itself upon the eye, and I noticed the livid passion-flower; lizards are frequent in the hot sand; I saw, too, flying among the leaves, a small bird, red as blood, which is common further south.

To-day I had an interesting conversation with a man who belongs to what, as I suppose, must be a new class in the South—the class of negro lessees of land. He had been a slave all his life, he said, and was now "a settled man" (he appeared to be forty-three or four), but he was going to strike out for himself and see what he could do in a state of freedom. He had already rented some land, and that he thought was what every colored man ought to do, if he could. Perhaps only a few would be able to do it at present, because the masters were opposed to it; wanted to keep the people in such a condition that they could be hired as laborers at low wages, and preferred to let a "no-account white man" have a plantation rather than rent it to negroes. His former master and the gentlemen living in the neighborhood refused to lease out land to him. But a few miles away from home he had been more successful. The owner had selected certain parts of his plantation, and told him to take up as many acres as he could properly care for and cultivate. The land was not good, most of it being "old field;" but if he could make enough this first year to feed his family, he would be content. He had bought a condemned horse from the Government corral for fifteen dollars; he was low in order, but would be fit to plough next month. His wife had been knocking about the house most of her life; but he could depend upon her assistance if the work got too hard for him, and he had two children big enough to do full work in the field. Both were good ploughmen, and when his own crop did not call for their labor he could hire them out to the farmers, and he also could do hauling for his neighbors, and thus pick up a little ready money. If God spared his life, he expected to have twenty acres of corn, eight acres of wheat, five acres of oats, and some potatoes on his land. His landlord was to receive one-third of all the corn raised.

This year he had been working for his old master, who had promised to give his hands such a portion of the crops they made as should be pronounced equitable by two white men whom he designated. The apportionment had not yet been made. On most of the plantations of which he had any knowledge the workmen received some part of the crop in payment for their labor, and, as a rule, the masters were endeavoring to hire them for the coming year at the same price—their board, namely, and so many bushels of corn.

This man said that he knew it to be still usual on some of the plantations to beat the negroes for any offence; and that especially is this the case in the country districts. Negroes living in the vicinity of Greensboro' could complain to the soldiers, but twenty or thirty miles out they were without redress.

He was very anxious that schools should be established. A while ago some of the colored people had spoken to a white man who lived near, a poor man, but "with good learning," asking him to open a school, which he had promised to do. But he did not like to begin without having first obtained the consent of the gentlemen in the neighborhood; so he called on five or six of them and made known his intention, but he was told that if he tried that game he would be shot in his school-room; he therefore desisted. The gentlemen who told the man so were just the kind of men that would have done it, too; but the Yankees would set up schools, he hoped.

At Greensboro' I made some enquiries with the object of finding out if the statements of this negro about ill-usage of laborers on the plantations were true.

There is in the town an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau. Like the rest of its agents whom I have seen, he is an overworked officer. He has supervision of seven counties, and has subordinates in but one of them, for police duty in the country is left to the home guard of each county, and consequently there are no Federal garrisons from which the superintendent might draw assistance. A negro who seeks redress for a real or imaginary injury must travel perhaps ten, perhaps fifty, miles and lay his complaint before the superintendent in Greensboro', or he must lay it before the home guard, with what likelihood of getting justice may be guessed from the fact that the captain of the guard in one of the counties was much surprised and little pleased to learn, the other day, that he had no right to whip negroes whose masters found fault with them. It is needless to say that the negro chooses the former alternative, and, when he decides to complain at all, he complains at Greensboro'. Having heard the fifty or sixty complaints of every day, the superintendent may consider the possibilities of summoning witnesses and all the other circumstances of the case, and may investigate it if he thinks best and can find time. His office, it will be seen, is not a sinecure. It would be speaking more accurately to say that no one man can perform its duties, and that most men, finding themselves able to do so little where so much calls loudly to be done, could but become disheartened by the difficulties of the position.

The officer at Greensboro' has been in the service of the Bureau only ten days. Within that time two cases of negro shooting had been brought to his notice; in one of which the man had been crippled, in the other only slightly wounded. He would not say that the sufferer in either case had been absolutely blameless, for he did not wish to prejudge the matter; but whatever the offence, he thought some less deadly instrument of punishment might have been employed. "The fact is," he continued, "it 's the first notion with a great many of these people, if a negro says anything or does anything that they do n't like, to take a gun and put a bullet into him, or a charge of shot. But this gentleman knows more about it than I do; he was provost-marshal of Salisbury down here." The officer had held that office, he said, from the 19th of July until the 6th of August, and in that space of time had arrested and held under guard four persons charged with shooting down negroes. Of the four negroes but one survived. Cases of assault, both gentlemen said, are very numerous, and almost always without sufficient cause. No day passed without several complaints being made. "Here 's a case now," said the superintendent; "I gave this woman an order on her former master for some clothes belonging to her which he withheld

She took it out to him, he read it and it did n't please him, so he knocked the woman down. He only lives eight or ten miles out, and I 'm going to try and get a guard so as to have him arrested to-morrow and brought in. I suppose he 'll be raging when he finds that negro testimony is to be used against him, like a man I had here yesterday. We convicted him on what the negroes swore to, and he was mad. He said a good deal; among other things says he, 'If this war ain't done, let us know it, and we can begin over.' 'Exactly,' says I; 'it was done too soon here by three months, I always thought, and a good many thought so as well as I after the assassination.'"

He found a good many men who appeared honestly anxious to treat their negroes kindly, and there were a very few who even interested themselves in schemes for educating the blacks; but it was his opinion, based upon what he had seen while in the army, and confirmed by his experience as superintendent, that the withdrawal of the Federal troops would be the signal for a reign of violence and oppression. From all he could learn, many of the people did not believe the negroes were legally free, and would not accept the new order of things. The State convention would probably declare slavery dead; but a good many county conventions, if they could speak, would declare that it was not, and in some parts of the State the negro would see a good deal of trouble.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, August 30.

FOR about the twentieth time within the last ten years we are celebrating once more the entente cordiale between France and England. Our fleet has been to Brest and Cherbourg, and now the French iron-clads are paying their return visit to Portsmouth, and the Warrior and La Gloire are anchored side by side together, in the waters of the Solent. So, as usual under such circumstances, we are engaged in singing pæans over the Anglo-French alliance, and in protesting that we have forsworn the foolish enmities of bygone times, and love each other all the better because we quarrelled and fought in bygone days, and have quite abandoned all idea of ever quarrelling again. Indeed, the Times yesterday, in a sudden excess of Gallo-mania, made the notable discovery that we were more akin to the French in race and language than to any other nation in the Old World or the New. Putting aside any nonsense of this kind, there is no doubt that the political alliance between France and England is stronger than it ever has been in the memory of living men. The support of this country is of great service to the Napoleon dynasty; on the other hand, the alliance of France relieves us from any anxiety as to our continental relations. Then, too, the Emperor himself is personally very popular on this side the channel, whatever he may be on the other. Moreover, Mr. Gladstone's treaty of commerce has created very numerous commercial interests, which tend to promote good feeling between the two nations. And, since the Crimean war, the old-fashioned jealousy of France has ceased to become an article of political faith. But when I have said this, I have said about everything. Calais is now only ninety minutes from Dover, and you can breakfast in your club in London and dine on the Boulevards on the same day. But, in spite of this, the two countries are very nearly as far apart in moral distance as they were in the days when steam engines and telegraphs were unknown. We have got rid of the superstition that frogs are the normal diet of—what provincial newspapers delight to describe—as "our lively neighbors;" and they, in their turn, no longer believe that we sell our wives at Smithfield. But it is almost impossible for us really to understand each other. I have known Englishmen who could speak many foreign languages perfectly; but I never knew an Englishman who could speak French, or a Frenchman who could speak English, in such a way that their nationality could not be at once detected. My belief is that the same vocal organs cannot pronounce the French and the English accents. And what is true of pronunciation is true of mental appreciation. Our virtues and our vices are not theirs; and the code, moral, political, and social, by which we judge of anything, is not only fundamentally different, but absolutely antagonistic. We can be—and I hope we long shall be—cordial acquaintances; but we never can be intimate friends, at any rate not for generations to come. Our sailors were most gracefully received at Cherbourg, and the French fleet will be welcomed heartily at Portsmouth. But there the matter will end; and the toasts and compliments uttered at these international visits, as they are somewhat pompously designated, will produce about as lasting an effect as the champagne with which they are seasoned. However, this interchange of courtesies does no harm, if it does no very permanent good; and the presence of the allied fleets at Spithead will certainly give Londoners who are unfortunate enough to be detained in London a good excuse for running down to see one of those marine spectacles which all true Englishmen love so dearly. With regard to the comparative excellence of the two fleets, it is difficult to learn much from the reports of those who visited them at Cherbourg. The general impression of English sailors I have met is that the French iron-clads could not stand against our own; but then, if the French ships were built of adamant, and ours of tinfoil, the impression would, I am sure, be the same. Right or wrong, we cannot believe that Frenchmen can ever work a ship as well as we can. I recollect at the time when the French and English fleets were anchored in the Bay of Naples, during the Garibaldian dictatorship, the captain of an American man-of-war was asked what he thought of the comparative merits of La Bretagne and the Agamemnon, the two crack ships of the rival squadrons. His answer was that "the former was the better ship of the two; but that if it came to fighting, he would give the Agamemnon five minutes to sink her." The speech was probably intended simply as a compliment; but I remember all the English officers who repeated it to me declared that, though they should not have liked to say so themselves, this was exactly their own opinion. And, as this is the general feeling of the British navy, I much doubt whether we are likely to learn much from the inspection of the Imperial squadron. However, while the fleet is at Portsmouth, I trust to see it myself, and shall then be able to tell you anything which strikes an unprofessional observer.

None of the royal family will, I believe, be present at the spectacle, as they are all engaged in attending a sort of family party at Coburg. The Queen had set immense store on every connection of the late Prince Consort being present at the uncovering of his monument in his native town. The little German Residenz-Stadt has, in consequence, been filled for the last week with all the hundred grand-dukes, land-grafs, princes, and excellencies who claim kinship with the ubiquitous Coburg family. If the reports are to be believed, they all tried to look exceedingly impressed when the bust of the departed Prince was uncovered, and they all hung garlands of immortelles about the monument with becoming solemnity. Altogether, the whole narrative of the proceedings is very German, and shows the German character of the reigning family too much to be altogether palatable to our English taste. The plain truth is that our public is getting very tired of this Albertolatry. The memory of Albert the Good is becoming as wearisome to us as the reputation of Aristides the Just was to the Athenians. At the time of his death there was a very deep and very genuine sympathy felt throughout the nation at the loss the Queen had sustained. As we were conscious we never had much liked the dead Prince while he was with us, we made up for our error by lauding him to the skies when he was gone; and, to judge from the utterances of our popular papers, you would suppose the Queen's husband had been the best beloved man in all England. Our fit of repentant enthusiasm was not very long-lived, and long after the sensation had died away we were deluged with odes, addresses, memorials, and so on, to the memory of the Prince, till we have grown weary of hearing his name mentioned. If there is moderation, according to our English proverb, in roasting of eggs, there is surely moderation also in putting up memorials. Very nearly four years have passed since Prince Albert was removed to a better world, and yet we are still expected to be sentimental about his death. Moreover, considerable annoyance is felt at the continued seclusion of the Queen. It may be very foolish of us, in the opinion of republicans, to care about the pomp and show of a court, but common people do care a great deal; and as we pay very dearly for the expense of keeping up royalty, we like to get our money's worth for our money. In itself, the whole matter is of very little importance for the present: Lord Palmerston is personally extremely popular, and the Government of the country would go on exactly the same whether the Queen lives in the Highlands or in London. But if, as is quite possible, a period of political trouble should succeed the close of the present administration, and any question should arise in which the wishes of the sovereign were thought to be at variance with the opinions of the country or of any large political party, the decay in the personal attachment of the people for the Queen, caused by her long absence from the public scene, will be an element worth considering in the aspect of affairs.

I dwell on this circumstance because many persons believe that we have got a hard time coming. A very large portion of the harvest is still not got in, owing to the late rains, and the fluctuations in the price of wheat at Mark Lane show that there exists a very general uneasiness as to the yield of the crops. As far as I can gather, there is no reason yet to despair of our having an average return. Up to the beginning of this month the harvest was expected to be an unusually fine one; and it seems doubtful whether the rain has inflicted any damage corresponding to the unusual quantity of ears upon the stalks. If we could have three weeks of dry weather we should be assured of a good supply of corn, and in consequence of cheap bread for the winter. But the weather still remains terribly unsettled. Be the crop what it may, we cannot doubt that the price of meat will be unusually high. The "Rinderpest," as we call the new cattle murrain, is not spreading so rapidly as we saw cause to fear at first, but it is undoubtedly gaining ground. In every part of the country voluntary associations are being formed amidst the farmers and graziers to arrest the progress of the pestilence. The common idea is that the disease is propagated by contact, and that if one beast in a herd is affected he infects all the others. According to this theory, the one remedy to check the epidemic is to kill at once any ox or cow which manifests any symptoms of the malady. As, however, it can hardly be expected that a cattle-owner will destroy on suspicion animals whose value varies on an average from £10 to £20, these voluntary associations have been formed to indemnify the individual sufferer at the common expense. Any member of these associations who can prove that he sacrificed animals supposed to be infected, is repaid two-thirds of their cost price at the expense of his brother members. The rapidity with which these societies for mutual insurance have been got up in every cattle-breeding county shows how very much the agricultural class has increased in intelligence within the last few years. In the days of the old protective corn-laws any organized co-operation of this kind between farmers would have been simply impossible. If the agricultural interest had been as powerful politically as it was formerly, the wish of our farmers would have been acceded to, and our ports would have been closed against the introduction of foreign cattle. As, however, fully one-half our meat is imported from abroad, and as the consumers of beef and mutton are far more numerous than the home producers of these articles, the Government have refused to listen to the solicitations of English cattle-breeders, and have contented themselves with issuing stringent regulations for the inspection of all cargoes of foreign cattle which enter our ports. Medical authorities, as usual, disagree on the nature of the "Rinderpest." According to one school of veterinary experts it is an indigenous disease, not an imported one; and is due to local and atmospheric causes, not to contagious influences. This view naturally enough finds no favor with agriculturists.

Indeed, in Ireland the pressure exerted upon the Government has been so strong that it has had to recede somewhat ignominiously from its formal decision. When the disease first declared itself in England, a deputation from the sister kingdom waited on Sir George Grey, to request that the importation of cattle into Ireland might be forbidden for the time. The Home Secretary, who has a fatal talent for occupying untenable positions, declared at once that such a system of quarantine was known to be ineffective by all past experience; that no precedent existed for the remedy suggested; that it was contrary to the principles of our Government to make any distinction between different portions of the United Kingdom; and that the ministry had no legal power to accede to the request. All these arguments were sound enough in themselves, but they failed to convince the petitioners. Meetings were held throughout all Ireland, attended by men of every shade of religion and politics; and an intimation was conveyed to Lord Palmerston that even the Irish ministerial members would not support his Government if he incurred the unpopularity of refusing the demanded ukase. The Premier, who has no notion of sacrificing his power for the sake of any abstract principle under the sun, reconsidered the subject; and after very brief deliberation an order in council was issued closing the Irish ports against cattle imported from England. In the particular case at issue, I sympathize with the Irish malcontents. The export trade in cattle may be said now to be the chief resource of Irish landowners; and with the exception of a few thousand black cattle imported annually from the West Highlands of Scotland, there is no importation of beasts from Great Britain into Ireland. If the "Rinderpest" can be prevented from crossing St. George's Channel, it will be an immense boon to the whole of the United Kingdom; and, though the evidence with regard to the contagious character of the malady is conflicting, it is well worth while trying whether the exclusion of English cattle will not stop the spread of the epidemic west of our own coasts. The unpleasant feature in the matter is the fact that this act of justice to Ireland was extorted by a sectional agitation. At the meeting held at Dublin, the language of the speakers, representing, as they did, all sections of the island, was violent in the extreme. Even Lord Naas, the Tory member for an English borough, and formerly Under Secretary for Ireland beneath Lord Derby's administration, declared openly that if the Government showed such a disregard to Irish interests as to refuse the requested prohibition, it would behoove Irishmen to consider whether the union ought to be maintained. And the other speakers followed in the same line with far less reticence. If the Irish could only combine generally as they did on this occasion, they might exert an almost irresistible pressure on any English ministry. Happily, however, for us, and perhaps for them, it is only a subject such as the cattle plague, into which religious and political partizanship cannot well be introduced, on which united action is possible. There can be no question that every party in Ireland, Protestant as well as Catholic, Whig and Tory, Saxon and Celtic, believes that the country suffers to some extent from its incorporation with Great Britain. But each party prefers the imperial rule to that of the rival faction at home; and it is difficult to imagine how any common repeal platform would ever be adopted by the different sections. If this should ever come to pass, we shall possibly have trouble in Ireland, but we shall not have repeal. Whatever else we may do, we shall never tolerate any secession from our Union. Circumstances, we all know, alter principles.

However, I have wandered a good way from the "Rinderpest;" and have only to say about it further, that alarmists declare it to be the forerunner of the cholera, whose approach is beginning to create considerable alarm. There can, I fear, be very little question that we shall be visited with this epidemic before long. But as our hot season is nearly over, it is not so much to be dreaded.

SUNBATHS.

Some time ago it was stated in print that Dr. Dio Lewis had assumed the editorship of a comic paper. Whether the report was prompted by something ludicrous in the doctor's first name, reminding one as it does of an irreverent abbreviation, fashionable in our younger days; whether it was started on the same principle that Sheridan gave Wilberforce's name when picked up drunk in the gutter, and Halleck called John Targee a nightingale; or whether, like some other items, it had its birth in the stupidity of the item-maker, without any reason good or bad, we are unable to say; but Dr. Lewis took the soft impeachment sufficiently in earnest to give it formal contradiction. Rather prematurely, perhaps; for he has recently contributed to a very interesting and excellent children's magazine an article which must have been intended for Mrs. Grundy. It is entitled "Sunbaths," and relates how he induced a pale and sickly child to run about in the garden naked, or only clothed as to her head (to borrow a classic idiom) with a turban of wet towels. He persuaded the child and parent to this course by covering up a rose-bush with clothes and showing them that this sort of treatment did not agree with the bush.

The remarkably close analogy between our daily habits of life and those of plants, and the almost identical nature of our nutriment, doubtless suggested to the doctor his convincing illustration. Popular metaphor may also have confirmed his choice. We hear persons whose talents are rather of the solid than the brilliant order familiarly spoken of as "cabbage heads," and people have talked of cultivating their parents' memory ever since the time of Cicero; indeed, that great orator pertinently applied the phrase to a frugal Roman who was raising esculents on his father's grave. But we must hint to Dr. Lewis that metaphor is very misleading if accepted literally. It takes great liberties with all three kingdoms of nature. The editor who calls his personal or political opponent a jackass does not suppose him to be a veritable quadruped. The lover who, in amatory hyperbole, addresses his lady-love as his jewel, does not wish to "polish her off" or to lock her up. The Arab chief who apostrophized his mare, "my pearl," had no intention of boring a hole through the animal. And then the doctor forgets that his analogy is, after all, very incomplete; for, though we do not dress our flowers, we do dress most of our vegetables.

The greatly abbreviated costume which Dr. Lewis recommends, though startling at first, is not altogether without precedent. Everybody knows (by reputation) the Georgia toilette, and we once heard of a Cantab who improved on it by arraying himself in a full suit of studs. Still more Dio-Lewisian was the array of an African swell, mentioned by Dr. Livingstone. The missionary during his travels fell in with a tribe who have a singular order of merit, the members of which are distinguished by wearing—nothing. "One of the chiefs," he says, "called on me in his full official costume, consisting of a tobacco pipe." It must be confessed, however, that these practices are, on the whole, more usual in savage than in civilized life. Some Europeans, indeed, are in the habit of taking airbaths, which may be defined as the in-door equivalent of Dr. Lewis's sunbath. The Fliegende Blätter, in detailing with pen and pencil the adventures of young Baron Beisele and his bear-leader, the Professor Eisele, graphically illustrates the uninhabited appearance of Munich. On the morning of their arrival the Herrs Eisele and Beisele take their airbath in the street without molestation. But the German artist hesitated to carry out the idea in its naked simplicity. The professor and his pupil are depicted as retaining their shirts and boots.

Here it may be urged that we are treating Dr. Lewis unfairly, as his sun-baths are only recommended for children. But surely, to use his own analogy, his rose-tree would not bear dressing after it was full-grown. There are quite as many pale and sickly adults as children. Perhaps, however, his intention is thus to take the sharp edge off the novelty and introduce it by degrees. And certainly it upsets our ideas of the fitness of things sufficiently to imagine a number of garden enclosures (like loose horse-boxes without roofs) and "undraped" infants disporting in them. We fear that in most parts of the country the mosquitoes would interfere with the success of the experiment during the likeliest months of the year. Seriously, this is but another exemplification of the way in which the best principles are continually ridden to death. Men eat too much meat in warm weather—therefore all animal food is to be suppressed; or they do not take baths enough in cold weather—therefore all human infirmities are to be washed away with water. Dr. Lewis strikes upon a very good idea, that the studies of most children, and the occupations of most adults, have a tendency to keep them too much out of the air and light; therefore he would strip them to the glare of noon. So sun-struck is he that he will not allow any shade-trees about a house, or let man, woman, or child sleep in a room sheltered by a portico. We do not occupy our bed-rooms during the sun-shining portion of the twenty-four hours, but much the reverse; and what is the sun to do by occupying them in our absence, except make them uncomfortably hot during the warm season? As to the notion that a chamber with the proper allowance of windows cannot be adequately ventilated unless the sun shines through it, we must own our inability to discern it. Fortunately, Dr. Lewis has said and done so much good that we can indulge him in a little rubbish, especially when it is amusing.

PITHOLE.

Taking a car on the Atlantic and Great Western Road at Corry, after about an hour I fall into a snooze, when bump go the cars, the conductor of the train pokes his head in at the door. "Break in the road," he remarks; "you will pass the night here." At this laconic and interesting speech every one turns over and goes to sleep without a word. Very early indeed the next morning we awake, and I survey the party. There are two youth whose black coats, springing step, and innocent smile show them gentlemen and divinity students. They soon after stop at Meadville. The rest of the party are a yellow and melancholy race—then new to me, soon after well-known—operators and speculators in oil. At first, from a close resemblance to dried salt fish, I took them to be an extreme species from my native New England. But I soon found out my mistake. Pennsylvania claimed the honor of their birth.

An exception was an excellent old gentleman, nearly eighty, the president of some company, who had gone to look after its interests. Though somewhat tired by lying awake all night, the moment oil was touched upon his tongue was loosened, and he poured forth a stream of anecdote, theory, and description, which was very edifying.

Taking a horse the next morning, I climbed the hill that from the east overlooks the city and the creek. Unless one dipped his pen in mud, who could describe that filthiest of cities? The town chiefly consists of one long street, wedged in between the cliff and the river, crowded with shops, looking like a bisected peddlar's cart indefinitely prolonged. Cologne is a savory city by comparison, and New York seems of virgin cleanliness. The inhabitants resemble the lower class of scarecrows under the influence of a powerful galvanic battery.

After a long look at this sewer of cities, and the countless derricks between the city and the hill, I again turned my nose—prophetic organ—towards the east and the new reigning beauty of Oildom, euphonious Pithole.

The road winds up and down the hills that fill the water-shed of the Alleghany, and affords many beautiful views. On either side rise well-wooded hills in graceful curves from the little streams which flow through their valleys. One does not generally associate the oil regions with the haunt of the muses, yet if the muses had been disposed to take up their abode in this Western World, I know of no more appropriate place for them than the hills and valleys of the Alleghany before man laid his greedy finger on the fair face of nature.

Everywhere, conspicuous among the trees, you see the derricks of the oil wells, like steeples of the great temple of Mammon, at which all worship. Derricks, indeed, you see everywhere—in the valleys, on the hill-sides, on the tops of hills—with their engines attached, about one in fifty of which is running. Millions upon millions of dollars have been sunk all through this region in the purchase of worthless land at oil-land prices. How any imagination could suppose that oil would be produced from most of the land, I am at a loss to divine. It is well known, however, that with no class of men is the imagination so potent as with our solid business men. One searches for the wildest flights of fancy, not in a Collins or a Shelley, but in these and similar ventures by grave practical men, who would scoff at the word imagination, to whose power they are unwittingly the best witnesses.

Now and then you come upon a town of plain, unpainted boards "in looped and windowed raggedness"—and everywhere along the road you find hotels, so called, and dubious refreshment saloons, at which is sold under various names the ubiquitous whiskey.

After a few hours' ride I reached the city of Pithole. Pithole lies in the centre of the oil regions, about ten miles from Oil City and five from the Alleghany River. It covers a low hill which rises from the west bank of Pithole Creek, and will soon cover the hill rising from the opposite bank. Pithole Creek is a contemptible little stream, a few yards in width, emptying into the Alleghany a few miles below. The town has now several hundred buildings and some ten thousand inhabitants, and is probably worth fifty millions of dollars. A few months ago it consisted of half a dozen old farm-houses, fifty inhabitants, and would have been valued at, perhaps, fifty thousand dollars.

The town has the usual appearance of towns in this region, and is a gigantic city of "shreds and patches." Most of the buildings are built on land leased for three years. Passing up the street, you see on either side shops and hotels, each laying a different claim to fashion. One is painted, another has a splendid sign, another has its rooms papered. Every other shop is a liquor saloon. It is safe to assert that there is more vile liquor drunk in this town than in any other of its size in the world. Indeed, a bar is almost the invariable appendage to every building. Lawyers have bars appurtenant to their offices—each hotel, dwelling-house, or shop has its separate bar.

You pass crowds of persons, in an excited state, hurrying to and fro—most of them with haggard faces, old clothes, and trousers stuck in their boots—of that fishy, scarecrow race, specimens of which I had met in the cars. You pass many familiar names—"stat magni nominis umbra"—the St. Nicholas, the Fifth Avenue, the Metropolitan, and the like. After a ride of a quarter of a mile you reach the famous United States well, and a strange sight it is. Forth there rushes a stream of oil as large as your arm, with constant gushes of gas. Day and night this stream is vomited forth with unabated force. Scarcely less prolific are the neighboring "Twin Wells." Here we have in these little streams the source of this seething city, with its fierce, mad energy. Wonderful sight! Gazing at these streams men go mad. The oil-fever fires their brains. They contract an eager gaze, tuck their trousers in their boots, and wander up and down the creek in search of interests in wells to purchase. Them the artful brokers descry, and one fortunate angler draws his victim to a safe nook and tempts him with the "best and cheapest" interest on the creek, "indications wonderfully good," etc. The broker pockets his commission, and the victim is very apt to twice quadruple his investment in a short time, so he is not, perhaps, so much to be pitied.

Next to the oil wells themselves the most characteristic phenomena of the place are the countless teamsters who there congregate. Those who are acquainted with that imperturbable tertium quid of humanity, the army teamster, have no difficulty in recognizing him in Pithole. With dark face, shaggy beard, and slouched hat, and trousers tucked into his boots, he sits immovable on his stout team. On every proper occasion he damns his horses with a volubility and versatility of profanity which almost show a divine gift. To other except these equine emotions he is inaccessible. The team jolts on over rocks and trees, down mud-holes, out of mud-holes, down ruts—after a fashion to reduce an ordinary man to a gelatinous mass. From him it merely spills out an oath or two. Out goes a barrel, over goes the team—he tips it back, scarcely leaving his seat.

Sauntering up the street past teams, land offices, fallen trees, incipient or finished shanties, and groups of men in earnest debate about land or oil, I soon reach the centre of the town. Whom should I behold but the "fat woman" and the "fat boy?" O unctuous sight! in this lean and hungry land to meet a buxom young maiden of eight hundred pounds. How she was brought over these roads without being reduced to a skeleton, how she held her own against the water and the food, must for ever remain awful mysteries. No one but a Grant of a showman could have piloted her with her complement of pounds to Pithole by any line of which I have heard.

The United States Hotel, like all the rest, is built of planed boards, unpainted, very loosely put together. Adjacent is a tent with some fifty cots, well filled every night, and fragrant from proximity to the horse stalls. The hotel must have cost some five thousand dollars. It rents, I believe, for thirty thousand a year, and the keeper must net three hundred dollars a day or more. The front of the house is covered with advertisements: three-sixteenths of such a well—mining tools for sale, engines, and the etcæteras of incipient civilization.

In front of the building is a platform and a long bench. On this, through the day and evening, sit gloomy and dirty contortionists chewing the melancholy cud of speculation. Entering, you see other contortionists sitting in impossible attitudes. Surely Hogarth or Dickens must have had a hand in the creation of these men.

On the left you hear the telegraph ticking, and near it are men washing in a long sink. Beyond, tinkling glasses show that the versatile whiskey is transforming itself into brandy-smashes, gin cocktails, Tom-and-Jerrys, and other spirit-stirring potations. A person at Pithole is indeed placed between fire and water. To drink water is to drink a solution of salts. To drink whiskey is to drink poison. Every glass of water I took I forswore water, and every glass of whiskey, I forswore whiskey, and thus lived a life of zigzag perjury. I entered the dining room with the usual wild rush, and, seating myself by a rapid manœuvre, watched the rapidity of dining for which my countrymen have gained a cosmopolitan reputation.

I need not describe the dinner. Are not the works of our English friends on American government and society mostly taken up with a description of the American dinner and the use of the knife? Why persons profess to be so much shocked at the sight of a knife entering the mouth I cannot see. We pay large sums to see jugglers swallow swords. Why not enjoy similar exhibitions when free? For myself, I could see a knife protruding from a gentleman's boot without surprise or concern.

"Roast beef, roast lamb, Corned beef, boiled ham," chanted a somewhat slatternly muse in my ear. "All from the same joint," remarked an intelligent gentleman near me; "the animal must have worn motley. By the way," he continued, "speaking of motley, did you know the circus are going to give a benefit for the church to-morrow?" "Are they?" said I; "things seem somewhat mixed in this place. How long have you been here?" "Oh, I've been here for a couple of months. This is nothing to what it was at first. Then you had nothing to eat—sleep six in a bed. Things are quite luxurious now." "Were you here at the fire?" I asked. "Yes," said he, "I saw it. It was a magnificent sight. It blazed in one vast sheet of flame up to the sky. If it had spread a little, the whole place would have been burnt up. I think before long Pithole will be burnt up. It is all wood and oil, and no water near." "Concerted expectoration would soon put out any fire here," I remarked. "Rather a curious thing happened here yesterday," he continued. "The keeper of one of the hotels here turned off a servant girl. She did n't like such treatment, and, taking a horse-whip, drove him out of his hotel down the street." "Business seems to be done in a queer way here," I remarked after a while. "Yes," he replied, "men spring to it. Almost every one here is sick, and yet a sick man here works as hard as three well men elsewhere. Pretty much everything is flat now, though, except just here. The peace and the flood coming together knocked everything over. Last winter you could make money hand over fist. People would buy anything at any price. There was an old fellow, I remember, up in the mountains, with a farm where he raised a few turnips; no more chance of striking oil than of striking greenbacks. They offered him half a million for it. But he was a shrewd man; he thought they could make something out of it, or else they would n't want to buy it; so it must be worth more. He kept the land, and now it 's hardly worth ninepence." "He was a shrewd man," said I. "You hear such stories as this all the time up here," he added, "and they are, for the most part, true; the current facts are so much stranger than the stories most men can invent, that men here are under a strong temptation to tell the truth, except where their own interests are concerned." Early in the evening I went to bed. You have always an agreeable excitement in these places as to the character of your bed-fellow—whether he be a pickpocket or murderer, whether he be subject to delirium tremens or other foibles. Fortunate those who have one bed-fellow! Generally you have a countless number.

The next morning I arose early and walked out upon the platform. As I stood gazing at the clouds or mud, I was aware of a rusty old gentleman smelling around a pair of boots a young chap near me had on, as an old terrier would eye a rat. I asked "what was up," and found that said boots bore too close a resemblance to some boots the old gentleman had placed at the head of his bed the night before to be passed lightly by. He insisted on it that the boots were his. The present occupant of the boots, with that irreverence for age characteristic of American youth, requested his elder to take his journey into a far country. Perhaps he thought the journey from Pithole not so long nor arduous as from elsewhere. Let us hope so for the sake of good manners.

"You 'd better not talk to me in that sort of way," said the old gentleman, with somewhat ruffled feelings. "I 'm pretty well known in these parts, I can tell you. I built the first hotel that was built in this county." This appeal to a hotel rather awed the youth and the rest of us, but he still showed no strong desire to part with his boots.

It is a curious fact that most men out here seem to look upon Eastern hotels as the islands of the blessed, and life there as the summum bonum. "I have left a luxurious home," said a very bright fellow to me, "in the East. I have been living in the first-class New York hotels, and I have come out here to rough it."

During the morning I made a call on some Canadians, the chief engineers of the county, and sitting in front of their office surveyed life in Pithole from a comfortable chair. In the foreground you see a huge mud-puddle, varying in depth from one to three feet; beyond, hotels, stores, and grog-shops; and further on, the creek, with its numerous derricks. Past this office Pithole life streams, pausing a few seconds in the mud-puddle. Here we have a gentleman in black of a serious, ministerial appearance. He was recently the owner of a "sweat-board," a singular gambling instrument, and, with others, flooded the town with counterfeit currency. After him come speculators and mechanics. "Do you see that poverty-stricken old man," says one of my friends, pointing to a broken-down, wretched mortal; "that man has just sold his farm for a quarter of a million." Here comes Mr. B., formerly keeper of a variety shop, now a broker and a Crœsus, but not calculated "to witch the world with noble horsemanship." "Can you swim, Mr. B.?" I exclaim. "This is the Pithole Natatorium; no one should venture it who cannot swim." Mr. B., with ruffled dignity, dismounts, and leads his horse over a plank. Soon after the head of the circus passes by. What a magnificent carriage! with the proud step of the leaders of men. He carries an ivory-tipped cane, and wears a gold seal, such as I thought scarce six men could bear up under (such men as the earth now produces). "The other day," said my friend, "the circus drove through here. The drummer-boy was spilt out into the water. Out came the big drum on top of his head, and he picked himself up as best he might. Here comes a friend of mine, the dandy of Pithole. He wears a clean collar and has his boots blacked, and is the one man of fashion among ten thousand." And so the stream flows on.

The next day was Sunday, and I took a stroll into the beautiful fields near by. Every now and then you would come upon men lying under the trees, with a worn-out, haggard look. All of them seemed half sick, and yet all were ready to work with reckless zeal. Returning, I heard the crack of a pistol, and supposed some men were firing at a target. Soon after, however, on entering the hotel, I found a couple of men handcuffed, one of them shot through the leg. They had broken jail, and one of them had "squared off" at the constable on his arrest, upon which the constable had drawn his pistol and shot him through the leg. That same night a tragedy came near enacting. Notice was given the hotel-keeper of an attempt at robbery that night. He watched by the window with a loaded pistol. At about two he heard the soft tread of a man in moccasins. The thief drew near, opened the window, was about to enter, when he saw a pistol at his head, heard the false hammer strike, and was gone.

I remained in Pithole a fortnight, and became one of the oldest inhabitants of the place. During that time I learnt much of its social and business life. You find here, under the roughest clothes, some most excellent men—and, as a rule, the men are uncommonly intelligent. Every other man you meet is a soldier. The steadiest mechanics and workmen have most of them been privates, and have many wild tales to tell of battle and adventure. Most of the bar-keepers and hotel-keepers are captains or majors. Every now and then, in the neighboring country, you stumble on a man of education engaged in sinking a well. Many men of fashion, also, from leading the mazy dance and fascinating the hearts of maidens, have wandered off here into the forest in search of a fortune or a sensation. One must needs have a good conscience or a hopeful disposition thus to sit during the long months watching a little hole slowly sinking down to a great—perhaps.

Every one here is very courteous, and answer questions innumerable without complaint. You can see here, on a small scale, how commerce softens manners. Every one is desirous of making money out of every one else, than which nothing more promotes urbanity. It is simply ridiculous to suppose that the oil business is "played out," as persons like to say now-a-days. This single town produces over five thousand barrels of oil a day. Manual labor and investments in oil companies are the only things which do not pay well. All capital otherwise invested there doubles itself with wonderful rapidity. While I was there the town nearly doubled its buildings and inhabitants. I will only add a description of my last night.

Hearing that the great hotel of the town was going to be christened, I went to witness the ceremony. Drinks and billiards free—and a thousand thirsty men to enjoy them. Never before did I know how strong was the love of freedom in the human breast. A wild mass of teamsters, operators, workmen of every kind and costume, drank in the varied liquor of the generous host. I myself, in a private room, imbibed some capital sherry, and after staying a short time and proposing to myself the old question, whether a sponge or a Pitholean had the greater power of absorbing liquor, I took a walk to the centre of the town and took a long last look at Pithole by starlight. Seating myself on a pile of boards, which in a few days will be a hotel, church, or drinking saloon, I gaze around. In front a flickering torch lights up fantastically the thin jaws of the lord of the "fat woman." Windows and cracks equally pour forth streams of light, that with artistic chiaroscuro play over the swarth faces and strange forms of the passers by. There goes a gentleman with a quick step closely followed by two others. He has been trying to wheedle one of them out of an engine without paying for it, and they are on his trail. Here comes our friend the parson to collect subscriptions. After him reel two men somewhat overloaded with liquor. Everywhere there is a sound of revelry. Looking in at the windows, you see everywhere men playing cards, and drinking, as always. Beyond the stores on the left, in a small house, sleeps, after his death-agony, one of the victims of the fire. Down the hill on the right sits a vigilance committee in secret session to concert measures to prevent the daily robberies. Further down, the little streams of oil flow on incessantly. Unseen they move this complex machinery of men and things, with careless hand dealing out to their slaves life or death, wealth or poverty, triumph or despair.

The next morning I arose before the sun and walked to Oil City, and was soon turned towards the East and the glorious ocean, all of whose waters I hoped would be not unsuccessfully employed in restoring me to cleanliness. After being shaken a day and night I find myself on board a Sound steamer. How strange everything looks! How clean New York looks! Never before or since did cleanliness seem a mark of that city. See these smug little misses, with their melodious giggle, their ringlets and reticules, their admonishing mamma and bland papa. How kissworthy they look. Here we have a drooping Newport "swell," with his suit of grey, his triste moustache, and bovine expectant expression. How neat they all look. And how soft and thin their voices. How piously men seem to speak or swear. Their words do not, as in Oildom, come from their boots, pumped up with fierce gesture and hot with fiery oaths. The courtly negro and the murderous gong seem to usher in a higher civilization, at the threshold of which I leave whoever has followed me thus far.

GOLDEN-HAIRED GERTRUDE,

THE CHOICEST OF JUVENILE BOOKS.

BY

THEODORE TILTON,

Editor of The Independent.

Illustrated from original drawings by H. L. Stephens. Printed on heavy tinted paper of finest finish. Nearly ready.

TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 Park Row, N. Y.

ENOCH ARDEN.

In compliance with the request of many Artists and Lovers of Art, the publishers of the "Artists' Edition" of "Enoch Arden" will print for Subscribers

100 COPIES ONLY,

on large, heavy paper, made expressly for the purpose.

This is the edition illustrated by Hammatt Billings. James Jackson Jarves, Esq., in his "Art Idea," thus speaks of him, on page 241, in contrast with others:

"Hammatt Billings has capacity of higher order. His taste is refined, talent versatile, fancy subtle, and imagination inventive. In the limited scope of architecture allowed here, he has given evidence of a latent genius which in any other country would be stimulated and developed to its fullest power. Thus far he is more commonly known by his beautiful illustrations of Keats, Tennyson, and the most intellectually spiritual of the poets. In the lyrical grace, variety, and delicate beauty of his compositions, and sympathetic rendering of the text, he has no superior in this country. His brain is a rich mine of æsthetic wealth. He does not so much translate poetry into pictorial art as recast it in exquisite shapes of his own invention. The mere overflow of his mind would make a reputation for the common run of artists and architects."

Subscriptions received by the publishers,

J. E. TILTON & CO.,
BOSTON,

Also publishers of the beautiful "Cambridge Edition" of "Enoch Arden," containing all of Tennyson's late poems, with vignette illustrations.

Gilt top, very fine	Price $1 50
Half calf	" 3 50
Morocco antique	" 4 50

The Largest, the Cheapest, and the Best Children's Paper in America.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

A FIRST CLASS PAPER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS,

Published Monthly, in Chicago, Ill., 138 Lake Street,

By ALFRED L. SEWELL.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL contains sixteen pages of first class literary matter. It is intended that it shall contain better original Stories, Poems, and other reading for children, and more matter for the price, than any other children's paper on the continent. First No. published July, 1865.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Though the paper itself is more than worth the price, yet for the sake of offering such an inducement as will ensure beyond all doubt a very large list of subscribers to start with, I have determined to give the following beautiful present to every subscriber for one year:

A Superb Quarto Steel Engraving,

THE CHILDREN'S PORTRAIT OF MR. LINCOLN,

Size, 9¼ x 11¼ inches,

engraved in the highest style of the art, expressly as a premium plate for this paper—which can be had nowhere else in this style.

This is the best portrait for children of our martyred President, and is alone worth more than many pictures that sell for one dollar, but is presented gratis to every subscriber for one year to The Little Corporal.

☞ SPECIMEN NUMBER WILL BE SENT ON RECEIPT OF TEN CENTS.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,
CHICAGO, ILL.

PREMIUMS TO CLUBS.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the above Engraving.

Other inducements advertised in the paper for larger clubs.

All pages are electrotyped, and back numbers can always be furnished,

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—This first class monthly for boys and girls is receiving commendatory notices from every part of the Union, and these, too, are from our first-rate newspapers. The following notice is from the Pittsburg Christian Advocate:

"'The first number is the best children's paper, of a high literary tone, that we have ever had the pleasure of reading. If after issues shall fulfil the promise of this avant courier, Chicago will have the honor of making the best child's paper in the nation. We bid a hearty welcome to The Little Corporal and trust it may long live to grace the catalogue of newspaper literature for children.'

"The July, August, and September numbers are before us, and we assure the Pittsburg Advocate and our young readers of the Northwestern that these 'after issues' are fully up to the standard of the first number, and more—they are far beyond it. The Little Corporal is growing in stature, and the muscles of his literary and moral arm are hardening with exercise.

"In plain terms, Mr. Sewell is determined to make his paper a success, and he has secured the services of able writers, for whose productions he pays liberally. We re-echo the words of the Chicago Evening Journal.

"'It is bright, sparkling, and promising, both in typography and contents. It already excels every children's paper that we know of in this country.'

"The periodical looks as if it had been printed by the 'Riverside Press.'—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

"A NEW CHILD'S PAPER.—We have received two copies of The Little Corporal, a monthly paper for children, the publication of which has been commenced at Chicago, Illinois, by Alfred L. Sewell. Judging from these specimens, it is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America. Its whole appearance is in capital taste, and there is evidence in it that its editor has rare tact in catering for the wants of the little ones. The enterprise deserves to be a decided success."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal, Aug. 5, 1865.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Bright, sparkling, and pure; a gem, both in typography and contents. We have been accustomed to think that the West, however she might excel in agricultural products, was far behind the East in literary matters; but we begin to think it is time for the latter to look to her laurels. Certainly we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

"Judging from the appearance of the two numbers before us, The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America.—Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press.

"We have read with great pleasure the first number of this entertaining periodical. We trust The Little Corporal will continue to fulfil the promise of this first number. Will the editor accept our congratulations?"—N. Y. Independent.

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Union Press.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"The Little Corporal really excels any child's paper we have seen. The premium picture is of itself worth a year's subscription."—Sandusky [O.] Reg.

TO MINISTERS THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES:

I desire to secure the co-operation of the MINISTERS throughout the country in the furtherance of a work which cannot fail to meet their approval and appreciation.

As editor of THE LITTLE CORPORAL, I hope to induce Ministers to favor the circulation of my paper among their children as a means of doing them good; and I ask each one to send me the name of some intelligent and respectable lady (for whose integrity they can vouch), who will be willing to energetically canvass her own neighborhood for subscribers to THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Any Minister addressing me, as shown below, will receive by next mail Circulars, showing the opinions of the Press, and will also be informed in relation to the percentage allowed to canvassers.

Address

ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of DUNLOP, SEWELL & SPALDING,
CHICAGO, ILL.

Refer, if you wish, to

BISHOP SIMPSON, Philadelphia.
REV. W. W. PATTON, Chicago.

NOW READY.

NATURAL HISTORY.

A MANUAL OF ZOOLOGY FOR SCHOOLS, COLLEGES, AND THE GENERAL READER.

By SANBORN TENNEY, A.M.,

Author of "Geology," etc., and Professor of Natural History in Vassar Female College.

☞ ILLUSTRATED WITH OVER FIVE HUNDRED ENGRAVINGS.

In this book particular attention has been given to a full description of the Quadrupeds, Insects, Reptiles, Fishes, Shells, etc., of North America, and especially of those appertaining to our own country. As a complete Manual of "Zoology," it is believed that this volume surpasses any yet published. The illustrations are on "a scale," and engraved in the very best style.

☞ Copies sent for examination, prepaid per mail, on receipt of $2 00.

C. SCRIBNER & CO.,
124 GRAND STREET, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED

TO SELL

GRANT AND SHERMAN:

THEIR

CAMPAIGNS AND GENERALS.

BY HON. J. T. HEADLEY,

Author of "Washington and his Generals," etc., etc., with numerous steel Portraits and Battle Scenes, comprising Popular Biographies of the prominent Generals who brought to a triumphant close the great Rebellion, including graphic descriptions of

BATTLES, SIEGES, ADVENTURES, ETC.

SOLD ONLY BY AGENTS.—To returned and disabled Soldiers, and all seeking profitable employment, a rare chance is offered to make money.
For terms and territory, address at once, with stamp,

E. B. TREAT & CO., PUBLISHERS,
130 GRAND STREET, NEW YORK.

D. VAN NOSTRAND,

192 BROADWAY,

HAS RECENTLY PUBLISHED

TODLEBEN'S (GENERAL) HISTORY OF THE DEFENCE OF SEBASTOPOL.

1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $2 00.

GILLMORE'S FORT SUMTER. Official Reports of Operations against the Defences of Charleston Harbor, 1863. By Major-General Q. A. GILLMORE. 1 vol. 8vo, with 75 illustrations. Cloth, $10 00.

GILLMORE'S SIEGE AND REDUCTION OF FORT PULASKI, GEORGIA. By Major-General Q. A. GILLMORE. 1 vol. 8vo, with maps and illustrations. Cloth, $2 50.

 Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

AGENTS WANTED

FOR

THE STANDARD HISTORY OF THE WAR,

Complete in One Large Royal Octavo Volume of over 1,000 pages.
Splendidly Illustrated with 127 Fine Portraits of Generals and Battle Scenes.

This is just the book the people want. It presents a rare chance for agents. Teachers, ladies, energetic men, and especially returned and disabled officers and soldiers, in want of profitable employment, will find it peculiarly adapted to their condition. Send for circulars. Address

JONES, BROS. & CO.,
Philadelphia, Pa., and Cincinnati, O.

Books for Every Family Library.

CUDJO'S CAVE. A War Story. By J. T. Trowbridge. $2 00.
HAUNTED HEARTS. By the author of the "Lamplighter." $2 00.
NEIGHBOR JACKWOOD. $2 00.
MARTIN MERIVALE. By the author of "Neighbor Jackwood." $2 00.
THE THREE SCOUTS. A Story of the War. By author of "Cudjo's Cave." $1 75.
TYLNEY HALL. A Novel by Tom Hood. $2 50.
DORA DARLING, the Daughter of the Regiment. Illustrated. $1 50.
THE DRUMMER BOY. A War Story. $1 50.
THE LIFE BOAT. A Tale of Our Coast Heroes. $1 50.
DICK ONSLOW'S ADVENTURES AMONG THE REDSKINS. $1 50.
ANDY, THE TAILOR BOY. The Early Life of our President. $1 00.
THE LITTLE REBEL. (Plymouth Rock Series.) $1 00.
WILLARD PRIME. (Plymouth Rock Series.) $1 00.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price, by

J. E. TILTON & CO.,
PUBLISHERS, BOSTON.

Our illustrated catalogue sent by mail free on receipt of stamp to prepay postage.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER.

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen,
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

JUST PUBLISHED.

DAVID WOODBURN,

THE

MOUNTAIN MISSIONARY.

The scenes recorded in this volume have their unfolding in the wild and semi-civilized regions of the "Blue Ridge," in Western Virginia, and are a faithful record of individual experience.

"DAVID WOODBURN," as our author is pleased to call him, had his birth and home in these mountain seclusions, and the history and abounding labors of this untaught youth, who died at the early age of 27 years, form the main features of the work. While yet a rude and unlettered boy, he became a colporteur of the American Tract Society of New York for the "Mountains," and it is no exaggeration to say that the Society, in its widely extended and valuable labors, has never employed a worker of such tireless activity, or one on whom the divine blessing so manifestly rested. To give in this advertisement even a synopsis of his missionary toils and successes, would be to copy out the book itself. The publisher prefers to furnish the work in a handsomely bound and beautifully illustrated volume, at moderate cost, to those who are in sympathy with the noblest enterprise in which a Christian association can engage. Six illustrations. Price $1 25.

HENRY HOYT,
S. S. Publisher.

BABBITTONIAN PENMANSHIP.

"The Babbittonian system is cheap at four times its price."—Halifax Reporter.

"Superior to all other systems."—E. B. Rice, of the New York Custom House, and formerly Prof. of Penmanship at the State Normal School at Albany.

"It has already become famous."—N. Y. Dispatch.

"It is being ordered by the thousand at a time."—Cin. Gazette.

"The latest invention and the best. By its aid any one twelve years old may become a first-class penman without schools or teachers."—Christian Herald.

"Much more economical for school use than the twenty-cent copy-books, and must succeed."—Md. School Journal.

"Beautiful copies for practice."—Scientific American.

"The most beautiful and scientific of systems; worth $5 instead of $1 50."—Journal and Messenger.

"We think we do the public a favor by commending the beautiful system of Babbittonian Penmanship, which has the right and wrong forms of all writing so fully explained that the student may become a skilful penman without the aid of the living teacher."—Hodge's Journal of Finance.

The whole system, consisting of 92 copies, on card-board slips, illustrated by 60 Wood-cuts and a Chart, including Elements, Elementary Flourishes, Fine Hand, Capitals, Ladies' Styles, Business and Epistolary Forms, etc., sent, post-paid, for $1 50. 36 beautiful Babbittonian Pens sent for 50 cents; one gross for $1 50; or, 72 pens and the Penmanship for $2. Address

BABBITT & WILT, 67 Park Row, N. Y.

NEW ERA IN THE STUDY OF THE CLASSICS.

ALL THE LATIN PROSE REQUIRED FOR ENTERING COLLEGE IN ONE VOLUME.

A PREPARATORY LATIN PROSE BOOK,

CONTAINING

All the Latin Prose necessary for entering College, with references to Harkness's and Andrews and Stoddard's Latin Grammars; Notes, Critical and Explanatory; a Vocabulary, and a Geographical and Historical Index.

A NEW EDITION,

CONTAINING, IN ADDITION TO THE ABOVE,

A quantity of Easy Prose Selections, designed to supply the place of a Latin Reader; also, additional Prose Matter especially prepared for, and adapted to, the Introductory Course of Latin Prose at Harvard University.

Thirteenth Edition, Enlarged and Improved.

By J. H. HANSON, A.M.,
Principal of the Waterville Classical Institute,
12mo, pp. 900, price $3 00.

Probably no work has for a long time been issued which has so completely met the wants of students as this happily-conceived volume of Mr. Hanson—comprising in one book all the Latin Prose required for entrance into any of our Colleges; the Text, the most approved; References, to the two best Grammars in use; Notes, brief and to the point, giving aid where it is needed, and yet not doing the pupil's work for him; a full Vocabulary, with other great merits. It has received the approval of a large number of eminent professors and teachers, and has been introduced into many of our best schools and colleges.

PRESIDENT CHAMPLIN, of Waterville College, pronounces it "a work of great merit. . . . The book cannot fail of being favorably received by classical teachers."

And S. H. TAYLOR, Principal of Phillips Academy—high authority in everything pertaining to the subject—says: "No book of the kind has appeared which is better adapted to lay the right foundation for a thorough knowledge of the Latin language."

COMPANION TO HANSON'S LATIN PROSE BOOK.

A HANDBOOK OF LATIN POETRY,

FOR THE USE OF SCHOOLS AND ACADEMIES,

Containing Selections from Virgil, Ovid, and Horace; with Notes, critical and explanatory, and References to Harkness's and Andrews and Stoddard's Latin Grammars.

By J. H. HANSON, A.M.,
Principal of the Waterville Classical Institute,
and
W. J. ROLFE, A.M.,
Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass.

READY EARLY IN SEPTEMBER.
12mo, price $3 00.

Shortly after the publication of the "Preparatory Latin Prose Book," the author and publishers of that work began to receive requests from teachers in different parts of the country that a book of Latin poetry on the same plan might be prepared. The "Handbook of Latin Poetry" is the result of an effort to meet this popular demand.

The book comprises—from Virgil the first six Books of the Æneid, the first two Books of the Georgics, and six of the Eclogues; from Ovid, twenty-five Mythological Tales from the Metamorphoses; from Horace, more than fifty of the Odes, the Carmen Sæculare, five of the Satires, seven of the Epistles, and the Ars Poetica.

The Selections from Virgil include more than is required for admission to most of the colleges in the country; and the Selections from Ovid and Horace, both in quantity and quality, are a full equivalent for the omitted portions of Virgil.

For Female Seminaries and Colleges, it is believed that the book will meet a want which has long been widely felt.

 Attention is respectfully requested to this valuable series, which, from its convenience, value, and economy, deserves careful examination.

Specimen copies furnished on receipt of one half the price.

CROSBY & AINSWORTH, Publishers,
117 Washington Street, Boston.

WEBSTER'S NEW DICTIONARY.

WITH 3,000 ILLUSTRATIONS.

GREATEST ADDITION TO PHILOLOGY IN HALF A CENTURY.—The most important contribution to Philology, during the year 1864, was the publication of the illustrated edition of Webster's Quarto Unabridged Dictionary. This work, which had long been in preparation, and on the revision of which years of labor had been bestowed by several eminent scholars, was, in many respects, the greatest addition to the philology of the present age which has appeared within half a century.—Appleton's Cyclopædia for 1864.

MORE VALUABLE THAN TREASURY NOTES.—How that old cynic, Sam. Johnson, would have revelled through Webster's massive new Unabridged! How he would have gloated over its magnificent letter-press and its illustrations, beautiful as new Treasury notes, and much more valuable to the student. The Merriams have incurred a fabulous expense in having the whole work rewritten, reset, recast, and republished. It is not a mere revision, but a reconstruction. To insure excellence in typography, it comes from the Riverside Press, which is all that need be said about its mechanical execution. It is a marvellous specimen of learning, labor, research, and taste. It is by far the greatest literary work of the age.—Baltimore American.

Published by G. & C. MERRIAM, Springfield, Mass.

SOLD BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.

REV. DR. HEDGE'S NEW BOOK,

"REASON IN RELIGION."

"It is a luscious book—fresh, sweet, and timely. It is a profound, acute, and lofty book. . . . It meets a great want, fills a high place, occupies a long unoccupied niche in the Pantheon of books that are for the enlightenment and nourishing of the groping and famishing. . . . It is a most hopeful and healthful, as well as elegant and brilliant, book."—Chicago Journal.

Sent free by mail, on receipt of $2 00.

LIFE OF HORACE MANN. 8vo. $3 00.

"It is a sterling biography, which no educated American can afford not to read. It is only partial praise to call the book deeply interesting. It vivifies and inspires."—Atlantic Monthly.

THE PRESIDENT'S WORDS. Being Memorable Sentences from the Addresses, Speeches, and other Writings of Abraham Lincoln. Edited by Rev. E. E. Hale. 16mo. Bevelled boards, gilt top, $1 25.

10,000 of each of these books should be sold before January 1.

WALKER, FULLER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS, BOSTON.

THE NATIONAL SERIES
OF
STANDARD SCHOOL-BOOKS

INCLUDES, AMONG UPWARDS OF THREE HUNDRED VOLUMES OF STANDARD EDUCATIONAL WORKS,

THE FOLLOWING:

National Pictorial Primer. Parker & Watson.
National Series of Sch. Readers. 5 Nos.
Sherwood's Writing Speller Series. 4 Nos.
Smith's Sch. Spellers and Definers. 4 Nos.
Wright's Analytical Orthography.
Northend's Dictation Exercises.
Davies' New Series of Arithmetics. 5 Nos.
Davies' New Series of Algebras. 3 Nos.
Davies' Higher Mathematics—a complete course.
Monteith & McNally's Sch. Geographies. 5 Nos.
Clark's Diagram System of English Grammar. 2 Nos.
Beers' System of Penmanship. 12 Nos.
Self-instructing Writing Books. 3 Nos.
Willard's American & Universal Histories.
Berard's History of England.
Monteith's History of United States.
Hanna's Bible History.
Boyd's Annotated British Poets. 5 Vols.
Northend's School Speakers. 3 Nos.
Raymond's Patriotic Speaker.
Smith & Martin's Book-keeping.
Watts on the Mind.
Boyd's Composition and Logic.
Kames' Elements of Criticism.
Day's Art of Rhetoric.
Beers' Geographical Drawing-Book.
Norton & Porter's First Book of Science.
Peck's Ganot's Natural Philosophy.
Porter's School Chemistries. 2 Nos.
Wood's Botanical Text-Books. 2 Nos.
Emmons' Manual of Geology.
Chambers' Elements of Zoology.
Jarvis' Text-Books in Anatomy.
Hamilton's Vegetable and Animal Physiology.
Mansfield's Political Manual.
Pujol & Van Norman's French Class-Book.
De Torno's Spanish Grammar.
Brooks' Annotated Greek and Latin Texts.
Dwight's Heathen Mythology.
Brooks', Tracy's & Carter's Sch. Records.
Marcy's Eureka Alphabet Tablet.
Scofield's National School Tablets.
Brooks' School Manual of Devotion.
The School-Boy's Infantry Tactics.

THE SCHOOL TEACHER'S LIBRARY,

IN TWENTY-THREE VOLUMES,

INCLUDING PAGE'S "THEORY AND PRACTICE OF TEACHING," HOLBROOK'S "NORMAL METHODS OF TEACHING," AND KINDRED WORKS.

Teachers, and others interested in the selection of Text-books, are invited to send to the publishers for their Illustrated Descriptive Catalogue, where may be found detailed descriptions of all their issues.

BARNES & BURR, EDUCATIONAL PUBLISHERS,
51, 53, AND 55 JOHN STREET, NEW YORK.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

OUR MARTYR PRESIDENT.

Now Ready, Price $2,

AGENTS WANTED.

STIER'S WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

HEARTHSTONE SERIES.

SCHÖNBERG-COTTA WORKS.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL BOOKS.

A complete library can be made up from our stock, which includes the lists of all the societies of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.

Terms as low as can be had of the publishing houses.

BOOKS FOR SALE BY

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

STIER'S WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS,	BARNES' NOTES,
LANGE'S COMMENTARY ON MATTHEW,	BUSH'S "
KNAPP'S CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY,	JACOBUS' "
MCKNIGHT ON THE EPISTLES,	EDWARDS' WORKS,
HOME'S INTRODUCTION,	WOODS' "
ALEXANDER'S COMMENTARY,	KITTO'S "
HODGE'S "	SHEDD'S CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE,
OLSHAUSEN'S "	SCHAFF'S CHURCH HISTORY,
HENRY'S "	MOSHEIM'S " "
BENSON'S "	EUSEBIUS' " "
CLARK'S "

Also, a great variety of Theological Works, Sermons, etc. A liberal discount to ministers.

TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 PARK ROW, New York.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE daily papers—but too happy to secure "items" in the prevailing dulness of early autumn—have chronicled, with more detail than the public care for, the progress of the Publishers and Booksellers' New York Trade Sale during the past week. It was successful in every point, and certifies to the existence of a healthy state of activity in the book trade, stimulated by the demand for school-books and other staple wares of the business from quarters that had been for the past three or four years debarred from their customary supplies. It must not be thought, however, that the transactions of the ordinary channels for the supply of books represent the entire movements directed to that end. Unprecedented events have led to extraordinary consequences. True to the sound instincts that carried them triumphantly through the recent struggle for national life, the great mass of the people will read about nothing but the War, and matter of that kind they will have. The regular trade organization proves quite inadequate to the demand, and consequently the canvassing or agency business has sprung at once to gigantic proportions. Probably not one-third of the books bought this year are procured at the stores. They are supplied by agents, who traverse, subscription-book in hand, every county and town of the Northern, Eastern, and Western States, leaving scarcely a lonely farm-house unvisited, and everywhere meeting with customers who eagerly engage to take the books, which it will require months, if not years, to manufacture in quantities sufficient to meet the demand. The American skill in management is conspicuous in the arrangement of this business, now developed into a complete system. It well deserves to find a historian, as the Express enterprise and other branches of American industry have done. It comprises two distinct divisions. The chief field of the canvasser who offers books in portions, issued periodically, called "the number business," is at the centres of population, where men are congregated in large masses, as at foundries, shipyards, machine shops, etc., where the stated publications are easily supplied to them. The agent for complete works—usually in one volume, and rarely selling for less than five dollars—has his county or State district allotted to him, and starts off to canvass it, reporting his success to headquarters every day. It is a feature of the system that an agent must only have one book to get subscribers for, and that the books so subscribed shall not be purchasable at the stores. A manual of private directions, showing no inconsiderable knowledge of human nature, is furnished to agents, teaching them how objections should be parried, etc., and in what way the various classes of people may be approached with the best chance of success. The results of this system are visible in the sale of books in quantities totally unprecedented—such, indeed, as cannot be specified without appearance of exaggeration. We may mention one instance, however, where contracts are said to have been made by one house for the production of one thousand octavo volumes per day of two works, only, for a whole year. Several of the histories of the war are known to have sold each to the extent of nearly two hundred thousand copies. The public are said on good authority to have devoured a quarter of a million volumes of the adventures of a rather hard-featured lady (if the portrait does her justice), whose name we forget, but who desires to go down to posterity as "The Nurse and Spy." "Lives of Abraham Lincoln," "Sufferings of Northern Prisoners at Richmond," and, in short, every work of the kind, shares in the general demand. It should not be supposed that the books got up for this emergency are all of a slight or temporary description. The pecuniary returns are now so great that the best authors find it impossible to resist the offers that would lure them to this new field of labor, and many works of sterling excellence are so produced, as the "History of the Rebellion" by Horace Greeley, Hon. H. J. Raymond's "Life and Speeches of President Lincoln," Colonel Bowman's "History of Sherman's Expedition," Swinton's "Campaigns of the Army of the Potomac," J. T. Headley's "Grant and Sherman's Campaigns," etc.

—A chief novelty of Messrs. D. Appleton & Co.'s fall list of publications is one that will be sure to meet with notice and criticism. It is entitled "The Last Six Months of my Administration, by James Buchanan, Ex-President of the United States." Mr. Buchanan does well to become his own historian, or rather to put on record his own version of the facts that give importance to a period so momentous in our annals. In the last century, scarcely a minister or statesman of eminence died who was not furnished with a posthumous autobiography or "testament politique" from Holland, the great literary workshop of the day, and many still survive in a state of dubious authenticity. Though the time for apocryphal or spurious works is past, the chief actor in circumstances of great gravity and delicacy must always have much to record that escapes the general knowledge and furnishes the soundest materials for history.

—Some interesting facts on language were communicated at the last meeting of the American Philosophical Society of Philadelphia by Mr. P. E. Chase. His object was to discover the comparative capacity of languages for musical expression. For this purpose he investigated Italian, French, German, and English, by selecting the principal poets in each language, and ascertaining the number of sounds of each description in 10,000 syllables. The result is that English has the greatest number of distinct sounds, and Italian the least. Italian is the richest in vowels and liquids, German in nasals and gutturals, French in sibilants and labials, and English in dentals. In the expression of a given number of ideas, German uses the greatest number of sounds, and French the least.

—The labors of the American missionaries, and particularly Rev. Wm. Andrews, of Honolulu, have reduced the Hawaiian language, spoken in the Sandwich Islands, to a Dictionary, comprising a vocabulary of remarkable richness for an uncultured people. It includes about 15,500 words, nearly the same number, it has been observed, that is contained in Dr. Johnson's English dictionary. The simplicity of structure exemplified in the Polynesian languages, and their relations with the Malay and other widely spread Asiatic tongues, have lately engaged the attention of philologists. Mr. Andrews's work is the most elaborate production yet devoted to their elucidation.

—The origin of the modern stage from the "Mysteries" and "Moralities" of the Middle Ages is pleasantly recounted in Mr. Grant White's sketch of the Rise and Progress of the English Drama prefixed to his new volume on Shakespeare. The extracts from these rare and curious productions show how strangely Scripture scenes and characters were travestied to adapt them to the ideas of a rude age. Yet, singular to say, we find the same subjects now the great source of attraction at Paris, the theatrical capital of the world, so regular is the revolving cycle of popular taste, which moves in fixed grooves, and seems to return to first principles in accordance with a tendency to end where it began. In France the love of Biblical spectacles recurs every now and then. Readers of Thomas Moore's "Fudge Family" will remember his description of "Susannah and the Elders," and how Madame Begrand, the actress who then shone in the Scriptural path "as lovely Susannah," came out of the bath in a costume more natural than elaborate. The reigning entertainment now is "The Universal Deluge," in five acts and six tableaux, at the Theatre du Chatelet, lasting six hours and ending with a gorgeous rainbow scene. The costumes and all the appointments are said to be wonderfully correct (?) and unquestionably splendid. There is a sacred ballet of the priests and priestesses of Baal, with a procession of the emblems of his worship, compounded of all the wildest extravagances of the Bayaderes and dancing dervishes; and a second ballet, characteristically described by a French critic, who says "it seems as if Madame de Pompadour was giving a ball to Shem, Ham, and Japhet." In this piece mechanical ingenuity has solved the problem of giving a deluge without any water, rain being represented very cleverly by ranges of bright metal wires, upon which electric light is flashed intermittently. At the Gaîté "Paradise Lost" is brought out as a rival spectacle, and displays in an equally remarkable manner the resources of the French costumiers and theatrical artists.

—The solid and substantial class of books usually chosen for publication by Messrs. Scribner & Co. receives some important additions in their new list of announcements for the fall season, just issued. Their edition of Froude's "History of England" will be continued by the issue of Volumes 3 and 4, completing the first Reformation period, and bringing down the narrative to the death of King Henry VIII. Froude's History, we are glad to hear, is rapidly gaining readers; there is a depth of research about it rarely found in combination with so much spirit and vivacity. Prof. Agassiz's "Structure of Animal Life" has been already mentioned. The other new books forthcoming are "History of Rationalism, embracing a survey of the present state of Protestant Theology," by Rev. John F. Hurst. This book reviews in detail the remarkable intellectual movement whose development characterizes our own era, from its first recorded traces more than two centuries ago. The author has studied in Germany, and has made himself familiar with the entire literature of the topic he discusses, in all the European languages. His book promises to be an important contribution to the history of ideas, and their influence on society and the individual. It will form one volume octavo. Another work bearing equally a relation to modern controversies, though viewed from another stand-point, is "Essays on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity," with special reference to the theories of Renan, Strauss, and the Tübingen school of divines headed by Dr.

Baur, by Prof. George P. Fisher, who fills the chair of ecclesiastical history at Yale College. It will contain a critical examination of the various naturalistic explanations offered to account for the marvels of the Gospel history, and a vindication of the genuineness and credibility of the New Testament historical books. Dr. Horace Bushnell's new work, "The Vicarious Sacrifice, grounded on Principles of Universal Obligation;" Prof. Botta's "Dante as Philosopher, Patriot, and Poet," including an analysis of the Divina Commedia, its plot and episodes; and of a lighter character, Timothy Titcomb's "Plain Talk on Familiar Subjects," by the ever popular Dr. J. G. Holland, are the most important original works in preparation by the firm. The reprints and new editions include Lord Derby's "Homer," with his final revision; Dr. J. Addison Alexander's large version of and commentary on "The Prophecies of Isaiah;" a university edition of "The Fœderalist;" and Duyckinck's "Cyclopedia of American Literature," with continuation to the present time.

—Though science and literature have both losses to record in the obituary annals of the month, the death of Sir William Jackson Hooker, the distinguished botanist, is unquestionably the most important deprivation that the natural sciences have recently sustained. In devotion to his favorite pursuits and the successful prosecution of them, he may be called a model man—emphatically "the right person in the right place." Of independent means, which enabled him to gratify, by extensive travel, the taste for natural history developed at the earliest age, the whole field of animated nature at first attracted him. The accidental discovery of a rare moss, and the example of a fellow-townsman of Norwich, Sir J. E. Smith, made a botanist of him, and to this special study the energies of a long and active life (he had just completed his eightieth year) were consecrated. A professorship of botany at the University of Glasgow occupied him for the twenty years between 1820 and 1840, during which time he was knighted by King William IV. In 1841, his appointment as Director of the Royal Botanical Gardens at Kew placed him in a position most congenial to his feelings, and led to the splendid results that are familiar to most visitors of London and the attractions in its vicinity. Two hundred and seventy acres laid out with wonderful skill and judgment; magnificent ranges of hot-houses and conservatories such as no three establishments on the Continent put together can equal; an unrivalled herbarium; three museums of vegetable products, etc., filled with objects of interest from all parts of the globe; and excellent botanical libraries, are the chief features of an institution of truly regal proportions of which Sir W. Hooker might claim to be the instigator and promoter, to whose personal influence and supervision its present state of efficiency is entirely owing. The perfection of this vast establishment placed him at the head of the practical botanists of Europe. More than fifty published volumes of descriptive botany, many of them of the most costly illustrated description, attest the extent of his labors in the theoretical portion of the science. At the day of his death, he had just issued the first part of a new work, "Synopsis Filicum." He was distinguished by a handsome presence and a genial and urbane temperament. He was fortunate in all his family relations, and never knew a moment of ennui or tedium in the whole of his happy and well-spent life.

—Two other men, each of eminence in their respective branches of study, are included in the list of recent deaths in England. Mr. Hugh Cuming was known throughout Europe and America, wherever conchology was investigated, as the possessor of absolutely the most extensive and finest collection of shells ever brought together. He was in early life in mercantile business in South America, but gave up commerce for natural science. In his own yacht, expressly fitted for the purpose, he ransacked the seas and shores of the Pacific coasts of America and of Asia and its islands. His travels extended through many years; and he reached Europe with a richer freight of natural productions then had ever before been assembled by one man. Conchology had been his chief pursuit, but one of his incidental collections—that of dried plants—numbered 130,000 specimens. These, with his birds, reptiles, insects, etc., were all distributed among museums at home and abroad. The arrangement of his collection of shells found him in occupation for the remainder of his life, and it formed a mine which scientific men of all countries have worked without exhausting its treasures. Thirty thousand species are fully represented in it, mostly by numerous specimens of each. It fills a large house in London, and will in all probability be secured for the British Museum. Dr. Freeman Daniell, who died on June 28, at Southampton, had been engaged in the medical service of the British army, in most of the tropical climates of Africa, the West Indies, and the East. His writings on medical topography are numerous and valuable, and his botanical studies added much to a knowledge of the tropical flora. The frankincense tree is named Daniella after him.

—Mr. John Payne Collier, the veteran literary antiquary, has just completed a reprint, limited to fifty copies, of the rare early edition of Tottel's "Miscellany of Songs and Sonnettes" (1557), printed in the reign of Henry VIII., and containing the first impression of the poems of Lord Surrey, Sir Thomas Wyatt, and others. He is desirous of proceeding with similar reprints of the rare and unique volumes of poetical literature of the Elizabethan age, if subscribers enough come forward to secure him from loss, as his chief desire is to place beyond the reach of accident the matter that a chance fire, etc., might irretrievably destroy. The books he desires thus to perpetuate are "The Paradise of Dainty Devices," from a unique copy containing poems by Lords Vere and Oxford, Churchyard, Edwards, Hunnis, etc., which were omitted in the later edition that was followed in the reprint of 1810; "The Gorgeous Gallery of Gallant Inventions," 1578; "The Phœnix Nest," 1593; "England's Helicon," in which nearly all the poets prior to the year 1600 figure more or less prominently, including Shakespeare, Marlowe. Lodge, Greene, Peele, etc.; and Davison's "Poetical Rhapsody," 1602.

CHRISTIAN'S MISTAKE.*

This book is so good that it ought to be better. There is some good thought in it, and much good feeling; but it is throughout divided against itself by an inconsistency and reckless incoherency fatal to the illusion which it is the business of the novelist to produce, and reminding us from beginning to end that the author is telling stories.

Against this defect there are two safeguards: one is great genius, and the other great industry. Shakespeare probably found no more difficulty in avoiding the introduction of anomalies into the character, than Mrs. Siddons found in refraining from cutting the capers of Fanny Elssler in her performance of the part, of Lady Macbeth. But what the great masters and mistresses in literature do, and are preserved from doing—we suppose by the force of their over-mastering conceptions—the little masters and mistresses must do and leave undone, if at all, by dint of most painstaking and minute attention to correctness of detail. At least so much as this a novel-reading public has a right to expect of a novel writer who has had so much practice upon it as the author of "The Ogilvies," "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Life for a Life," "The Head of the Family," "Olive," "Mistress and Maid," "Agatha's Husband," "One Year," and—legion.

But though Christian herself is a lovely creature—thus much we can discern—in beauty of person, carriage, voice, and disposition, and is a great improvement on some of her swarthy and passionate predecessors, as to most other facts about and around her we are "lost in a field." What was her (worst) "mistake?" and ought not the title of the book to run in the plural, "Christian's Mistakes," or simply, "Mistakes by the author?" etc., etc.

If we understand her, she means to represent her heroine as a person of sweet and calm dignity and self-possession. The natural effect of such qualities, in real life, surely is to prevent and to disarm insolence. Yet Miss Gascoigne habitually insults Christian; Phillis and Susan Bennett browbeat Christian; Barker snubs Christian; and the shocking little witch, "Titia," taunts Christian. Further, if we understand her, the author means to represent Christian as a woman of truth. Yet we are first told of her making Dr. Gray, at his request, this promise: "Whatever goes wrong, you will always come at once and tell it to me," and, soon after, of her sitting "still to see that saddest of all sights to a tender heart, children (Dr. Gray's) slowly ruined, exasperated by injustice, embittered by punishment, (and) made deceitful or cowardly by continual fear" of a pugilistic nursery-maid.

As to Christian's husband, we are informed, on page 6, of the grave and formal politeness which was his natural manner, but which always somewhat awed Mrs. Ferguson, and on page 78 of his feeling and appearing "at home in any company, (having) a pleasant word or smile for everybody, (and being) in short, a frank, kindly, natural gentleman."

The terrible sister-in-law, Miss Gascoigne, who is "perhaps moved and softened and brought to a better mind," and without loss of time "hard and bitter," is besides affirmed to be "unexceptionably-mannered." Now people of (conventionally) perfect manners may deal abundantly in subtle inuendo and fine-edged sarcasm; but they do not scold. They may point the finger of scorn; but they do not smite with the fist of iniquity. Neither do they say "trapesing." Moreover, the symmetry of artistic probability is violated by the introduction of a pair of such termagants as the aunt and the nurse into the same plot. One would be enough, if not more than enough. Two are too many.

"Atty lost his selfish roughness for the hour (he) spent with (his) father;"

* "Christian's Mistake. By the author of 'John Halifax, Gentleman,' etc., etc." New York: Harper & Brothers.

but, as he "rarely spoke except to say something rude," we are driven to reconcile the discrepancies of his conduct by conjecturing that "the atmosphere of that good, loving, fatherly nature" usually deprived him of the use of his tongue.

When Titia was "very humble, . . . there was a sullen look upon" her face; and her lips now and then opened 'to give vent to sharp, unchildlike speeches, so exceedingly like Aunt Henrietta's."

We could go on; but we think it unnecessary.

We find in this one, and not in this one only, of the author's performances reason to suppose them often inferior to her powers. For instance, in the first of the series, "The Ogilvies," what could have a finer tragic effect, and fit a neater keystone into a plot, than the joining of the hands of the future couple by the dying old man muttering, in his senile delirium, the words of the burial service, and the fulfilment of the omen long years after, by the death of the widow-bride while the funeral-bell is tolling her dismal marriage-peal? An artist, capable of one such stroke, ought to be capable of higher artistic success than our author reaches in any other work of hers with which we are familiar.

However, it is a great success—if not of one kind, of another—to gratify so large a number of readers as she does, in these days of "sensation," without any appeal to the fiendish sensations, and to preserve as she does, in these days of æsthetics, the godlike knowledge of the difference between good and evil. Her words do not become household words with us. Perhaps her characters are seldom strong enough to get much hold on the characters or minds of the living. They want projection. But while few authors in an age are able to give us a peep at their invisible world through the stereoscope, the microscope multiplies many small creatures into interest and beauty; and we trust that the author of "Christian's Mistake" will continue to use hers, and henceforth study accuracy in her observations.

Finally, her particular message to the world, if we have succeeded in abstracting it from her past and present publications, may be pretty nearly compressed into these three propositions: that it is highly imprudent, not to say deeply improper, to marry without a "grande passion;" that, having once been the subject of a "grande passion" for a worthy object, it is out of the question ever after to become the subject of another "grande passion" for another worthy object; and that children are to philoprogenitive persons a source of much rapture. Of which propositions, the first appears to us plausible; the second, improbable; and the third alone incontrovertible.

A NEW NOVEL.*

THE frequent wish for a good novel which we hear from intelligent people certainly implies that the market is not overstocked with that article. We should not like to risk our critical reputation on the assertion that the last dozen years have produced as many fictitious works which fully merit this title. A good novel is more than a good book; it is this, and much besides. It is anything but a good sermon, though, as Shakespeare says of some harder things, it may contain a better one than was preached in many a pulpit last Sunday. A good novel demands, in its creator, a blending of imaginative constructiveness and philosophical common sense and genial human-heartedness which is not very usual in literary or other circles. Miss Oliphant has some good points as a novelist—we shall gladly credit them to her account—but, at the chance of being charged with deficient gallantry, we venture to think that her genius, however unquestionable, is not the kind of genius requisite for the production of a good novel of the best variety. Meanwhile, what of "A Son of the Soil?"

Colin Campbell is a Scotch lad, who makes his way from the shores of his native Loch Lomond to one of the pulpits of his national kirk, gathering up on the road the highest honors of Glasgow and Oxford scholarship. This would contain but little romance in itself. But the poor farmer's son rather oddly saves twice from drowning the youthful heir of an English aristocrat. This complication with the family of a wealthy baronet involves the son of the soil in a fruitless flirtation first with the baronet's niece, Miss Matty Frankland, on whom the handsome, manly, brilliant young Scot made considerably less impression than she did on him; and the second rescue from drowning threw young Campbell into a dying sickness that sent him to Italy for health, where he found another affair of the heart, which eventually, and after much not over-smooth running, grew from pity into affection, and from this into wedlock. The whole thing is contemporary, and the Rev. Colin Campbell may be considered at the present time as preaching from the tall pulpit of his church in the ancient kingdom of Fife.

This is the skeleton of the story, but like most skeletons it gives little idea of the living creation. The author's purpose is to show the way in which a high-spirited, self-willed, poetical, fantastic, yet uncommonly talented young man (we use the italicized word with a mental protest) was headed off and finally subdued into a tolerably regular specimen of a Christian man and Presbyterian minister. We put it thus carefully, for the incumbent of Lafton bears but small resemblance to the typical "seminary student," either in theological opinions or external bearing. He reminds us much more of some half-trimmed Broad Church gymnasts whom we have known, quite free to indulge in a fast drive alike over the doctrinal or the literal trotting course—whether in lawn or broadcloth makes not material difference.

Miss Oliphant's readers will acquaint themselves with the route which her hero travelled from the west to the east side of Scotland, making a half year's stop in Rome, besides the longer English detentions of its winding way. Love affair the first is a curious study in the art of coquetry, evincing a shrewd knowledge of the female heart, or what in Miss Matty Frankland supplied its place—unfolding, too, a degree of young, manly folly, which we cannot say is exaggerated, though really prodigious to contemplate. We should pity this victim of bright eyes and shallow smiles, only that we see he is getting his education in a science which the university does not teach. The sickness which follows his midnight plunge into the canal after Sir Thomas's heir is a different discipline, the weariness of those weeks of battling with death, their solemn self-communings and revelations, the wrestlings of a young soul, so full of life, with the mysteries of the world around it and before it, and all this the pivot on which another human history is swinging round to a new issue. The author has room for her best handling upon these materials, and she shows great power and insight in these chapters. Some deep philosophy and much "awfu'" questioning of what philosophy has no key to unlock, fill up the conversations of the sick man and his friend Lauderdale. This Lauderdale is the gem of the book. He has been Colin's protecting genius from the day when the elder student helped the younger through his first college fight at Glasgow. Lauderdale is almost twice as old as Colin, a fabulously tall, gaunt son of the land o' cakes; a solitary, speculative, believing, yet skeptical Christian man, gentle, strong, dreamy, faithful to the core. He is Colin's fidus Achates to the end, simple-hearted as a child, yet ruggedly masculine in intellect; a mixture, if such a thing could be, of Edward Irving and Thomas Carlyle. He never tires us; we never exhaust him. Sometimes he is foggy, but never conceited. "The unwedded, childless man was at once young and old, and had kept in his heart a virgin freshness more visionary, and perhaps even more spotless, than that of Colin's untarnished youth." The two, so unlike yet so indivisible, are an admirable foil to each other.

We question the author's intelligence or fairness if Arthur Meredith is intended as an average sample of an educated, evangelically religious man. We hardly think he is so put forward, while we have a doubt whether the writer precisely knew of what she designed to make him the representative. He is the brother of Campbell's future wife. They meet on the Mediterranean going to Italy for health—he to die. That Frascati episode is tender, painful, almost tragic. Out of it grows a marriage of sympathy, honor, and affection—never of highest love on the husband's side, though heartily this on the wife's. Here we reach not very solid ground. Campbell fulfils, after a four years' engagement, the promise which compassion for Alice Meredith's orphaned loneliness wrung from him over her brother's grave. Of course, he should redeem his pledge. Nor is it very strange that he should have given it. But to compel one's self to marry without is, to say the least, rather a novel winding-up of a modern romance. They appear to be getting on as comfortably as could be expected in the circumstances; but we are not ready to say "so be it" to the final sentence of the book: "A man can live without that last climax of existence, when everything else is going on well in life." Really, that sounds too French for our taste. Has the author any marriageable cousins slightly passées? She evidently does not live in "A New Atmosphere."

> "—— the love
> Of men and women when they love the best,"

The author's familiar knowledge of Scottish life gives a fine vividness and truth to her pictures of scenery and of the traits of the people. The narrative moves vigorously on with a sustained force, sparkling ever and anon with a ripple of quiet humor. The fluster of a well-to-do Scotch parish on receiving and trying its new candidate for pulpit honors is particularly well described. Our friend Lauderdale's definition of "democracy" will not suit all the popular sovereigns, but it is sharp, if not sound: "Democracy means naething else, as far as I'm informed, but the reign of them that kens the least and skreighs the loudest."

* "A Son of the Soil." A Novel. New York: Harper & Bros. 1865.

PEGASUS IN TRACES.*

THE modesty of the suggestive "etc., etc.," mentioned on the title-page of Mr. Duganne's book is amply atoned for at its close. Here the veil of mystery which surrounds that curt epitome is lifted, and we are allowed to discover that "The Tenant House; or, Embers from Poverty's Hearthstone," by the same author, has been praised by no less than eighteen clergymen; that the "Poetical Works" of A. J. H. Duganne have also been published; that the same pen has given "Utterances ante Lucem" to the world; that "Battle Ballads," by A. J. H. Duganne, will be issued in the fall of the present year. Of this gentleman's prose we have gained some idea from the book before us; of his "Poetical Works" the editor of the "Beadle Dime Series" has the following opinion:

"Mr. Duganne is one of the master spirits of minstrelsy, whose song has stirred the great heart of man into a grand enthusiasm for the right, the free, and the good. His lyrics long have floated over the great sea of the press, like the argonaut Nautilé, bearing beauty and hope and a thought of heaven on their wings. His more elaborate poems stand as monuments of a mind pervaded by the true sublimity of the noblest masters of song. There is, in these elaborate compositions, a wealth of imagery, a boldness of conception, a presence of high thought, that mark Mr. Duganne for one of the most thoughtful and introspective poets of this country. It is with a grateful sense that we turn from them and their mighty thought to the love ballads and lyrical utterances, which give the volume variety and season it with sweets from which all can sip."

The story contained in "Camps and Prisons," so far as the personal adventures of the author are concerned, may be told in a few words. Col. Duganne, of a New York regiment—whose number he leaves doubtful, generally speaking of it as the "Ironsides"—finds himself, after the capture of Brashear City by the rebels, in command of Bayou Bœuf, cut off from all retreat, with an insignificant infantry force, four guns, and forty artillerists to defend them. Separated from his base, and thrown upon his own responsibility, he bravely determines to defend his position to the last. Measures are taken for an active resistance, rifle-pits are dug, gunners are posted, a store-house, to prevent its seizure by the enemy, is burnt; orders are sent to the officer defending a bridge in the front to hold his ground as long as possible—if there be danger of the enemy's flanking him, to burn the bridge and fall back to Bayou Bœuf. The enemy draws near, Captain Hopkins burns the bridge and retires; a council of war is called—the place is surrendered, Col. Duganne unbuckles his sword, and spends thirteen months as a prisoner in Texas. These incidents, together with an account of affairs in the department of the Gulf which took place between the time of his arrival and his capture, his life in prison, and descriptions of various other matters in which he had no share whatever, make up a total of more than four hundred pages. What were the sources of information with regard to events of which he had no personal knowledge, he tells his readers in an introduction: "Personal statements and actual observations have alone furnished material for the book." Under these circumstances the sceptical reader will perhaps hesitate before placing implicit confidence in the "personal statements" contained in chapters detailing at length the capture of Brashear City, the surrender of Galveston, the fights at Sabine Pass; indeed the exact value of "the personal statements" referred to by Mr. Duganne, becomes more apparent when he gives his own (p. 261) description of them in the following manner: "From log-books of naval officer, from yarns of man-of-wars-man, from recital of service-striped sergeant, I became possessed of truer information regarding this" (the second affair at Sabine Pass), "as well as other affairs, than I could have gained out of all the red-tape documents at headquarters."

Mr. Duganne is a poet, and his mind seems to have vacillated between the idea of making his "twenty months" a prose narrative and that of sending his story on its way in the form of an epic. The former prevailed; but occasionally the muse displays herself in an unexpected fashion, and blank verse, printed prosaically, is the result; the effect is sometimes peculiar. On page 60 we have the following sonorous passage:

"Some said this worthy skipper's steamboat-house not only owned two flag-staffs, but possessed two flags to hoist upon them as occasion might demand. However this may be, no bunting flew from them but stars and stripes while I abode in Tigerville."

How smoothly this runs into verse!—

> "Some said this worthy skipper's steamboat-house
> Not only owned two flag-staffs, but two flags
> To hoist upon them as need might demand.
> However this might be, no bunting flew
> From them but stars and stripes while I abode
> In Tigerville."

Again:—

"My quarters at Lafourche are in the old hotel; a ventilated building, whereof no door hath complement of hinges, and no window-frame can boast a tally of its panes."

A little change would make this perfect:—

> "Lafourche's old hotel doth quarters give;
> A ventilated building, where no door
> Hath complement of hinge, nor window-frame
> Can boast a tally of its panes."

We are tantalized in the same way throughout the book—and not only are we reminded of poetry by Mr. Duganne's prose, but of prose by his poetry. A striking instance of what may be done in this way, is to be found in the poem delivered on the 22d of February, in the Camp Ford prison.

But although the defects of this book are more prominent than its merits, there are parts of it which are well worth reading. A genuine sympathy for the negro, and a true love of democratic principles, led Mr. Duganne to observe with some attention the state of society into which he was thrown, and the attempt by General Banks to remedy its evils by the introduction of the "free-labor system." His conclusions were practically those which the whole country have at length arrived at—that the Irish bull has a practical as well as verbal existence in "compulsory free-labor." A servant who cannot choose his master is indeed a slave, and General Banks, whatever his intentions, was engaged in enslaving freemen, when he ought to have been freeing slaves.

Again, Mr. Duganne describes life in prison excellently—while, since "actual observations" and not "personal statements" have "furnished material," more reliance may be placed on the facts told in a chapter like that called "A Day at Camp Ford" than those contained in some before spoken of. On the whole, however, there seems to be no reason why this book should have been written; if the author had seen a great deal of service, or if, without seeing much, he had been in a position to gather authentic information with regard to current events, his account of twenty months in any department would have been of interest and value; but, on the contrary, he saw no service, and was in just the situation where stories from all sources were least worthy of trust. If Mr. Duganne had put less confidence in "log-books of naval officer, yarns of man-of-wars-man," and "recital of service-striped sergeant," his life in Texas would have afforded the subject for a very entertaining magazine article; he has chosen instead to publish a book which is untrustworthy, and essentially made-up.

* "Camps and Prisons. Twenty Months in the Department of the Gulf. By A. J. H. Duganne, author of 'A History of Governments,' 'Footprints of Heroism,' 'War in Europe,' 'A Comprehensive Summary of History,' etc., etc." Second Edition. New York: J. P. Robens, publisher, 37 Park Row. 1865. 16mo, pp. 9-424.

THE TRUTH CONCERNING REBEL PRISONS.*

THERE are three great facts which place for ever beyond controversy the treatment of Union prisoners by their Confederate keepers, from the summer of '63 up to the close of the war. The subject is one which we would not lightly re-open, choosing rather that it should join the troop of horrors which must be dismissed to oblivion before we undertake to resume our friendly relations with the people of the South. But, as often happens, the partizans of a bad cause will not let it die; and on both sides of the Atlantic, in the New York Daily News and in the London Times, it is asserted unblushingly that the Confederate gaolers were not lacking in humanity, nor their victims in such consideration and care as were possible within the resources of the Confederacy. When an attempt like this—however bootless it is sure to be, and however certain to be refuted hereafter—is made to falsify history during the lifetime of those whose knowledge, having come through the most terrible suffering, is positive, or nothing is positive, the experience of the Roman historian is reversed, and men find it harder to be silent than to forget. Besides, the unwelcome theme is before the public in a legitimate way, in the trial of a conspicuous agent in the Confederate scheme of slaughter; and perhaps no better time could be selected for noticing the books which are named below than now, while the materials are gathering for a settled, unalterable conviction concerning the alleged barbarities.

The facts with which we began are these: the extraordinary mortality among the prisoners, for which we will accept the Confederate account as accurate; the bodily and mental condition of those who were at last exchanged; and the topography of the theatres of imprisonment; for which we have the testimony of eye-witnesses, susceptible, in the latter instance, of immediate confirmation by whoever wishes to inspect Belle Island or Andersonville. Whatever other data are added to these are clearly superfluous, and yet without the details the imagination would much fall short of the incredible reality. To the cloud of witnesses, both living and dead,

* "Nineteen Months a Prisoner of War. Narrative of Lieut. G. E. Sabre, 2d Rhode Island Cavalry, etc., etc." New York: American News Company. 1865.

"Diary of a Soldier and Prisoner of War in the Rebel Prisons. Written by Eugene Forbes, Serg. Co. B, 4th Regiment New Jersey Volunteers." Trenton: Murphy & Bechtel. 1865.

belong the heroes of the narratives before us, each incarcerated for a lengthy period, and both together affording a view of prison life in almost every part of the South.

What Lieutenant Sabre endured may be guessed from his statement that the most comfortable portion of his imprisonment was the six weeks he was forced to spend in Charleston under the Federal fire! He tested successively—after capture in Mississippi in July, 1863—the entertainment of Morton, Mobile, Atlanta, Richmond (Libby and Belle Island), Andersonville, Macon, Charleston, and Columbia. His observations have, therefore, a wide range, but are restricted in interest and importance to what he saw and underwent at the rebel capital and in Georgia. What a picture he presents of that desolate river island—low, wet, and flat; the camp in close proximity to the cemetery and the hospital, and in full view of them; no shelter provided, little possible otherwise; no drainage. Into these four acres are turned seven thousand men, stripped of their blankets, often of their most essential garments. The rations are vile and meagre, and with the approach of an unprecedented winter are reduced. A dog is torn in pieces for food. The most loathsome forms of sickness prevail. Men wander about insane. Yet the hospital is more dreaded than the camp. Forms not yet dead are laid out for burial. When the awful cold sets in, no burrowing is sufficient to procure warmth. They lie like animals in heaps. Of a night there will be from a score to fifty deaths. Frozen limbs and amputations are the order of the day. New-comers, almost naked, are turned in to certain death. For nine weeks in the three winter months not a load of wood is sent to the island. And all this time there is a "dead-line," and prisoners are shot recklessly that the guards may earn a furlough, or brutally punished with inquisitorial devices. In January, 1864, supplies of clothing come to them from the Christian Commission, and the moment they have been distributed the rations are cut down, nor will they be raised to the old standard until bought back with the identical supplies! At Andersonville there are bloodhounds to overtake, chains and balls to retain and punish, fugitives. The rations, if somewhat larger than at Belle Island, are irregular and mean. Malaria pervades the stockade from the marsh in its centre. Some become blind, others crazed. Those so unhappy as to have been vaccinated suffer the torments of the condemned from the impurities introduced into their systems.

More touching, even, than this story, which is told without resentment, is the diary of Sergeant Forbes, which is abruptly terminated by the deliverance of its author from every earthly privation. All roads lead to hell, said the ancients, and he found his way to Andersonville from the Wilderness, in May of last year. He corroborates all that is recorded by Lieutenant Sabre—the exposure to hot suns and chilly nights and pelting storms; the marvel of an occasional patient returning from the hospital; the insane, and the vaccinated with their flesh dropping from their bones. He, too, has to tell of the shooting indulged in by the guards, scarcely a night passing that a shot is not heard, often enough with fatal effect upon innocent victims. One soldier, tired of life, lies down deliberately beyond the "dead-line," and refuses to budge when warned, crying, "Do your duty, and get your furlough!" and is shot dead, of course. The sergeant is a posthumous witness in regard to Wirtz, who is first mentioned in the diary as having ordered two recaptured men to be hung; but Winder interferes. Next he appears, on the 29th of June, as aiding in the detection and surrender to the prisoners of certain "raiders" of their own number. Forbes writes: "He deserves great credit for his prompt action in the matter;" though, since the wretches were hung, as Wirtz well knew would be the case, his motives are not above suspicion. Afterwards, on the 14th of July, he harangued his captives, saying that "the rebel government was anxious to parole or exchange, but the Federal Government declined, because the time of so many of the men had expired." And to this cruel falsification he added,—let those take note who say our soldiers were starved as the Confederate soldiers were, and for the same reason,—that "he had plenty to feed them on for two years, if necessary." At the same time, he threatened to open upon the entire camp with grape and canister if a conspiracy for a general outbreak were detected; and to fire into any unusual group or crowd of men. No better than Andersonville was the pen near Charleston, to which Forbes was transferred for the last time. Here, also, men were starved and frozen, and the guards shot those who addressed them. Here, also, if a prisoner were absent from roll-call, the whole company was kept fasting until he was accounted for; here, that men might be induced to forswear their true allegiance and adopt the false, their hungry eyes were tantalized with the sight of bags of flour and shoulders of beef, which were not allowed to cross the stockade. And here, at last, the stout-hearted patriot succumbed to fatal disease.

Such are some of the proofs that the conduct of the Southern prisons was a wilful system of pillage, starvation, and murder, for ends, some o which, at least, were more subtle than the gratification of any man's cupidity or brutality. For our part, we are stirred less painfully by reading of the sufferings which this system produced than by the consequent effects upon the character of the sufferers, so that all sense of decency, all respect for private property and private rights, faith in each other and in the Government in whose service they had been captured, was lost. This is not to be imputed for blame to the inmates of the Southern inferno, but must be re torted directly upon the heartless authors of their infinite misery. That men went raving and grew helpless from hunger and exposure, and were covered with festering sores and ever-present vermin, and lay in their own ordure, and saw their limbs rot off, and fell beneath the infliction of intolerable punishments or by the more merciful bullet or single blow—is fearful, surely, to contemplate. But there is a further stage of degradation: as when one, driven to extremities, plucks an undigested morsel from the vomit of another; when men quarrel over bones for possession, or over a corpse for the privilege of carrying it out; when property is so insecure that even the lunatic is robbed of all that covers his nakedness, and bands of marauders do violence by night, compelling the camp to organize itself into a vigilance committee and inflict summary justice when the guilty parties are brought to light; when, lastly, to escape the pangs of such an existence, the Confederate yoke is assumed and the good cause abandoned by flesh not made for martyrdom. These last are the veritable objects of our pity. The constancy of the rest excites admiration and gratitude, and theirs, after all, is the sternest, loftiest heroism of the war.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Little Corporal is the title of a children's newspaper, published monthly, at Chicago, by Alfred L. Sewell. The editor exhibited, in a remarkable manner, his business capacity and his knowledge of "Young America" at the time of the Northwestern Sanitary Fair, for which he labored zealously, and netted by the day that it opened the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, raised by the exertions of the little folk of the country, whom he had marshalled into an army of agents. This pleasant experience seems to have suggested a continuance of the relation, and the new periodical is the result. It starts already with the air of an "institution," and is as choicely edited as it is printed. It means to be found "fighting against wrong, and for the good, the true, and the beautiful." Success to such warfare! The form is quarto, sixteen pages; the subscription price, one dollar.

The Oil Regions of Pennsylvania. Showing where petroleum is found, how it is obtained, and at what cost. With hints for whom it may concern. By William Wright. (Harper & Bros., New York.)—The author of this neatly printed volume traversed, chiefly on foot, the entire oil district of Pennsylvania, visiting every producing well, and making the most careful inquiries concerning facts. His observations and his report upon them are worthy of confidence, because, first, he went as the correspondent of the New York Times, and, through that paper, in the interest of the public; secondly, because he is a man of intelligence, knowing how to see and what to credit; and, thirdly, because he has instincts and principles superior to money-getting. In ten clearly-written chapters he discusses the physical features of the country, from a just understanding of geology; describes the climate and the people, where and how they sink their wells; treats of the curious phenomena of supply and failure, of obstacles and remedies; furnishes nominatim the statistics of production; explains the processes of refining; and candidly declares what is immoral in the speculations of Oildom, and what are the chances for an honest investment. The reader can hardly fail to place reliance upon the statements of Mr. Wright, which, for the rest, are attractively and often humorously dressed. He believes that oil is not confined, and has had in its deposit no possible relation, to existing river-systems—the results of erosion through a long series of years. The oil area might be indefinitely extended if boring were indifferent to the increase of depth. The temperature of the oil does not correspond with the accepted theory of the rate of elevation of the earth's temperature as we proceed from the surface. The general, not to say universal, experience is, that "wells yield much less freely in winter than in the summer season;" and a superintendent of one company "declares he can predict changes in the weather for twenty-four hours in advance, by observing the yield of his wells." The subterranean communication between adja cent wells is singularly capricious and uncertain. "In one case this was so intimate that the sounds made in drilling one, though not audible at its mouth, could be heard coming up the next well." Mr. Wright's advice seems sound and sensible.

Mexican Poetry. "Poetical Works of José Rivera y Rio" ("Obras Poeticas," etc.) Mexico. 1857.—Among the fifty distinguished Mexican exiles who occupied the platform at the meeting of respect and sympathy held for them on the 19th of July, at Cooper Institute, was a young gentleman who has already taken high rank as a scholar, jurist, statesman, patriot, soldier, and author of prose and poetry. Senor José Rivera y Rio was one of the four members of the Mexican Patriot Club chosen, by their votes, to prepare addresses for that occasion; and ably did he perform that task, as the pamphlet containing their speeches amply proves. Although only twenty-six years of age, he received a superior education, in the excellent colleges of the Mexican Republic, which were of a superior order and conducted on enlightened principles, until the intrusive Maximilian proposed to place them under the control of the retrograde priests. It should be known, to the honor of the Mexican Liberals, that they, like the Spanish-American patriots generally, have been intelligently and ardently devoted to national and universal education. Senor Rivera y Rio is a most creditable witness in favor of the Mexican Republican schools and colleges. He has published twelve or fifteen works, several of which illustrate Mexican manners and customs in a lively and accurate manner; and, as the people are very much diversified in race and origin, and the various climates and productions of the country are almost innumerable, we may expect a rich fund of instructive novelties in such of his volumes as it is proposed to publish in English. The volume of poetry whose title we have given is a handsome octavo of 300 pages, and contains about seventy-five pieces of various length, style, and metre, in which the Spanish language is displayed to great advantage in its peculiar traits of richness, force, and harmony; and some of which, composed at the tender age of sixteen or seventeen, afford us double pleasure by the youthful ardor, pure principles, and exalted patriotism which they express. It is very lamentable that the difference of language has thus far kept North Americans in profound ignorance of the character and condition of the Spanish-American republics. So powerful is fashion, that it is extremely rare to find one of our countrymen intimately acquainted with them and their fine language; but the time must come when the Mexicans, at least, will be better known to us, and one of the best means of introduction will be the reading of some of their best writings.

The Bulletin and Annals of the Maritime Council. ("Bolletim e Annaes do Conselho Maritimo.") Lisbon.—This official monthly quarto magazine of the Portuguese Government, which has now reached its hundredth number, contains a vast amount of information relating to the Portuguese colonies in all parts of the world, including numerous papers written in past ages, which have been long hidden in the archives, etc., from jealousy of foreign interference. It would require many pages to give even an outline of the different classes of documents contained in the numbers before us. Those relating to the Portuguese possessions in Southern Africa offer a surprising amount and variety of information. There are reports of governors and commissioners, journals of travellers, details of military operations, descriptive catalogues of plants, animals, and minerals; and minute accounts of the habits, manners, customs, etc., of various tribes of natives; with maps, plans, drawings, etc., etc., opening to view those extensive regions between the Atlantic and the Mozambique which Portugal has for centuries claimed, and from which she has excluded other nations. Within that broad belt Dr. Livingstone was allowed to pursue his course, to make known to the world much that before was known only to the Portuguese, and to discover some important facts of which even they were ignorant, especially that the Zambezi River, instead of being lost in the interior, turns northward, and is the same stream that flows eastward by their old town of Tete to the eastern coast.

Some of the documents in the "Bolletim e Annaes" relate to the evil effects of the Portuguese system of conducting their colonies, which several writers have forcibly exposed, together with cases of the oppressive, selfish, and immoral conduct of certain bishops who abused their power. Strange as it may appear, the English are held up as the model nation in the management of African colonies; and their humane, intelligent, and successful treatment of ignorant natives at Sierra Leone is recommended for imitation. Certain favorable traits of the negroes in the Portuguese possessions are occasionally exhibited in the "Bolletim," particularly their eagerness to engage in trade, and to transport ivory and other articles of traffic through deserts and forests, across mountains and rivers, for moderate pay. Some of the Portuguese traders, who have had experience in directing commercial operations among the interior tribes, have acquired much skill in arranging and conducting them, and displayed much ingenuity, enterprise, and boldness, and have succeeded in securing large profits in the end. The descriptions of the beauties of nature interspersed in many of the documents, are fascinating, and excite admiration; while occasional notices of exalted traits of character in the untutored natives lead the reader to wish that they might be reached by more able and worthy teachers than those who have thus far ever appeared among them from countries called civilized.

Geography of the Languages, and Ethnographic Chart of Mexico, preceded by an attempt to classify those languages, and hints on the immigration of the tribes. By the Licentiate Manuel Orozco y Berro. Mexico. 1864. ("Geografia de las Lenguas y Carta Etnografica de Mexico," etc.)—This work, a quarto of almost four hundred pages, and the accompanying chart of Mexico, presenting the numerous Indian tribes inhabiting different parts, has been many years in preparation, chiefly by compilation from the most esteemed publications at home and abroad. The author is a devotee to historical research, and intimates in his preface, in an affecting manner, that his life has been marked by misfortunes, though cheered, as he says, by the love of kind and intelligent parents and friends. The labor bestowed on the work was very great, and the collection of facts and opinions from numerous sources highly interesting, although he confesses that he has but little personal acquaintance with the manners, customs, or languages of the native races. The chart, which is the work of a friend, is original.

He says, in a general view of the languages in Mexico, that there appear to be eleven families of them, though perhaps this number may hereafter be reduced. These contain thirty-five idioms and sixty-nine dialects. Besides these, there are sixteen languages as yet unclassified, some of which may, perhaps, when better known, afford new families, or be assigned to those already distinguished. Thus we have one hundred and twenty living idioms, to which adding sixty-two dead ones, we find that there have been one hundred and eighty-two within the limits of the Republic.

We have only room to remark here, that many interesting peculiarities are found among those aboriginal tribes, with which we shall become acquainted when the foreign intruders shall have withdrawn from that splendid portion of Republican America, and the aspiring young nation be allowed to resume her noble career of improvement, in which she has been struggling to imitate our own country for half a century. The large and valuable work before us is one of many creditable evidences of the results of the admirable system of general education established by the Liberals of Mexico, under which Lancasterian schools and colleges of a truly high grade have flourished for thirty years or more, taught by laymen of learning and liberal principles. The attempts of the Austrian Maximilian to ruin education in Mexico, by reinstating the popish priests, and the doctrines and methods of the dark ages, will last no longer than his precarious throne.

The Indians of Mexico are entirely unlike most of those in the United States, being agriculturists, with fixed habitations, practising various useful arts, some of them well-educated and occupying distinguished positions as statesmen, soldiers, and scholars. They are remarkably peaceful and docile, yet make good soldiers; and a corps of the rudest of them, who had first held a musket only a few weeks before, defeated and captured a large body of French Zouaves at Puebla.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Sermons Preached in Boston on the Death of Abraham Lincoln. Together with the Funeral Services in the East Room of the Executive Mansion.—Poetry of the Age of Fable. Collected by Thomas Bulfinch.—Enoch Arden. By Alfred Tennyson.—Phantom Flowers. A Treatise on the Art of Producing Skeleton Leaves.—Wax Flowers. How to Make Them.—Dora Darling; or, The Daughter of the Regiment. J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston.

Mrs. Goodfellow's Cookery as It Should Be. A New Manual of the Dining-Room and Kitchen. T. B. Peterson & Bros., Philadelphia.

The Intuitions of the Mind Inductively Investigated. By Rev. James M'Cosh, LL.D. New and Revised Edition.—My New Home. By the Author of "Win and Wear." Robert Carter & Bros., New York.

Curious Facts in the History of Insects; Including Spiders and Scorpions. By Frank Cowan.—The Cadet Engineer; or, Steam for the Student. By John H. Long and R. H. Buel.—Poetical Tributes to the Memory of Abraham Lincoln. J. B. Lippincott, Philadelphia.

The Blade and the Ear. Thoughts for a Young Man. By A. B. Muzzey. Wm. V. Spencer, Boston.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,

108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital,	$1,000,000
Surplus, over	400,000

This Company insures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND INLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

If Premiums are Paid in Gold, Losses will be Paid in Gold.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
EDWARD A. STANSBURY, 2d Vice-President.
JOHN C. GOODRIDGE, Secretary.

An Accident may Happen at any Moment;

INSURE, BEFORE IT OCCURS,

IN THE

NATIONAL LIFE AND TRAVELLERS' INSURANCE CO.

OF NEW YORK.

OFFICE, 243 BROADWAY.

CAPITAL, - - - - - - - - - - $500,000

DIRECTORS.

Edward A. Jones,	Henry Clews,	Howell Smith,	Asher S. Mills,
Samuel J. Glassey,	Albert Wright,	F. H. Lummus,	Wm. H. Webb,
T. B. Van Buren,	John A. Iselin,	Wm. E. Prince,	Henry J. Raymond,
Sylvester M. Beard,	H. P. Freeman,	Sylvester Teats,	Silas C. Herring,
Robert Crowley,	Nicholas E. Smith,	Joseph Wilde,	Samuel W. Truslow.
Wm. Coit,	James R. Dow,	A. A. Lowe,	Richard A. McCurdy.
J. C. Dimmick,	Orison Blunt,	Chas. Curtiss,

EDWARD A. JONES, President.
WM. E. PRINCE, Vice-President.
ASHER S. MILLS, Secretary.
F. B. VAN BUREN, Treasurer.
J. F. ENTZ, Consulting Actuary.
S. TEATS, M.D., Medical Examiner.
E. H. JONES, Superintendent of Agencies.
E. F. FOLGER, General Railway Agent.

LIFE AND ENDOWMENT POLICIES are issued on the mutual plan. All the profits in this department are divided pro rata among the policy-holders. All policies to be incontestable after five years from date, and non-forfeitable after two annual payments. A loan of one-third of the amount of premiums will be made; also thirty days' grace given in payment of premiums.

GENERAL ACCIDENT POLICIES are granted, covering accidents of all descriptions, including the traveller's risk. If issued WITHOUT COMPENSATION, they provide for death, if caused by accident; but in case of injury only, the insured receives no compensation. If granted WITH COMPENSATION, the full amount assured is payable to the family in case of death caused by accident, and occurring within three months from the date of injury. Or, in case of injury causing disability, the insured receives a weekly compensation until he is able to attend to his business, such time not to exceed twenty-six weeks. The policy covers all forms of Dislocations, Broken Bones, Sprains, Bruises, Cuts, Gunshot Wounds, Burns and Scalds, Bites of Dogs, Assaults by Burglars, Robbers or Murderers, the action of Lightning or Sun-Stroke, the effects of Explosions, Floods, and Suffocation by Drowning or Choking, and all other kinds of accidents.

TEN DOLLARS secures a General Accident Policy for TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS, with a weekly compensation of TEN DOLLARS.

TRAVELLERS' INSURANCE TICKETS, for any length of time, from one day to twelve months, are for sale at the various Railroad and Steamboat Ticket Offices and Agencies.

MARINE RISKS AND SPECIAL VOYAGES. Policies are granted insuring against death by accident while sailing in steamers or sailing vessels. Also for special voyages.

Full information, together with Tables of Rates, etc., can be obtained at the Home Office, or by application to the State Agent. Parties at a distance may insure from blanks, which will be supplied and forwarded free of expense.

No Medical Examination required for General Accident Policies. Policies issued at once.

E. W. CLARK & CO.,

BANKERS AND BROKERS,

35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS, COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

GENERAL SOUTHERN LAND AGENCY,

NEW YORK OFFICE, 62 BROADWAY.

FOR SALE OR LEASE,

VALUABLE LANDS IN ALL THE SOUTHERN STATES.

KEMP P. BATTLE, Secretary.

AUTHORIZED REFERENCES:

PETER COOPER, Esq., New York.
JAY COOKE, Esq., Philadelphia.
A. A. LOW, Esq., Pres. Chamber of Commerce, N. Y.
GEO. H. STUART, Esq., Philadelphia.
His Excellency Gov. HOLDEN, of North Carolina.

BAIRD & BRADLEY,

CHICAGO LOAN AND COLLECTION AGENCY.

Investments for a term of years made for Eastern Capitalists. Corporations and Estates amply secured by First Mortgage on Real Estate in Chicago and vicinity, with semi-annual interest payable at any point East.

Real Estate purchased, managed, and sold for Eastern parties.

Notes collected and avails promptly remitted.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.
" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL - - - - - - - - - -	$1,000,000 00
ASSETS - - - - - - - - - - -	1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.
PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

VERMILYE & CO.,

BANKERS,

44 Wall Street, N. Y.,

GOVERNMENT LOAN AGENTS,

KEEP ON HAND, FOR

IMMEDIATE DELIVERY,

THE ISSUES OF

7.30 TREASURY NOTES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS.

We BUY and SELL all classes of GOVERNMENT SECURITIES at market rates ORDERS from BANKS and BANKERS executed on favorable terms, and with dispatch.

Also, receive DEPOSITS, and ALLOW INTEREST on current balances.

VERMILYE & CO.

THE

MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY,

COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.

JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.

CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE.
Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary. B. C. MORRIS, President.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

JOSEPH W WILDEY, Secretary. WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.

FOURTH NATIONAL BANK,

27 & 29 PINE ST., NEW YORK,

Has for sale U. S. 7 3-10 Notes, all sizes; also, One Year Certificates and all other Government Loans.

ANTHONY LANE, Asst. Cashier. B. SEAMAN, Cashier.

AETNA INSURANCE COMPANY, OF HARTFORD,

INCORPORATED 1819. CHARTER PERPETUAL.

Paid up Capital, - -	$2,250,000 00
Assets, July 1, 1865, - -	3,850,351 78
Losses Paid in 45 Years, -	$17,485,894 71

T. A. ALEXANDER, Pres't. L. J. HENDEE, Sec'y.
JONA. GOODWIN, Jr., A. Sec'y.

Insurance against loss and damage by Fire, and of Inland Navigation.

NEW YORK AGENCY, 62 WALL STREET.
JAS. A. ALEXANDER, AGENT.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,
56 WALL STREET,
Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world

BILLS ON LONDON
At Sixty Days' Sight and at Three Days' Sight, for sale by
WARD, CAMPBELL & CO.,
56 Wall Street, New York.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,
46 PINE STREET, NEW YORK,
BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

The National Park Bank of New York.

CAPITAL - - - - $2,000,000. | SURPLUS - - - - $1,200,000.
This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.
J. L. WORTH, Cashier.
NEW YORK, Aug. 21, 1865.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY A.M.

BUSINESS continues active among the merchants, though in the domestic commission line there is rather less doing in cotton goods, and prices are coming down. The mill-owners at the East have been driving production to the extreme, in order to avail of the large demand for and enormous profits on goods since the close of the war. Their stocks in New York and Boston are now accumulating too rapidly for the demand, and there is a near prospect of lower figures to the consumers. The importation of foreign dry goods this week is heavy, to the value of $4,020,000, but there is still a demand for all seasonable styles, and the amount marketed this week is somewhat larger than the fresh importation. In general foreign merchandise, also, there is a good trade, especially in the staples of sugar, coffee, tea, and metals. The receipts for customs in gold for the week will be about three millions, and thus far in the month of September, 13 business days out of 26, $7,067,000, which is ahead of the same time in August, though we cannot calculate upon a much longer continuance of such very heavy receipts. The Government continues a seller of part of the surplus gold in the Treasury, as it cannot be needed to pay gold interest until November, and then only to a partial amount beyond the current customs of that month. The price has fallen 2 per cent. since last Saturday, while bills on London have improved $\frac{3}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for gold, in consequence of this cheapening of the gold; not that the importers apprehend an upward reaction, but because they had made considerable sales of their goods on the higher basis of 144 to 145 per cent., and are now disposed to remit part of the proceeds.

Money keeps easy at 5 to 6 per cent. on temporary loan to the brokers, and 6 to 7 per cent. on mercantile paper. There was some disposition among a portion of the old City banks, especially the few which have not gone into the National system, to agitate for a discrimination between city and country bank-notes, but the Clearing House Association declined to have anything to do with the question, officially, last Tuesday, and the probability is that nothing will be done outside of the Clearing House. Practically, the difference, as lawful tender, between the banks themselves and the U. S. Treasury, between greenbacks and national currency, without reference to the points of issue on redemption, is so very nice, that the public at large need apprehend no danger, as the law now stands, of the smallest discount on the latter. Both classes of notes bear the seal of the Government, and the pledge of the public faith and public stocks for prompt redemption.

The receipts of cotton this week are 20,734 bales; the exports on Wednesday's Custom House return only 3,882 bales. It is believed, however, that the preparations for shipping to Liverpool are now on the increase, while the domestic mills are not such eager buyers. The only remaining drawback to an active movement is a speculative disposition in certain quarters of the trade to hold cotton for higher prices later in the season. This seems to be favored, for the moment, by cheap money, and continued firm reports from the Liverpool market, where the American staple, in free supply, is welcomed by the manufacturers of Lancashire, after working so long on Surats and Egyptians. At the same time, it is not forgotten that we have yet to hear of the effect of the large receipts on this side, at New York, New Orleans, and Mobile.

The Treasury is working with great care, and without fresh borrowing. The internal revenue is above $8,000,000 per week in currency, and the customs at all the ports $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 in gold. The balances in the New York office in gold and currency have run up to the unprecedented total of $71,343,856.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The demand for the original 5-20s is renewed from Europe, and this day's steamers carry out $700,000; the price closing 107$\frac{1}{8}$ per cent.; the new issue, 105$\frac{1}{2}$; 10-40s, 94 ex dividend; and 6s of 1881, 107$\frac{7}{8}$. The 7.30 currency loans not so firm as last week. Sales at 99$\frac{3}{8}$ for the first and second, and 99$\frac{1}{8}$ for the third series. Treasury certificates steady at 98$\frac{3}{4}$ to 99 per cent. The compound 6 per cent. legal tenders of 1864 are wanted at 105$\frac{1}{4}$ for June dates; 103 to 103$\frac{1}{4}$ for July and August; and 102 to 101 for October and December.

STATE SECURITIES.

There is a large advance in the Border State bonds: Tennessees up to 83, North Carolinas 78, and Missouris 76 per cent. The State of New York has paid off $2,960,000 of the old Canal debt out of the Canal Sinking Fund.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

There is nothing new to report of railway mortgages. The speculation in shares has been generally bearish through the week. Erie, 88$\frac{1}{4}$ down to 86$\frac{1}{2}$ to 87; N. Y. Central, 92$\frac{7}{8}$ to 93$\frac{7}{8}$ to 92$\frac{1}{2}$ to 93; Reading, 106$\frac{3}{4}$ to 107 to 106$\frac{3}{8}$; Michigan Southern is an exception to the general market, and advanced at one time from 66$\frac{1}{4}$ to 69 per cent., falling back to 67$\frac{3}{4}$ to 68; Michigan Central steady, 110 to 109$\frac{1}{2}$; Pittsburg, 71$\frac{3}{4}$ down to 71; North-west, 28 to 27$\frac{1}{4}$; North-west Preferred, 61$\frac{3}{4}$ to 60$\frac{3}{4}$ to 61$\frac{1}{4}$; Rock Island is another exception, and rose to 112$\frac{1}{2}$ to 113, closing 112$\frac{1}{4}$—the market looking somewhat firmer at the close of the week.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

Bank stocks are looking firmer at the close of the week. Atlantic Mail, 147, as on last Saturday. The fancies of Mariposa, Quicksilver, Canton, and Cumberland dull, but not materially changed in prices.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Gold is 142$\frac{5}{8}$; bills on London for gold, 109$\frac{1}{2}$; on Paris, 5 francs 16$\frac{1}{4}$ centimes to the dollar.

RAILWAY TRAFFIC.

The Erie Road for August, $1,368,000; the Atlantic and Great Western, $738,000; the Fort Wayne, $762,000. All increase largely over the same month in 1864. The Western-bound freight business is unusually active.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW,
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL,
JOHN G. WHITTIER,
SAMUEL ELIOT (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford),
PROFESSOR TORREY (Harvard),
DR. FRANCIS LIEBER,
PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH (Oxford),
PROFESSOR CHILD (Harvard),
HENRY JAMES,
CHARLES E. NORTON,
JUDGE BOND (Baltimore),
EDMUND QUINCY,
PROFESSOR W. D. WHITNEY (Yale),
PROFESSOR D. C. GILMAN (Yale),
JUDGE DALY,
PROFESSOR DWIGHT (Columbia College),
PROFESSOR TAYLER LEWIS (Schenectady),
N. TOURGUENEFF,
AUGUSTE LAUGEL,
JUDGE WAYLAND,
FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED,
REV. DR. MCCLINTOCK,
REV. DR. JOS. P. THOMPSON,
REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS,
REV. DR. BELLOWS,
C. J. STILLÉ,
HENRY T. TUCKERMAN,
BAYARD TAYLOR,
C. A. BRISTED,
C. L. BRACE,
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON,
SYDNEY GEORGE FISHER,
THEODORE TILTON,
JAMES PARTON,
GAIL HAMILTON.

TERMS:—Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER,
130 Nassau street, N. Y.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

Celebrated Gold Medal
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,
AND
CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL.

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

Great Improvements in Sewing Machines.

EMPIRE SHUTTLE MACHINE!

Salesrooms, 536 Broadway, N. Y.,
250 Washington Street, Boston.

This Machine is constructed on entirely new principles of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements, having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION COMBINED.

It has a straight needle perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither RIP nor RAVEL, and is alike on both sides, performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nansook Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is
EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE!

AGENTS WANTED where none are established, to whom a liberal discount will be given.

T. J. MCARTHUR & CO.,
Manufacturers and Proprietors,
536 Broadway, N. Y.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH
B. T. BABBITT'S
Pure Concentrated Potash,
OR READY SOAP-MAKER.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.

B. T. BABBITT,
64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

FINKLE & LYON'S
IMPROVED
LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,
GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.
HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.
Also,
KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,
The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,
1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of
GIFFARD'S INJECTOR,
For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

STATIONERY.

TO STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS, AND NOTION DEALERS.—The undersigned, being the oldest envelope manufacturers in this country, and having the amplest facilities, are always ready to supply, by the thousand or by the million, envelopes of every variety of size, pattern, and color, at the lowest prices.

Samples furnished when called for.

WM. P. LYON & WHITTEMORE,
537 Pearl St., New York.

Away with Spectacles!

Old Eyes Made New, without SPECTACLES, DOCTOR, or MEDICINE. Pamphlet mailed free on receipt of ten cents. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

BOYNTON'S FURNACES.

Boynton's Brick and Portable Furnaces, Fire-place and Parlor Heaters, Kitcheners, Ranges, Parlor and Office Stoves, are warranted to give satisfaction. Send for circular.

RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,
234 Water Street, near Beekman, New York.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!
Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees
IN EVERY STYLE,
MANUFACTURED BY
ROBERT PATON,
24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,
45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,
STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS,
AND
BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

DECKER & CO.

MANUFACTURERERS OF PIANO-FORTES,

419 BROOME STREET,

One Block East from Broadway, N. Y.

Our instruments combine all the improvements of REAL WORTH known in their manufacture, and are warranted for the term of seven (7) years.

W. H. Schieffelin & Co.,
SUCCESSORS TO
SCHIEFFELIN BROTHERS & CO.,
Importers and Jobbers of
DRUGS,
Indigo, Corks, Sponges,
FANCY GOODS, PERFUMERY, ETC., ETC.,
170 and 172 William Street, N. Y.

T. C. SELLEW,
MANUFACTURER OF DESKS AND OFFICE FURNITURE,
107 FULTON ST., near NASSAU ST., N. Y.
LIBRARY AND SCHOOL FURNITURE MADE TO ORDER.

CRUSHERS AND PULVERIZERS,
FOR WET OR DRY WORKING,
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.
MANUFACTURED BY THE
BOSTON MILLING & MANUFACTURING CO.,
105 STATE STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Miners should not purchase machinery before seeing, or sending their friends to examine, the practical working of this series of machinery.

☞ The Whirling Table, or Crusher, weighs less than two tons, and crushes from ten to twelve tons of ore per hour to fine gravel, or two hundred and fifty tons in twenty-four hours.

The Pulverizer weighs two tons, and pulverizes to dust, infinitely finer than stamp work, one ton of ore per hour, or twenty-four tons per diem, equal to the yield of twenty-five or thirty stamps; and the first cost and wear, as compared to this number of stamps, is about one-tenth;—the entire yield being fit for amalgamation without further reduction. The fine dust is not obtained by screening, but by the immediate action of the Pulverizer.

Fifteen horse-power, net, is the maximum power required for one machine.

The cost of the wear, per ton, is less than by any other machine. All wearing parts are now made of Franklinite iron.

Let miners and their friends carefully study the practical working of all other machines and processes offered, and then see ours working in East Boston, Mass. We ask only this.

All of our machines are now made in our own shop. No CONTRACT WORK.

OFFICERS OF THE COMPANY:
President—HORATIO R. STORER.
Gen. Agent and Treasurer—JACOB J. STORER.
Consulting Engineer—JAS. D. WHELPLEY.

DIRECTORS:
John A. Blanchard, Benjamin P. Cheney, Bradley N. Cumings, Ichabod Goodwin, Horatio R. Storer, Jacob J. Storer, James D. Whelpley.

Agent in New York,
CHAS. H. GARDNER,
16 CORTLANDT STREET.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,
Importers and Dealers in
TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;
Manufacturers of
COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,
19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

DECKER BROTHERS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PIANO-FORTES.
FACTORY AND WAREROOMS,
91 BLEECKER STREET,
(MARBLE BUILDING,)
One block west from Broadway,
NEW YORK.

MARVIN'S
PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.
Superior to any others in the following particulars:
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by
MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.
Send for a descriptive Circular.

JESSUP & MOORE,
27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,
PAPER MANUFACTURERS,
Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

DEMULCENT SOAP,
FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,
FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.
MANUFACTURED ONLY BY
J. C. HULL'S SON,
32 PARK ROW, N. Y.
Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Benedict's Time,
171 BROADWAY, COR. CORTLANDT ST.,
NEW YORK.
TO SOLDIERS.
AMERICAN (WALTHAM) WATCHES.
Let every soldier, before he returns home, provide himself with an AMERICAN WATCH; no better use can be made of money than to invest it in one of these durable and accurate time-pieces. It is a kind of property that constantly returns good interest, and its money value is so well-known that a pocket full of silver dollars wouldn't be as useful.
For sale and warranted by
BENEDICT BROTHERS, Jewelers,
Keepers of the City Time, and Agents for the sale of the American (Waltham) Watches,
171 Broadway, cor. Cortlandt St.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.
THE WEED MACHINES,
With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.
Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.
WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,
STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

OAKLEY & MASON,
PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS,
AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS,
21 MURRAY STREET,
OLD STAND OF PRATT, OAKLEY & CO.,
Between Broadway and Church Street, New York.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines
FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.
THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,
ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,
Agents wanted. 629 BROADWAY.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,
625 BROADWAY, N. Y.,
MAKE THE
LOCK-STITCH,
and rank highest on account of the elasticity, permanence, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching, when done, and the wide range of its application.—Report of American Institute.

CARTER, KIRTLAND & CO.,
Manufacturers and Jobbers of
CLOTHING,
340 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK,
OFFER TO FIRST-CLASS BUYERS A LARGE AND VERY COMPLETE STOCK OF
FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING
OF ALL GRADES,
EMBRACING FINE, MEDIUM, AND LOW-PRICED GOODS.

Having made extensive purchases at a time when all were sellers and very few were buyers, we are in a position to supply our customers upon the most favorable and advantageous terms.

Jobbers, Merchant Tailors, and Dealers generally will find it to their advantage to call and examine our stock before purchasing.

Particular attention paid to the execution of orders.

SAM'L CARTER, WM. H. KIRTLAND,
JOHN ROSE, CHAS. B. PEET,
JOHN H. WERTS, Special.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS
OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.
TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.
or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.
New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.
TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.
For sale by JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,
FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.
R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,
STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,
WAREHOUSES, 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. 42 JOHN STREET, New York.
Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.
CAUTION.
These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.
R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

Economical Housekeepers Use
PYLE'S SALERATUS. | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.
Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.
ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.
"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.
"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.
"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.
"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.
Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.
WM. B. BRADBURY,
425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 13. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1865. $3 PER ANNUM

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 385
Is Anybody to be Punished? 389
Perry on Government 390
The Confederate Bondholders 390
The Fenian Movement 391
Canadian Policy 391
"A Yankee" on Negroes 392
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Feelings of the Southern Negroes 393
The South as It Is 393
England 396
France 398
A Society for Improving the Condition of the Rich 399
LITERATURE:
Literary Notes 404
Draper's Civil Policy of America 407
Can You Forgive Her? 409
FINE ARTS:
The Designs for the Central Park Gates 410
FINANCIAL REVIEW 414

Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

WE quoted last week from the Chicago Tribune, which is making the most valuable contributions to the history of the war, some statistics of the blood that was shed in the closing campaigns of the war. We are now enabled, on the same authority, to give an account of the treasure expended in the struggle for our national existence. The public debt on the 1st of July, 1861, and annually at the same date up to last July, was, successively: $90,867,828; $514,211,371; $1,098,793,181; $1,740,690,489; $2,757,253,275. The receipts for the corresponding dates were: $51,935,720; $112,687,290; $264,626,771; $309,500,000 (known and estimated). The difference is $3,496,002,781, which, diminished by the old debt and four years' interest thereon, and the ordinary expenses of Government which would have been independent of the war, becomes $3,098,233,078. This amount is likely to be swelled still further by the continuance of expenditures that properly attach to the war, and in round numbers the cost of putting down the slaveholders' rebellion is estimated at $3,350,000,000. Peace at first brought only an increase of outlay, in the mustering out of the multitude of soldiers, their transportation home, and the payment of the balance of bounties which then became due. When our armies began to be disbanded, not less than one million seventy-five thousand men were on the pay-rolls. Of these 850,000 have already been mustered out, or ordered to be. The reduction will continue till only 150,000 remain, of whom three-fifths will probably be blacks. As one-seventh of the army, so about one-tenth of the navy will be retained in commission. The comparative expenses of the two Departments for the four years have been: War, $2,650,000,000, of which $1,400,000,000 belong to the Quartermaster's Department; Navy, $350,000,000. The following estimates are given of the current annual expenses of Government hereafter:

For the War Department	$100,000,000
For the Navy Department	25,000,000
For interest on the public debt	155,000,000
For the civil service, pensions, and Indians	61,000,000
Total	$341,000,000

GEN. F. C. BARLOW will contest the election for Secretary of State with Gen. Slocum. So the New York Union Convention decided at Syracuse on Wednesday, the 20th. Three other men of the sword were ranged upon the same ticket. The resolutions show feebly in comparison with those of the same party in other States. They hope that restoration will be accompanied with a condition that the rights restored shall be exercised "in a spirit of equal and impartial justice, and with a view to the elevation and perpetuation of the full rights of citizenship of all their people, inasmuch as these are the principles which constitute the basis of our republican institutions." Nobody will complain that these terms are not broad enough to include negro suffrage. They differ from the stronger dialect of the Minnesota Republicans as the thunder, to use Schiller's simile, that, spread out into its single tones, becomes a lullaby for children, from the royal sound, poured forth together in one quick peal, that shakes the heavens. The Wisconsin Democratic Convention met on the same day at Madison and made their nominations. The resolutions contained nothing new—not even the endorsement of the President and his policy, which has the miraculous property of appearing to satisfy all parts and parties of the country, and extorts the praise alike of those who demand and those who resist political equality for all the citizens of the United States. It is very evident that somebody will be disappointed.

ST. LOUIS is very naturally exulting in the completion of the Missouri link of the Pacific Railroad, by which the city hopes to recover the distance gained over it by Chicago during the war. This portion of the grand line, which connects St. Louis and Kansas City, has been fifteen years building, latterly, of course, under the most adverse circumstances. Even as late as April and July it was exposed to raids and guerrilla disturbances. As there is a road from the western terminus to Lawrence and Topeka, the emigration to Kansas, Colorado, and New Mexico will be greatly facilitated. Lawrence will soon be connected by rail with Denver, that in turn with Salt Lake City, and there will be encountered or thence sought the slowly-advancing Central Pacific Railroad, which extends from Sacramento via Clipper Gap and the Humboldt Valley. While so much attention is paid to the overland communication with California, the Atlantic and Pacific Mail Steamship Companies have been consolidated into one, the latter buying out the former for $4,500,000, on Saturday, the 15th. The travelling public, whose miseries have hitherto been confined to this side the Isthmus, may reasonably expect great advantages from the change.

THE Commissioner of Agriculture, in his statement of the first of September, says that while the wheat crop has received no further detriment, its quality is still inferior, especially in the West, where it was affected by blight and rust. The quantity of old wheat on hand has been overrated. The crop of oats will be one of the largest ever raised in this country. Hay was greatly damaged at the West, very little at the East. The quality is generally good, except in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. The corn crop is as favorable as the oats. Tobacco is lacking only in the amount planted, which is much less than last year. Sorghum has thriven like the corn which it so nearly resembles. Buckwheat promises well, if spared by the frosts. Potatoes have suffered considerably in many localities, but the yield may still be equal to the average on account of the excess planted. The great hop-growing State is New York, which produced 9,750,000 pounds out of the 11,000,000 raised by the entire country in 1860. This year it will have lost more than four-tenths of its crop from lice. Everywhere hops have ripened well. Roots and gardens were never better.

THE message of Governor Perry to the South Carolina Convention, of which the text has been received since our last issue, is, like all his productions hitherto, a mixture of good things and bad. A very striking sample of his confusion of intellect, not to say of morals, is contained in his really laudable recommendation of a thorough change in the State representation, since the present system is so manifestly unequal and anti-republican. This fair plan is immediately botched by declaring that the freedmen deserve to be represented, not personally but as a part of the population, and the three-fifths rule is actually approved as perhaps the best model to be followed! Another sign of a Rip Van Winkle heaviness in this extraordinary governor is his basing the refusal of the suffrage to the negro on the Dred Scott decision! On the 15th the convention repealed the ordinance of secession without debate, with only three negative votes, and without applause. The committee has reported in favor of abolishing slavery, equalizing representation, electing governor and Presidential electors by the people, and viva voce voting in the Legislature. The Alabama Convention, which assembled at Montgomery on the 12th (not the 13th, as we stated last week), authorized the provisional governor, on the 18th, to order an election for members of Congress. On the 20th it adopted a resolution requesting him to call out the militia in each county immediately, to repress the existing disorder and lawlessness. On the 21st it ratified all laws passed by the Legislature during the war not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States; also the present constitution, except as regards the insurance of Treasury notes and State bonds. On Friday, after a lengthy and full discussion, an ordinance was passed, by a vote of 89 to 3, prohibiting slavery, and amending the constitution "by striking out all provisions in relation to slaves and slavery." As in Mississippi, the Legislature is enjoined to protect the freedmen in their persons and property.

The Fort Smith Commission terminated its dealings with the Indians on the 21st. The treaty of permanent peace was further signed on the 15th by the loyal Cherokees and rebel Seminoles. John Ross having by his superior intelligence seduced his tribe into rebellion, and exercising still an evil influence, was not recognized as a chief of the Cherokees by the commission, with Executive approval. The special treaty between the United States and the Choctaws and Chickasaws was signed on the last day. These tribes promise to exert themselves to keep the Indians of the plains peaceable, to abolish slavery for ever, and to provide suitably for the freedmen; also to grant the right of way to railroads, and to favor the Government plan of a consolidation of tribes with a territorial form of government. General Curtis is to meet the Indians of the North-west at Fort Sully, and another commission is to meet the Kiowas, Camanches, Apaches, Cheyennes, and Arrapahoes at Bluff Creek, Arkansas, on the 4th of October. The tribe last named has just been defeated by General Conner. The Osages are to be treated with at Humboldt, Kansas.

Allusion was made last week by our Southern correspondent to the surprise of a North Carolina militia officer, a captain in the "home guard," when informed by an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau that he had no right to whip negroes whose masters found fault with them. Nothing is clearer than that to arm any portion of the Southern whites is to prepare the way for violent persecution of the blacks and obstruction of the authority of their protectors in the War Department; and we may expect to witness, under the pretext of preserving order, the cruel and bloody repression of a race struggling to stand erect. The public cannot too often be reminded that once the seceded States are re-admitted to the Union, the reason for retaining in them the forces of the United States will be (in theory) removed, and that the existence of the Freedmen's Bureau is limited to "the present war of rebellion and for one year thereafter." In effect, the withdrawal of the national troops takes away from the Bureau, as has already been observed in North Carolina, the power to maintain itself and be respected in a hostile community. What will be its fate when left to deal, not as now with prejudiced and malevolent civilians, but with a doubly spiteful and ten-fold mischievous militia? A recent collision in Alabama has its significance in answering this question. A squad of men in command of a lieutenant was detached from Gen. Thomas's command in search of stray Government cattle. Near Gaylesville they were attacked by a sheriff and his posse, who claimed (no doubt falsely) to be acting under orders from Gov. Parsons. One of the soldiers was killed, and nineteen of their assailants were captured. If such a bold and wanton demonstration was deemed a safe venture, surely it is easy to predict the peril of a class as void of defence as of just offence, when the Government can neither interpose the shield of its protection nor apply the rod of punishment in a restored and independent State.

The Reconstructing State Convention of Alabama has pronounced against the repudiation of the war debt of the State—that is, the debt contracted by Alabama in aid of the prosecution of the secession war. There is something so odious in the very word repudiation, that the first feeling which one experiences on reading this decision—which was made by a vote of 58 to 34—is favorable to the convention. But on reflection we see that the matter has two sides, as more than a third of the delegates declared by voting for repudiation. Are the States that seceded to come back into the Union loaded with debts contracted in a war against the Union, and in the cause of treason? Are loyal men in those States to be forced to help pay the cost of rebellion, now that rebellion is at an end, and the authority of the Federal Government is restored? Is that Government powerless in the premises, and has it not the ability to protect its friends against the imposition of illegal taxes? For all taxes that shall be laid for the purpose of raising money with which to pay debts created in aid of the Southern Confederacy must be illegal in their character, and collectable only by force. But the action of the Alabama Convention, we presume, was simply declaratory of the opinion of that body. It binds no other body to pursue a particular course with relation to the debt. It can have no binding force on the Legislature of Alabama, which body may refuse to take the measures necessary for the debt's liquidation. That would be to settle the debt in a very summary manner, and it would be not exactly an act of repudiation. It would amount only to this, that the Legislature, as a loyal body, would not recognize as a valid claim a debt that had been contracted in the interest of the rebels and for the advancement of treasonable designs. If the States that lately were in rebellion should recognize their war debts, and attempt to pay them, it would be only because they were not without hope and expectation of having the "national debt" created by the "Southern Confederacy" recognized by the Federal Government, and paid by the nation, precisely as the debt created by the nation is recognized and paid. Were they to repudiate their local war debts, their action would be quoted against any endeavors they might make to have their general debt assumed by the central Government. If their debts were to be thrown aside, it might be asked, why should other debts, contracted by rebels for the carrying on of the rebellion, be treated with more consideration? That the men who have just come out of rebellion should feel any delicacy about their State's debts is not to be believed. Imagine Mississippi, Arkansas, and Florida being under concern on the subject of State indebtedness! The thing would be too much for a farce of the broadest character. If there is a desire that the local debts should be provided for, it grows out of the probable effect of such a proceeding on the great debt created by the action of the crushed Confederacy.

The Maine Law, in the varied experience of several States, has encountered the greatest and sometimes a fatal resistance in the cities, while its execution in the country districts has been possible if not always actual. Such has been the case in Massachusetts, where the general public sentiment has kept the law on the statute-books against every effort to remove it, while local interests and local opinion have successfully combated its enforcement. Its supporters in the last legislature made several abortive efforts to provide for this exceptional lawlessness, and at last, as we noticed not long since, hit upon a constabulary which should take cognizance of offences against State laws, which has hitherto been the chief occupation of the municipal police. We learn from a Boston paper that the first case under the liquor law was carried to the Superior Court by the State constables, but broke down in consequence of the non-agreement of the jury. This result was not unforeseen. One of the measures proposed during the winter was to exclude from the jury-box any juror who was opposed to the law in question. That this would have ensured conviction cannot be doubted, since the validity of the law is held by the courts; but whether it would have been a sound practice or a safe precedent, and not a dangerous infringement of personal liberty, was doubted, and the doubt sufficed to kill it. The attitude of the State is certainly curious, and the next resort will be looked to with interest. Probably the constables will not surrender to a single jury.

It is a common objection to criticisms on the policy of the President that it was not in his power to meddle with State codes, as he must have done by compelling the vote of the negro to be allowed at the South. On the same ground freedmen's courts are established, when a simple announcement that all the appurtenances of slavery had perished with it would have blown away like mist the black laws which are still permitted to discriminate among the applicants for justice. Yet Gov. Hamilton, of Texas, has just insisted that, while the present organization of districts and terms for holding courts is to be continued, "all negroes must be put on an equality with white men in respect to punishment for crime; they are to be tried under indictment as heretofore provided, and if found guilty, the judgment of the court must be the same as if the defendant were a white person." Now, by the maxim qui facit per alium, facit per se, the President is involved in the action of his provisional governor. Will he let him alone, while denying the possession of a power which he acknowledges in his subordinate? or will he interfere in order to be logical?

The five points presented by the counsel of Colchester, the medium, in arrest of judgment, seem not to have prevailed with Judge Hall, of Buffalo, who fined the defendant $40 and costs—in all $513. The Davenport Brothers are exhibiting in France, and recently entertained at Passy a large number of gentlemen representing the Paris press as editors or leading contributors. One rather crucial experiment was tried, of filling the bound hands of the mediums with flour. On reopening the cabinet, the cords were loosed as usual, the flour was deposited undiminished upon the plate from which it was taken, while not a flake could be discovered on the interior.

Gen. Howard left Washington on Wednesday, the 20th, on a tour of inspection in Virginia. He will visit different parts of the State, and thoroughly investigate the condition of the freed-people.

Gen. Swayne reports from Alabama that the demand for labor is still apparently increasing, and he trusts that by the close of the year the freedmen will become entirely self-supporting. Measures have been taken to prevent outrages upon them, especially in those counties where no United States troops are stationed. Major Miller, of Gen. Swayne's staff, has been sent with a small force of mounted infantry to the districts in which these outrages have been reported, with complete authority from Gov. Parsons to investigate as a special commissioner the workings of the civil machinery, to arrest marauding gangs, etc. Much is expected from this mission. A company of cavalry has been sent to Troy County, and will also visit Coffee County. The Governor has directed the acting attorney-general to render all the aid he can. At Montgomery one hundred laborers were in request for railroad work, and the number was quickly raised with the aid of the leading colored men of the city. Sixty were taken from the streets, and as a second hundred was called for soon after, the number of freedmen in the cities is likely to be rapidly diminished. Gen. Swayne issued, on the 30th ult., a general order (No. 12) whose distinctive features are these: That all contracts with freedmen for labor for the period of one month and over must be reduced to writing, approved by and deposited in duplicate with an agent of the Bureau; that none will be approved which does not expire on or before Jan. 1, 1867; that, inasmuch as the freedmen have not all learned as yet the binding force of a contract, and that freedom does not mean living without labor, "when any employer shall make oath before a justice of the peace, acting as an agent of the Bureau, and having local jurisdiction, that one of his employees has been absent from labor without good cause for a longer period than one day, or for an aggregate of time greater than three days in one month, the justice shall proceed against such person as a vagrant. Freedmen committed as vagrants may be set to work on roads, or at other labor, by the county or municipal authorities which provide their support; or they may be turned over to an agent of the Bureau." Gov. Parsons has officially approved this order.

Gen. Sprague forwards from Missouri and Arkansas the report of his inspector, Col. Williams, of a tour in the latter State. At Helena there is an orphan asylum supported mainly by the Society of Friends of Richmond, Indiana, and another, together with a freedmen's hospital, supported by the profits arising from wood-cutting. At this place the average price paid as wages for first-class hands is twenty dollars for males and fifteen for females, including board. The colonel remarks:

"The experiment of giving the freedmen small tracts to cultivate on their own account has been tried here with the most satisfactory results. I saw five thousand dollars that one freedman had laid up as the proceeds of last year's crop off fifty acres."

At Duvall's Bluff there are about forty refugees supported. The freedmen readily find employment on the leased plantations with good wages. A school for them was opened on the 24th of April, with 106 scholars, and has since increased to 162. At Lewisburg, on the Arkansas River, the previously large number of refugees had become reduced to twenty women and one hundred children, who were receiving rations. The freedmen in the neighborhood of this post do not call on the Government for aid, yet there is a great want of clothing for women and children. Large numbers of negroes were arriving with their former masters from Texas. At Clarksville and Fort Smith the number of rations issued to the whites is rapidly decreasing. The refugees of the latter post, and at Van Buren, were formed into colonies early last winter, and armed, and then put upon abandoned lands, with seeds, etc. The experiment has been completely successful. Chaplain Springer, assisted by several Arkansas regiments, has founded an orphan asylum at Fort Smith. Upwards of $2.000 have been contributed to this benevolence, and 39 orphans are already provided for. At Fayetteville a post-school has been attended by 125 children, mostly refugees. Though the number of freedmen, after crossing Boston Mountains, is small, there is an intense prejudice against them on the part of the white people of this section. The feeling becomes malignity among the refugees, and hatred among the Arkansas Union soldiers, so that the safety of the colored people is precarious. "Throughout the extent of my journey," says Col. Williams, "I found those who entertain some doubt that the negro is really free—perhaps, rather, a hope that he is really not. The idea seems to prevail that, when civil law is restored, much that has been done by military authority will be undone."

General order No. 138 of the War Department, Sept. 16, provides for the free transportation by Government of destitute freedmen and refugees in pursuit of employment within the jurisdiction and upon the requisition of commissioners and assistant commissioners of the Bureau; also of teachers and volunteer laborers in behalf of the Bureau when duly accredited; also of stores and school-books for the subsistence, comfort, and instruction of dependent refugees and freedmen.

Circular No. 16, issued by Gen. Howard Sept. 19, names the assistant commissioners of the various States, to wit: at Charleston, for Georgia and South Carolina, Maj.-Gen. Rufus Saxton, to whom reports Brig.-Gen. D. Tillson, acting assistant commissioner for Georgia, at Augusta; at Nashville, Brig.-Gen. C. B. Fisk, for Kentucky and Tennessee; at St. Louis, Brig.-Gen. J. W. Sprague, for Missouri and Arkansas; at Montgomery, Brig.-Gen. W. Swayne, for Alabama; at Galveston, Brig.-Gen. E. M. Gregory, for Texas; at Richmond, Col. O. Brown, for Virginia; at Raleigh, Col. E. Whittlesey, for North Carolina; at Vicksburg, Col. Samuel Thomas, for Mississippi; at Tallahassee, Col. T. W. Osborne, for Florida; at New Orleans, Rev. T. W. Conway, for Louisiana.

—We learn, unofficially, that the Freedmen's Employment Agency in the District has been instructed to discriminate particularly, in disbursing its supplies, between natives or residents and the dependent who have flocked thither, to the end that the former may be required to look to the proper municipal authorities for aid. General Fisk lately addressed the inhabitants of Spring Hill, Tennessee, to such acceptance that he was presented with a series of resolutions to which prominent citizens lent their names, and which endorse heartily the action of the Government, and promise to carry out faithfully its wishes in regard to the freedmen. The Mayor of Paris, Kentucky, writes to General Palmer, that the people of that city are anxious to rid themselves of their blacks, who "will not labor, but simply exist as a nuisance." Whither they go, or to whom, is a matter of complete indifference. General Palmer replies, with creditable warmth, that this is a very base procedure on the part of men who have reduced the negro to dependence and utter poverty, and now are anxious to dismiss him to want and idleness. He does not intend to countenance or further any such scheme as that. He will cheerfully co-operate in any plan which has for its object the assuring of the colored people that they are free, and that their movements like their bodies will be unfettered, and which seeks to gain their confidence. The able-bodied may then elect to stay or to quit Kentucky; and if the latter, they may count upon the general's assistance. The helpless will not be encouraged to go, for their support is properly the duty of their own people, and is not to be thrown upon others.

THE British Government is reported to have ordered a number of gunboats and two men-of-war to be stationed off Bantry Bay and elsewhere on the west coast of Ireland. This demonstration against Fenianism may be considered to balance the injunction against the importation of cattle from the opposite side, and to secure the island completely from infection. The holders of the Confederate loan met rather lugubriously on the 4th, at the London Tavern. Various straws were tossed to these shipwrecked speculators, but few seemed to clutch at them with any confidence, and the very effrontery of some of the proposed modes of retrieval elicited laughter even from the disconsolate victims who listened. Many of the leading bondholders prudently avoided publicity by not attending, but their names have been aired by the authorities at Washington, and are instructive enough. Sir Henry de Houghton, Bart., leads the list with £180,000; Lord Wharncliffe loses £5,000. Messrs. John Laird, George Peacock, and W. H. Gregory, each an M.P., contributed, respectively, £20,000, £5,000, and £4,000 toward the perpetuation of slavery. W. S. Lindsley and Beresford Hope sink £20,000 and £40,000 beyond hope. James Spence, the Liverpool correspondent of the Times, John Thaddeus Delane, editor, and M. B. Sampson, city editor of the same paper, along with W. J. Ridout, proprietor of the London Morning Post, are out of pocket to the tune of £50,000, £15,000, £10,000, and £4,000. The disinterestedness of a large portion of the spoken and written opposition to the Union cause is thus made plain enough. It has been remarked as a curious, but entirely fortuitous circumstance, that the French Emperor was in Switzerland when the British fleet came to Cherbourg, and that Queen Victoria was on the continent when the return fête was given to the French fleet at Portsmouth. Constantinople has been ravaged by fire as well as by pestilence. Upwards of 20,000 people were rendered shelterless by a disastrous conflagration that broke out on the night of the 5th. "Whole streets, squares, mosques, and Government buildings," says the account, "were blazing away at the same time."

A CONGRESS of working-men's associations has been held at Stuttgart. In its session of the 3d instant it adopted resolutions to this effect: that the right of combination is a natural right, that can in no case be put under restriction; that a shortening of the hours of labor would be of great advantage to employer and employed—being absolutely necessary for the latter, in order that they may receive that political and moral culture which is the object of working-men's associations—and that the introduction of work by the job as far as possible is the practical means to this end; that more important than any combination is the establishment of associations of production; that in these three particulars nothing satisfactory can be attained without absolute freedom of action, and without a liberal statute in regard to associations; that universal suffrage, equal and immediate, is the basis of every constitutional state, and the only mode by which the people can be truly represented; and, finally, that the first stage in the development of associations consists in societies of consummation (consommation), which furnish their members opportunity to unite their capital. It is declared to be the duty of all working-men to strive to effect the reforms which are indispensable to the accomplishment of these aims.

MADAME THERESE KOSSUTH died on the first of this month at Turin. Her remains, according to her last wishes, will be carried to Genoa, and there deposited without ceremonies in the English Protestant burying-ground at San Benigno, by the side of her daughter, whom she follows after an interval of three years. She herself was in her fifty-fifth year. Mrs. Moore, the widow of the poet, died at Sloperton Cottage on the 4th, at the age of sixty-eight.

A STATUE of François Arago was inaugurated at his birth-place, the little town of Estagel, in the department of the Pyrénées-Orientales, in France, on the 31st of last month. It was the design of M. Oliva, and was cast in Paris by M. Thiébaut. Arago stands with a celestial globe in his left hand, in the act of performing a demonstration. A great throng from the country round attended the ceremony, which was followed by a select dinner of the dignitaries who graced the occasion with their presence. The president was M. Isaac Pereire, the deputy of the department in the Corps Législatif. The Institute and the Polytechnic School had also their representatives. A neat little bit of adulation, worthy of the days of Tiberius and the pen of Tacitus, was conveyed in a toast of Senator Renault, which began:

"Gentlemen, I love bronze; I love this sacred metal, which now makes war and now transmits to posterity the venerated effigies of our country's great men. By this double title is not bronze indeed the Imperial metal? and should our thoughts not rise respectfully from the statue of Estagel to the throne of France?"

We may remark the practice of erecting a work of art like this, not at some great centre of population nor in the line of ordinary travel, but in an obscure corner of the land, from which the man of scientific genius emerged to become famous. It will be long before our American cities are so redundant of good art as to suffer masterpieces to be hidden in country villages, or make our sculptors themselves content to dispense with the praises of the metropolis. And when will the whole country submit to be laid under contribution for the adornment of even a considerable city, except the Capital, as Italy is about to be by the city of Urbino for a monument to its offspring Raffaelle?

ON the 13th of this month, the editors of journals and reviews in Russia, who were so disposed, could avail themselves of the new law extending the liberty of the press, or, perhaps we ought to say, modifying its subjection. Such as had previously informed the minister of the interior of their intention, and had deposited the requisite security, would be allowed from that day to publish their periodicals, without censorship, on their own responsibility. The minister of justice in Austria has advised the procurators-general to prosecute really serious offences of the press, but to avoid carefully all measures which might appear of a partizan character. The government, while declining "all prejudiced opinions," "will gratefully accept all well-founded criticisms of their acts."

THE Prusso-Austrian settlement of the disposal of the duchies has been declared to be simply an instance of gastronomical etiquette. Hitherto the two powers had been feeding from the same platter, as it were. Henceforth each will have a dish to itself.

The towns of Beaucaire and Gallargues, in France, share with Nismes the unenviable notoriety of introducing bull-fights as a popular pastime. The bishop of that city has issued a pastoral letter condemning these demoralizing spectacles. Besides the destruction of brute life, several cases are recorded of men, both within and without the arena, who have been gored to death by the infuriated objects of their cruelty.

THE foreign commerce of Russia amounted last year to $128,405,172, of which Finland is credited with $4,728,023. The aggregate exceeds that of 1863 by $22,825,731. So the imports for 1864 were $110,769,687, or $12,742,025 in excess of those of 1863; and this without including goods bought abroad by Government and various societies, which were exempted from duties.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

IS ANYBODY TO BE PUNISHED?

OUR readers may remember that after the first terrible shock caused by Mr. Lincoln's death was over, the attention of most people was turned with characteristic fortitude and practicalness to the search for sources of consolation. One of the first that presented itself was the reflection that Mr. Lincoln had probably done his work; that the crisis which had called him forth, and for which his faculties—his weaknesses even—eminently fitted him, having passed over, a man of different mould was needed to deal with the state of things which it had left behind it. Mr. Lincoln, it was said, was firm, honest, sagacious, noble-minded; but he was too merciful, the impulses of his heart were too tender; in his abhorrence of sin there was mingled too much charity for the sinner. What we wanted, now that the war was over, was a man of coarser fibre, of harder heart, and greater determination, to save for us the fruits of our struggle; a man who would withstand traitors' wiles and traitors' tears with the same heroic pertinacity that Mr. Lincoln had withstood their steel; a man, in short, who would do justice, simple, even-handed justice; who would punish the guilty and protect the weak and innocent to the full extent of his power. The opinions about Mr. Johnson's qualifications, in those first dark days, were, of course, very varied; but there was one point on which they all agreed, and that was that he was just the man to punish traitors. Other things he might fail to do; but this he was sure to do.

The popular impression on this point was so strong that many simple people began to entertain fears that we were entering on a reign of terror, and that Mr. Johnson, with his bitter personal experience of rebel rule, would use his newly acquired powers with remorseless violence. The Southern leaders began to provide for their personal safety, and all the old women in Europe looked every mail for accounts of wholesale executions by the American Marat. Mr. Johnson himself seemed to take pains to confirm the prevalent opinion of the severity of his intentions. In every declaration which he made of his policy, during the few weeks following Mr. Lincoln's death, he placed the punishment of treason first amongst his duties, and on high grounds of policy as well as of justice. He placed it even above that of punishing the assassins of Mr. Lincoln. In an address to the employees of the Treasury Department, on the 17th of April, he said:

"I have always thought theft was a crime, and should be punished as a crime; that arson was a great crime, and should be punished as such; that murder was a dreadful crime, and should be punished as such; and that treason was the greatest of all crimes, and should be punished as such."

To a deputation of the clergy, he said, on the same day:

"The assassination of any man, high or low, was a crime of the blackest dye. Especially diabolical was it when the blow was struck at the loved and honored head of a great nation in the very moment of triumph. But the horrible crime was only a portion of the greatest of crimes—the attempted assassination of the nation. And he believed that the American people felt it to be so. Treason was a crime, and not a mere difference of political opinions."

On the 18th of April he expressed himself on this subject still more emphatically and deliberately, in replying to the Illinois delegation:

"Such a crime as the murder of a great and good man, honored and revered, the beloved and the hope of the people, springs not alone from a solitary individual of ever so desperate wickedness. We can trace its causes through successive steps, without my enumerating them here, back to that source which is the spring of all our woes. No one can say that if the perpetrator of this fiendish deed be arrested he should not undergo the extremest penalty the law knows for crime, none will say that mercy should interpose. But is he alone guilty? Here, gentlemen, you perhaps expect me to present some indication of my future policy. One thing I will say. Every era teaches its lesson. The times we live in are not without instruction. The American people must be taught—if they do not already feel—that treason is a crime and must be punished; that the Government will not always bear with its enemies; that it is strong, not only to protect, but to punish. When we turn to the criminal code and examine the catalogue of crimes, we there find arson laid down as a crime, with its appropriate penalty; we find there theft and robbery and murder given as crimes; and there, too, we find the last and highest of crimes—treason. With other and inferior offences our people are familiar. But in our peaceful history treason has been almost unknown. The people must understand that it is the blackest of crimes, and will be surely punished. I make this allusion not to excite the already exasperated feelings of the public, but to point out the principles of public justice which should guide our action at this particular juncture, and which accord with sound public morals. Let it be engraven on every heart that treason is a crime, and traitors shall suffer its penalty. While we are appalled, overwhelmed, at the fall of one man in our midst by the hand of a traitor, shall we allow men—I care not by what weapons—to attempt the life of the state with impunity? While we strain our minds to comprehend the enormity of this assassination, shall we allow the nation to be assassinated? . . . When the question of exercising mercy comes before me, it will be considered calmly, judicially—remembering that I am the Executive of the nation. I know men love to have their names spoken of in connection with acts of mercy; and how easy it is to yield to this impulse. But we must not forget that what may be mercy to the individual is cruelty to the state. In the exercise of mercy there should be no doubt left that this high prerogative is not used to relieve a few at the expense of the many."

We might multiply these quotations still further. The paramount duty of punishing traitors continued for some weeks to be the burden of all his speeches; and that portion of the public who felt it to be of the highest importance that the first time in the history of the Republic that treason had been committed on a great scale, the law should be at once put in force against as many of the traitors as might be necessary to stamp their crime with due execration and due solemnity, were satisfied that Andrew Johnson was their man. Five months have elapsed since these declarations were made, and during that interval not a single step has been taken to punish anybody for treason; and not one word is now ever heard from the President on any such subject. A very large portion of his time is, on the contrary, passed in listening to applications for pardons, and telling the applicants "to write them out and put them on file," a duty which, we say it with all deference, might be very efficiently performed by a clerk for fifteen hundred dollars a year. There are now on file 12,000 applications of this nature. They are, of course, acted upon very slowly, and we are sorry to say that those who wait their turn in their homes have to wait long enough, while the more prominent and energetic rebels, who can come on to Washington and secure a personal interview with the President, through the aid of some old political crony, find no difficulty in getting their case "attended to" immediately.

Now, we are not calling for wholesale vengeance, proscription, or confiscation, but we think the country ought to know what were the reasons which made the duty of punishing treason seem so pressing in April last, and whether they have in the interval lost their force. We now hear no talk of punishing anybody for such an offence except Davis, and although we undoubtedly believe him to be the guiltiest of all, if any be guilty, the difference in degree is not so great as to make him worthy of death while Cobb, Wise, Toombs, & Co. go free, and settle down peaceably on the soil they have for four years helped to drench with fratricidal blood. If it be the opinion of the Government that the clause of the Constitution defining treason, and the act of Congress attaching the penalty to the offence, are mistakes or nullities, and that defeat on the battle-field is all the punishment that either justice or policy calls for, the public ought to know it, that it may express its opinion about it. If the Government does not think so, and still believes treason to be the first and worst of crimes, let us have the traitors, or as many of them as may be deemed expedient, brought to a fair and open trial; and this done, let us have an end to pardon-filing, and pardon-broking, and oath-taking, and all the rest of that time-killing and demoralizing farce by which the country is now amused at Washington.

Moreover, a large number of military officers who were educated by the United States, who had sworn fidelity to the United States flag, and who, as its soldiers, owed it a peculiar allegiance, recognized by men of honor in all countries as peculiarly solemn and binding, four years ago deserted their colors, and went over to the enemy. Resignation in the face of the enemy, for the purpose of following him, is, of course, simply desertion. Hundreds who did this (to the soldier) accursed thing are now roving about Northern and Southern cities, jovial, unabashed, unrepentant. What we want to know is, whether a crime of this sort is regarded in the American army as punishable or not; if so, whether defeat on the battle-field is the only penalty of which it is considered worthy. This is a question which ought to be settled now once for all, for the manner of its settlement must affect the notions of discipline and of military obligation that will prevail in our armies for generations to come.

PERRY ON GOVERNMENT.

Governor Perry's message to the State Convention of South Carolina may be taken as a full and frank expression of the opinions entertained on the great political questions of the day by nearly everybody in that State, and, we may fairly infer, in most other parts of the South. He assures us, in express terms, that there are no political parties and no differences of sentiment amongst South Carolinians. He exhorts the Convention to abolish slavery formally, not because they have changed their minds as to its social or political value, but because it is only in this way that they can get from under military rule, and prevent a continuance of that protection to the freedmen which is now afforded by "the whole military force of the United States." He exhorts them to treat the freedmen kindly, but adds, "that legislation will be required to regulate the relative duties of the employer and employee."

What will be the nature of that legislation? We cannot tell. We at the North, once the State is back in the Union, will have no control over it whatever. What course it will take, we can only conjecture from what we see and hear of the feelings current amongst the Southern people at present as to the negro's status and rights. On this point our correspondent's letter this week contains some instructive revelations. In re-adjusting the basis of representation in the State, Gov. Perry recommends that three-fifths of the freedmen be counted in the estimates of population, thus leaving the lower counties their old predominance, while denying the majority of their population all power in the government.

It is needless to say he is emphatically opposed to negro suffrage; and not to negro suffrage only, but to negro citizenship. On this point his trumpet gives no uncertain sound. He says:

"The radical Republican party North are looking with great interest to the action of the Southern States in reference to negro suffrage, and whilst they admit that a man should be able to read and write and have a property qualification in order to vote, yet they contend that there should be no distinction between voters on account of color. They forget that this is a white man's government, and intended for white men only, and that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the negro is not an American citizen under the Federal Constitution. That each and every State of the Union has the unquestioned right of deciding for herself who shall exercise the right of suffrage, is beyond all dispute. You will settle this grave question as the interest and honor of the State demand."

In the Dred Scott case it was decided that a negro could not sue or be sued in the United States Courts. He cannot sue or be sued in those of South Carolina either, and it is not, we believe, proposed to confer any new rights upon him; so that when Governor Perry and his new constitution step back into the Union again, the majority of the free inhabitants will be in a state of outlawry. And yet Perry and his confederates are complying to the full with all the conditions that President Johnson exacts of them.

The doctrine that "this is a white man's government, and intended for white men only," is, as the Perrys profess it, as monstrous a doctrine as was ever concocted; and if any State is allowed, at this crisis, with the light we now enjoy, to reorganize on this principle, it will not only be a fruitful source of trouble hereafter, but will make the very name of American democracy a hissing and a byword amongst all the nations of the earth. It is an adaptation to our circumstances and measures of the worst, most impious, and most nearly worn-out of all the articles of the old feudal creed, that laws or governments can exist only for a portion of the human beings who live under them, and whose labor and money maintain them. When it was sought to retain in England the stigma which mediæval bigotry had fixed on the Jew, it was proclaimed in the legislature, by Tory zealots, that that was a Christian country and Christian government, and that Jews were entitled to nothing better than protection from violence. To have propounded in France, before the Revolution, the theory that the French government was not the government of the king and the gentilshommes would by them have been regarded as flat blasphemy. Catholic emancipation was long resisted in Ireland, on the plea that it was a Protestant country and Protestant government. In European Turkey the ten millions of Christians are, in the eyes of the two millions of Mussulmans, but strangers and sojourners, like the old French peasantry,—"gens taillables et corvéables sans merci, ni miséricorde." There is, in short, no corner in the world in which bigotry or caste feeling has found a home, in which it has not sought to assert itself by excluding a portion of the population from civil rights.

To have this theory of the nature of our government boldly thrust in our faces now, after the events of the last four years, by men who have come red-handed from the battle-field, and to whose garments the blood of our sons and brothers still clings; and to know that the President, who owes in part at least his ability to be President at all to the valor and blood of the colored troops, concurs with them in this scandalous repudiation of democratic principles, are things which the country, we trust, will find it hard to bear. We trust, when the proper time comes, the South Carolinian philosophers will be taught in good earnest that democracy, as Americans understand it, means the government of the people by the people for the people, and that "people" means human beings every shade of complexion.

THE CONFEDERATE BONDHOLDERS.

The English holders of the Confederate cotton loan have given the crowning proof of their folly by holding a meeting for the purpose of bolstering one another up in the belief that the United States Government is liable for the debts of the Confederacy. The stupidity and ignorance which were displayed on that occasion were so stupendous as to explain much that was previously incomprehensible in the conduct of these worthies during the war. One can hardly wonder now that men who gravely propose to send a deputation to Washington to ask for the payment of their debts should have had enough confidence in Spence, Davis, and Prioleau to lend the money. In fact, it is discreditable in the highest degree to the Richmond Jeremy Diddlers that, having such donkeys to deal with, they did not succeed in getting more out of them than they did.

They managed at the meeting, by the aid of some of that luminous reasoning on international obligations with which James Spence and the Morning Herald have made the world so familiar, to extract from the Vice-Chancellor's decision in the case of the Prioleau cotton a conclusion binding the United States not only to pay the liens attaching to that particular piece of goods, but all other liabilities of the Confederacy. This it is, we presume, which drew forth from Mr. Seward last week the indignant letter of repudiation addressed to Mr. Adams. The occasion seems hardly worthy of his notice. It would have been time enough to squelch their pretensions when they got anybody with more honesty or common sense than themselves to support them.

There are two points in Mr. Seward's letter which have attracted the attention of lawyers, though we believe no journal but the New York Tribune has touched upon them. He denies that the Confederate government "ever was a government de facto, or in any sense a political power, capable of . . maintaining corporate rights in any form." But if not, and if the United States does not claim the Liverpool cotton, as its successor, the question arises, in what character does the latter come into court? If the cotton was sent to Liverpool during the war by private individuals only, what legal claim can this Government have upon it? The confiscation act can clearly not be executed in England, supposing the cotton to fall into the category of rebel property. If the Vice-Chancellor's decision that the Confederates were a de facto government be knocked aside, on what ground would he be justified in interfering with Prioleau's property in it?

His decision, of course, whatever it might be, would affect nothing except the disposition of Confederate property within his jurisdiction.

It would no more touch the general obligations of the United States Government than the motions of the planets. For it is, we imagine, known to everybody but the Confederate bondholders that, while a government is bound to pay the debts of another regularly established government which it overthrows, and whose place and powers it assumes, those who lend to a revolutionary government stake everything on the chance of its succeeding. No political philosopher has yet soared so far above the regions of common sense as to hold that an established government is bound to pay the debts of everybody who chooses to rebel against it.

We believe very curious and personal revelations are shortly forthcoming as to the real source of the devotion which some of the Confederate prophets, such as Mr. James Spence, displayed in the cause of Southern independence. The captured archives are unfolding some strange tales.

THE FENIAN MOVEMENT.

The Fenian movement, which is now causing so much uneasiness in Ireland, is calculated to dishearten all those who look for the regeneration of Ireland through the exertions of Irishmen; for the simple reason that it proves that the great mass of them have not profited by experience. The organization is neither more nor less than an attempt to dismember the British empire, by a rising of half-armed peasants, without a treasury, commissariat, credit, or leaders, and this in a small island, with the sea in possession of the enemy. What makes it all the more absurd, is the fact that the clergy and the gentry are all opposed to it, and from one of these two classes any military movement in Ireland directed against the Government must draw leaders and inspiration, in order to ensure its rising for even a single day above the dimensions of a riot, as everybody knows who possesses any acquaintance with the mental and moral condition of the people. Moreover, the Protestant population of Ulster and Leinster, one of the dourest and toughest races in the world, would resist it to the last man, and would be supported by England with as much vigor and fierceness as if her existence were at stake. The Fenian movement, therefore, is really a movement for bringing about the massacre and starvation of a body of unfortunates on whom bad government has already inflicted the direst misery.

There is one other reason which must prevent any sensible friend of political progress from wishing the movement success, and that is, that its result, if it did succeed, would inevitably be a state of things which he could not wish to see. A government established in Ireland by a peasants' revolution would inevitably be a sacerdotal government, very much resembling that of the papacy at Rome. If laymen held office, they would only govern in name; their policy and ideas would be shaped by the clergy, and we all know what sort of political organization would be produced by a process of this sort. There are amongst the masses in Ireland no materials for the foundation or administration of a government based on modern ideas. The Irish people are unquestionably, politically, one or two stages behind the whole of the Western world. Who is to blame for this state of things is a question on which we cannot here enter. The fact remains.

They emerged from the tribal condition towards the end of the sixteenth century. They were governed down to that period by an archaic code of laws, displaying in no respect much greater range or depth of legal ideas than the code of Menu, or the Laws of the Twelve Tables, and this, it must be remembered, in the age of Bacon, Grotius, and d'Aguesseau. Had they then come in contact with a more advanced race, on terms of equality, they might have rapidly caught up with the rest of the civilized world. They were, however, met by a ruthless conqueror, and had to endure, for two centuries more, all that unscrupulous power can inflict on helpless weakness. The result has been that the political ideas of other Christian nations have made very little impression on them, and they retain to this hour, and show it even in America, a subjection to the influences and traditions of clan-life, a tendency to follow persons rather than principles, and to vote in droves under a chief, an inability to grasp political ideas as something distinct from politicians, which render them, in spite of their wonderful capacity for discipline and subordination, all but incapable of carrying on a free government. It is true that the same incapacity has shown itself in France and other countries, but for reasons wholly different, and which indicate a very different stage of political development.

CANADIAN POLICY.

One would imagine that the continual draining away of the population in a country so large in wilderness-land and so naked of people, would be, beyond all other difficulties, the "skeleton in the closet" to the hearts of a provident administration. The Roman Catholic bishop of Toronto, in an address a fortnight since to the clergy of his diocese, gave this loss of population as a reason for not proceeding now to rebuild St. Patrick's church. He said the young men are leaving the country in every direction. By the Government census of 1861, the Catholics of the diocese numbered 42,000 souls, and now the clergy report only 30,000. As many as 4,000 Catholics have gone from Toronto city alone to the States, in pursuit of employment; and in Lower Canada, he said, "the people were leaving it by tens of thousands." And yet, the Montreal Herald remarks, "no steps appear to be seriously taken to meet this state of things." What steps any one would propose, "seriously," we do not know. It looks to us like a very difficult problem. But it is not this which weighs upon the spirits of the present "responsible government" of Canada.

On Saturday, September 16, a speech of two hours in length was made in the Legislative Assembly, at Quebec, by the Hon. George Brown, editor of the Toronto Globe, and now President of the Executive Council, explaining "the policy of the Government" respecting the purchase of the interests of the Hudson's Bay Company in the territories lying north and north-west of Canada, up to the Arctic Ocean. In his late visit to England he obtained an agreement from the Imperial Government to annex all that territory to Canada, provided the Provincial Government shall first cancel all the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company. The company demands the payment of a million pounds sterling for conceding only that part of the territory required for settlement, reserving the entire monopoly of the fur trade, which amounts to ten millions yearly. Mr. Brown thought this demand quite exorbitant, and that it is indispensable to obtain a surrender of all the rights of the company, so that the settlers should have the benefit of the fur trade. He now proposes to negotiate with the company on this basis, that Canada now stands in the shoes of the Imperial Government, having all the rights except those of the company; that the question is an open one, whether the company possesses any legal rights whatever in the territory; that the present proprietors paid but a million and a half sterling when they bought out the old company, which was less than the stock and fixtures were worth, besides the claim on the American Government, which they profess to estimate at a million of dollars; and, finally, that it is better for Canada to give something handsome to settle all questions and avoid litigation. He will devote the winter to these negotiations, but, as soon as spring opens, he intends in any event to extend jurisdiction over all the territory that is not claimed by the company. And he holds that Canada is legally "entitled to every foot of land which the French held at the time of the cession in 1763."

Mr. Brown evidently cherishes this project as a specialty of his own, on which he expects to hang his political fortune. He has "taken a deep interest in it for nearly twenty years," and has himself managed all the steps by which the business has been forwarded thus far. And he is happy to have brought his colleagues to agree with him in approving the course he had indicated, "for obtaining the speedy possession of the country before the Americans flocked into it." Here we have an inkling of what troubles Mr. Brown. His thoughts are not occupied with a concern about his own people going out of Canada, but with the tormenting fear of the Americans crowding into the North-west, down the Red River of the North, and up the Saskatchawan, and so on to the gold fields of Frazer's River, and everywhere that enterprise can get the advantage of sloth and fear. For we are told that "in this connection he alluded to information he had recently received as to the probability of large numbers going in from the States, by the way of St. Paul, to the gold fields, as showing the necessity of adopting the speediest method possible of getting a settlement of the question." It is an urgent case, evidently, and not very easy to manage satisfactorily. The company see how eager he is to buy, and must be strongly tempted to stand out for the largest price that would have any chance of being paid. And on the other hand, the Canadians, who have already almost a world of unoccupied land, with their people all the time going to the States, will not be easily persuaded to pay five to ten millions of dollars just for more land. They do not see the advantage of having more territory to survey, to penetrate with roads and railroads and canals, to furnish with magistrates and police, and to fortify and defend, when they are already so deeply in debt, with expenses beyond their income, and no present probability of an increase of revenue. It looks dark, but something must be done "before the Americans flock in!" What shall it be?

The Provincial Parliament is adjourned. The Atlantic cable is broken. The railroad to Halifax is not begun, because it is not settled who is to pay. The militia is left to take care of itself. The defences are indefinitely postponed. The Confederacy is laid over till next year. The great Republic is not exploded. The Reciprocity Treaty is at an end. The Canadians are running out at one end, and the Americans are flocking in at the other. Measures are in train to press forward the construction of the railroad from St. Paul to Puget Sound without delay in the North-west, and other movements will soon be made towards the free navigation of the St. Lawrence in the North-east. The question recurs, What is the policy of the Canadian Government?

"A YANKEE" ON NEGROES.

"A YANKEE," New York correspondent of the London Spectator, a few weeks ago, commenting on the Davenport case at Greenwich, quoted Deacon Button's extraordinary address to the negro, and declared that although there was a difference of opinion upon the subject in the community, those who approved of it, "though they said less, thought, and what was of greater importance, felt much more, were very largely in the majority." He told, also, of a professor in the college where he had studied, "a gentle, firm, wise man, with a large soul and wide sympathies," "one of our strongest anti-slavery men for years before the war," who, after a visit to the South, declared to him "that he came back hating slavery more than ever, but loathing the negro with an unutterable loathing." And he tells of "an editor of one of the leading anti-slavery papers in the country, and one which advocates giving suffrage to the freed slaves," having said to him, "These negroes are doubtless here by a dispensation of Providence; but"—with an earnestness which a whimsical smile could not conceal—"O that the Lord had been pleased to dispense his negroes somewhere else!"

These gentlemen he puts forward as fair representatives of the genuine feeling of the North with regard to the colored race. He even cites the antipathy of the Irish in the cities to the negroes as an evidence of the "awful gulf of separation which exists between the two races in this country," and informs his English readers that there could be no greater mistake than that of European writers, "that opposition to slavery and a liking to the negro, or at least a special good-will to him, must go together, and vice versa." He adds:

"I tell you frankly that the mass of the people here were glad to fight against slavery, but had no intention of fighting for the negro. They felt that slavery was a great crime, a sin against human nature. They wished to purge the republic of that wickedness, but they had no particular sympathy with, though most of them much compassion for, the race against whom the wrong was committed. You in Europe seemed to be thinking about the individual negroes; we, in the mass, thought little or nothing of the individual negroes, but much of the barbarous institution of slavery. To restrain that within such bounds as could be placed to it, and to relieve ourselves to the utmost of our ability of responsibility for its existence under our flag, we were willing to accept a great war, and to fight it through with four years' unprecedented waste of life and treasure. But to free those individual negroes held in bondage at the South, you may be sure we would not have sacrificed the lives of one thousand of our brothers, not to say of more than one hundred thousand. Even if by freeing them we could have raised them to the position of the British agricultural laborer, we should not have felt called upon to make our homes desolate throughout the land to attain that end (let those who would have decided otherwise for themselves condemn us); and we knew that to the negroes of the present generation freedom would, with rare exceptions, be a boon only in name, and to hundreds of thousands, as it has already been to thousands, a death-warrant. But as to the institution of slavery, the perpetuation under our sanction and by our protection of that charter of wrong, cruelty, and degradation, was quite another matter."

The close of his letter is the most remarkable part of it:

"This feeling ('loathing' for the negro) pervades all classes here, without being affected at all by culture or position. It is often most improperly called a hatred of the negro, for it exists among those who are willing to do all in their power for his welfare, who never treat him or speak to him but with kindness and consideration, and who would gladly see him develop himself to the extent of his capacity in a community of his own race. It is oftener and more improperly called a feeling of caste, for it has nothing to do with the position of the negro, past or present, as a slave, and it would not be in the least modified in the case of a negro who was as wise and as magnificent as Solomon. To compare it, as some do, with the mediæval hatred for the Jew is to forget that it has no relation to the religious belief or the crimes of the forefathers of those in regard to whom it exists. It does not depend upon color, for men of other races, who are darker than some negroes, or than most mulattoes, do not elicit it. It is purely a matter of race. To those who have it the reason simply is, that the negro is—a negro. Now this aversion, which is not new (it is, at least, as old as the time of Shakespeare), and which may be called unreasoning, but hardly blind, is one of the great moral forces,—nay, is the great moral force, which must be taken into consideration in the restoration of this country to tranquillity and prosperity. The difficulty is no less at the North than at the South. And there is this element in it which seems almost impossible of elimination,—the all-pervading consciousness that if political privileges are given to the negro, political position and social intercourse must inevitably follow. The negro at the ballot-box means the negro in Congress, in all public places, in the parlor, at the table, in the marriage-bed. It is as if you were to have negroes as 5 to 3 in some of your counties, as 3 to 2 and as 2 to 1 in others, and scattered freely through the rest of the country; and as if you might look for negroes in the House of Commons, if not in the House of Lords, for negro brothers-in-law and mulatto grandchildren. At such a prospect, our people, with exceedingly rare exceptions, revolt. I am not defending this aversion, or saying that it is either right or reasonable. I merely tell you of its existence, and that it must needs be considered by wise statesmen as much as a Mussulman's horror of pork, or a Brahmin's loathing of a tanner. A YANKEE."

"A Yankee" is in general an able, sagacious writer, who has done the Northern cause good service during the war, though his letters have all been more or less marred by his attempting to secure English sympathy for the free States in the late struggle, by showing the existence here of strong aristocratic or caste feeling, and by making out Northern society very much less democratic, and far more "genteel," than "good society" in London has been pleased to imagine it. He has evidently supposed that if he could prove that we had not departed so very far, after all, from the great British model, that we still retained a class to be despised and a class to despise it, the English public would at once recognize the wrong it had done the North, and fall upon its neck and blubber out its sympathy.

This, in our opinion, was a great mistake, though one into which it was not unnatural for a writer who evidently himself winces under democracy to fall. It proved nothing against his reasoning power, however, which the letter before us does; and we should be astonished by some of the absurdities which the latter contains, if we were not familiar with the extraordinary influence which the discussion of the negro and his condition almost invariably exerts in muddling the brain of those who "loathe" him. That a people can have "compassion" for a race which their "gentle, firm, wise men, with large souls and wide sympathies" "unutterably loathe," is a singular assertion, which "A Yankee" will find it difficult to get even so gullible a public as the English to believe; and to assert that the American people were ready to incur "unprecedented waste of life," and "make their homes desolate," for the purpose of destroying slavery, while hating the slaves with a hatred which, as "A Yankee" describes it, surpasses in intensity all hatreds that human beings have ever felt towards their fellows before, is to claim for them a power of abstraction, a dexterity in making distinctions, for which nobody who is not afflicted with "negro on the brain" will give them credit. He might as well tell us that all free white citizens were capable of working the differential calculation. It is possible that the Anglo-Saxon race may some day or other get its moral nature into such subjection to its will as to be able to rise to the loftiest heights of indignation over the ill-treatment of an object which it utterly abominates, and be ready to risk life and limb for its deliverance; but that time is not yet, and the world moves slowly.

The best of the argument, however, has still to come. "The negro at the ballot-box means the negro in Congress, in all public places, in the parlor, at the table, and in the marriage-bed. It is as if you were to have negroes as five to three in some of your counties, as three to two, and as two to one in others, scattered freely through the rest of the country, and as if you might look for negroes in the House of Commons, if not in the House of Lords, for negro brothers-in-law, and mulatto grandchildren. At such a prospect our people, with exceedingly rare exceptions, revolt." We have not often read a passage from the pen of an educated man with more astonishment than the foregoing. It thus appears that you have only to give the negro the franchise, and the "unutterable loathing" felt for him by the white race will completely disappear. He will be elected by white votes to the highest offices in the State, and penetrate into white families by marriage; "the gentle, firm, wise men, with large souls and wide sympathies," who now cannot bear the sight of him, will be glad of him for a son-in-law, and "the editors of the leading anti-slavery papers," who now wish "the Lord would dispense him somewhere else," will ask him to dinner. We recommend after this to the Medical Association as a good subject for discussion the "occult influence of the negro on the nervous fibre of the Caucasian race."

We need hardly say the Saturday Review copies "A Yankee's" remarks with great gusto, and makes them the foundation for a charge of wholesale humbug and hypocrisy against the North.

Correspondence.

THE FEELINGS OF THE SOUTHERN NEGROES.

The following is a letter from the gentleman from whose correspondence we have already published extracts in Nos. 11 and 12 of The Nation. All that he says regarding the condition of the South derives a peculiar value from the fact that he has been sent to report on it by an association of business men in Massachusetts, and for purely business purposes:

Orangeburg, S. C., September 8, 1865.

To the Editor of The Nation:

The sole ambition of the freedman at the present time appears to be to become the owner of a little piece of land, there to erect an humble home, and to dwell in peace and security at his own free will and pleasure: if he wishes to cultivate the ground to cotton on his own account, to be able to do so without any one to dictate to him hours or systems of labor; if he wishes instead to plant corn or sorghum or sweet potatoes, to be able to do that free from any outside control—in one word, to be free, to control his own time and efforts without anything that can remind him of past sufferings in bondage.

This is their idea, their desire, and their hope. It is common to all, but much stronger among the married and middle-aged. Ask almost any one what they are going to do this winter, and they will answer you, "I'se got a sister"—a wife or mother, as the case might be—"in Virginia, and I'm going to look her up and fetch her home." Or they are going home themselves; that may be in Mississippi, or Kentucky, or any other of the Southern Stutes furthest from them. One and all they have a journey to make, and generally they are just from some point, oftentimes quite distant. I am more than inclined to doubt if they are ever again induced to work in large gangs on large plantations for the Southerners. The mere offer of wages, however large, does not appear to tempt them to make engagements for any length of time—a whole season, for instance. They are generally willing enough to perform job-work at a reasonable rate, if it will not take them more than a day or two, but it is difficult and well-nigh impossible to keep them steadily at work a week at a time. They are apt to believe, in the matter of contracts, judging from their past experiences, that the fairer the promises made to them, the less likely they are to be kept. Then, again, they all appear fearful of forfeiting their newly acquired liberty in some manner. The raising of cotton is associated in the negroes' minds with memories of the overseer, the driver, and the lash—in fact, with the whole system of slavery, and they appear to think them inseparable. I judge that a great change has come over them since the war has ceased. Thus, while they regarded the issue as at all doubtful, they were content to live on in the same old way, and to wait for the event to be assured. So long as the Southerners remained in the field there were doubts, for their masters were constantly assuring them that they never, never, never could be whipped. That is all changed now, and the difference in the behavior of the blacks is to be noticed at once. The present race of Southern men are most of them too set in their way ever to change their opinions. Here and there one will be found smart enough to endeavor to assimilate himself to Northern ideas of progress, but as a whole they will be left behind in the race of civilization. It may be that I labor under the objection of being too near the object, and cannot see distinctly, nor judge as correctly, as those at a greater distance, but it does appear to me as though it would take years, at least, to restore order out of this chaos. Of one thing, however, there can be no doubt, the introduction of the Northern element and principles will do more toward the re-establishment of law and order than any other one thing. The Southerners' minds are in a peculiar state just now. They listen to all hints as to the improvement of their situation, and the sensible ones are anxious, and even eager, to give the free-labor system a fair trial, although not one in a hundred but will pronounce its success to be an impossibility. There are not wanting at the South a class of men, a small minority as yet, it is true, but, as a class, influential, who think they see an opportunity to make money by falling in with the new order of things and co-operating heartily. Such men as these will offer, and are now offering, to pay the blacks fair prices for their labor next season on the plantations. I know of offers of fifteen dollars a month, with board, lodging, medical attendance, the right to raise stock and to cultivate an acre of ground on his own account, as garden, to first-class field hands, made by Southerners of this class. Now, in my opinion, this is very fair pay. Others offer one-fourth of the crop, of all crops. But the determination of the blacks not to work cotton so long as they can find other work to do, is all but invincible. Those Northern men who commence operations early next season will be able to make crops, for they can hire away the steadiest and best hands from their former owners, who have folded their hands and are waiting, like Micawber, for something to turn up. As to slavery, that man must be blind indeed who cannot see that it is as dead as the Pharaohs and only awaits its burial. Even if the North should acquiesce in its re-establishment, it would be impossible. The black man is another being; the shackles are off, and only by a terrible and doubtful struggle could they be replaced. The fact is, that while we are debating what amount of capacity the black man possesses, he has gone beyond the anticipations of his warmest friends—he not only realizes that he is free, but he is not at all disposed to accept any restrictions on his perfect freedom. Those who have been flattering themselves that he would have to pass through a transition state, will be disappointed; the only trouble now is to prevent him from mistaking license for liberty: to inculcate the doctrine of responsibility among the blacks now should be the aim of every Northern man at the South to-day, for it is only from the Northern men the blacks will stoop to learn. Our white soldiers from a love of mischief have been filling the ears of the blacks with the most ridiculous and outrageous stories. It is easy enough to make them believe them. Thus, when I tell them that it is not true that the lands are to be divided among them, not one in ten fully believes me. "Has n't General Sherman set aside the Sea Islands for them?" "What 's the use to give us our freedom if we can't stay where we were raised, and own our houses where we were born, and our little pieces of ground?" The black soldiers are responsible for the bad habits of the freedmen to a great extent. I am at a loss to see what possible good their presence here is now. If to humble the Southern pride, that end has been fully accomplished. I have heard black soldiers make the most insulting remarks to Southerners, who are too glad to get by with only that to take notice of them. The one thing before all others is, however, to educate, educate, educate! Blacks and whites, old and young, rich and poor, education is their need alike.

A.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XI.

Davidson Co., N. C., Sept. 11, 1865.

I left Greensboro' this morning early, and without regret, for my stay there had been far from comfortable. It is a small, hilly town with only twenty-seven hundred inhabitants; but boasts a hotel styled "The Metropolitan," in which I took up my quarters. To me they gave a room with a bed in it, and a wash-basin, and a chair in which one could sit if the back of it was first set against the wall. My horse had the freedom of a small yard, where, without so much shelter as the shade of a tree, he was constantly exposed to sun or rain. My room, also, was open to the elements, for on one night I was driven from my bed by a deluge of rain-water pouring from the boarded ceiling, which flooded and soaked the floor, and rendered the room nearly uninhabitable for two days afterwards. The hotel table was entirely in keeping with the chambers. Such things in themselves are not unendurable; but the traveller's equanimity is sure to be disturbed when he finds that landlords can push impudence and extortion so far as to demand five dollars a day for such board and lodging. In Danville we fared somewhat better, but not without having somewhat more to pay, the charge for horse and man per day being six dollars and a quarter. Yet nearly every article of food here used is cheaper in these country towns than in the Northern Atlantic States.

As I rode away, the day was grey and soft, promising rain, but soon all the clouds were dissipated and the sun shone oppressively. At the hotel they told me that Salisbury was forty miles distant; at a blacksmith's shop a mile and a half from the village, the distance was said to be only thirty-five miles; after an hour's riding I enquired again, and was told that the men folks called it forty-six miles to Salisbury and six miles back to Greensboro'; to-night my host tells me that really the distance between the two places is fifty-two miles by the country roads, and that I have travelled thirty-one miles since morning. Some of these people, I find, have never passed beyond the bounds of the county in which they were born, and have learned nothing of places which they have not visited.

My road has led me over sandy hills, sterile in appearance, and evidently occupied by people belonging to the class of poor whites; but the country seemed more thickly settled than the richer districts further north. I saw white women as well as white men busy in the fields, and there were as many white people at work as negroes. Whenever a good opportunity presented itself, I engaged them in conversation, and usually found them not averse to leave their labor and talk for a while. Six or seven miles out of Greensboro', seeing a farmer in his sorghum fields stripping the leaves from the cane, I stopped and enquired about the road. He gave me the desired information, and, in answer to his questions, I said I was riding to Salisbury from Lynchburg. He was a lean, hard-featured man, past the middle age, who owned about a hundred acres of land, he said, and was "an original secessioner." I asked if he farmed his land without help:

"I ha' n't no help jest now, he answered. Most o' our hirelin' men went off to the war, and pretty much all on 'em got killed, or died off one way and another. I do n't know but all on 'em out o' this neighborhood is gone; I a' n't sure as one come back. My wife's brother holp me in plantin'. But we a' n't doin' much anyhow this season, and I am by myself now."

"I should think you 'd hire negroes; you have employed them, I suppose."

"Oh yes; before the war, you know, I hed black ones then every year. But we could make 'em work then. I would n't expect to make a crop with 'em now; they 're no account. A'n't it so in your country?"

"The farmers in Virginia are almost all saying the same thing."

"Exactly; it 's jest so everywhar. I tried one this year. He come along about a month, and wanted to come on and work for me; I had a house stannin' empty. 'Yer all so d—n lazy,' says I, 'since ye call yerselves free, running yere and thar from pillar to post, that I do n't want none o' ye.' But he 'lowed he could work well, never was a sassy nigger, would n't ha' left but his master told him to go; only try him, and so on. 'Wal,' says I, 'I'll try yer, and yer to understand that I won't hev no back-talk, and yer to do jest what I say or ye' ll find me out. I sprawl a nigger d—n quick.' That 's jest the kind o' man I am; I never could stan' any back-talk from one on 'em. They know me, too; a free nigger 'd jest as soon see the devil as see me. This boy promised faithful, and that evenin' I lent him the cart to go and bring up his things and his wife; hed n't much, you know, but sich as 't was I let him hev the cart to move it, and I put him into the house. Next mornin' I was out in the field with my brother-in-law gittin' out manure, and arter we 'd been at it a half hour, along come Mister Nigger. 'I been knockin' up some shelves,' says he, 'and I come to ax ye for a handful o' nails; that house needs fixin' bad, and I can't live thar unless I do somethin' to it.' 'D' ye see that ar shovel?' says I to him, 'and that ar cart? Pick up and go to work, or I 'll run ye off this place faster 'n ye come on to it. I did n't hire ye to make houses,' says I; 'I hired ye to work on the farm.'"

"What did he say to that?"

"Nothin'. He knew better. He took the shovel and worked right well for five or six days. Ye know how it is with 'em—for about three days it 's work as if they 'd break everything to pieces; but arter that it 's go out late and come in soon. He did n't say nothin' for a week, but kept at it pretty close, and then one night he packed up, him and his wife, and left. I knew tolerably well whar to find him—down the road a piece, 'long with some free niggers; so I gathered up some o' our boys, and we went down to this place whar I thought he was at, and told him he 'd make tracks before night, and if he was found in this neighborhood arter next day we 'd shoot him wharever we found him."

"Do you know where he went?"

"He settled down in a place about seven miles over here; but we sent word to some o' the boys thar, and they gathered up agin and run him out o' that. We a' n't agoin' to let niggers walk over us; we can take care o' our black ones as soon as the Yankees is gone. In Virginny, I reckon, yer better off; ye have the civil law thar."

I gave him some information as to the condition of things in Virginia: telling him that there was a Federal garrison at most of the county seats, to whom was entrusted the duty of protecting the colored population, while in North Carolina that matter was left in the hands of the home guards. He agreed with me that the negro could be more effectually repressed in his own State than in Virginia, but bewailed his proximity to Greensboro' with its Yankees and Superintendent of Freedmen, who appeared to think a negro was better than a white man.

I asked him if the people of Guilford County were not taking the oath of allegiance. Addressing me as a presumed Southerner and secessionist, he replied, in a slightly apologetic manner: "Yes, we be. I ha' n't tuck it yet myself; but the magistrates hev set a day, and I reckon everybody 'll take it. We hev to do it, ye know; we can't vote nor nothin' else till we 've tuck it. We 've got to git back into the Union, and we mout as well git back as soon as we can, and git the civil law. Do n't you look at it that way? Ye 've tak'n it in your country, a'n't ye?"

"Yes, every man has to take it before he can vote. I suppose the convention will take the State into the Union again, but it will have to admit that all the slaves are free."

"Yes, I reckon. But it 's jest a robbery, stealin' our property like that. That 's what I call it; jest what I say about ———. He 's up for the convention, and I 'm told, I ha' n't heard him myself, but they say he 's come out in favor o' repudiatin' all debts that hev been made durin' the war. 'It 's a d—n robbery and nothin' else,' says I, 'and we do n't need no sich men.' I do n't vote for him, and if I hed my way he should be led out with a rope round his neck, then bend down a saplin' and run him up. And I say the same about 'mancipation; it 's stealin'."

"You have six or seven candidates up, I see. Most of them talk alike, I suppose?"

"Wal, I do n't know. No, we know our men, I reckon. There 's Mr. H., up here—you passed his house a mile back—he wants to go. But we do n't need him. He was too busy keepin' men out o' the army all through the war, and then he 's in with all them triflin' people, and he 's a great friend to the black ones. We do n't need him, and he won't go, I do n't believe. We want men that 'll keep the niggers in their place. If we let a nigger git equal with us, the next thing we know he 'll be ahead of us. He 's so impudent and presumin'."

"Have you many of these Union people in this county? I've been told that they are a majority of your population."

"They a' n't; they 're scatterin', sir, scatterin', and the most is no account. I say, friend, would ye take a drink o' brandy? ye 'd be welcome if ye would; come up to the house and 'light."

The commander of the post at Greensboro' informed me that more than a hundred persons living in Guilford County had taken out licenses as distillers, and given a bond with two sureties to sell no spirits to enlisted men. There were more than another hundred, he thought, small manufacturers, who had not reported themselves at all, and a great many farmers who distilled no more than supplied the wants of their own families. It is chiefly peach and apple brandy that they manufacture, and most of it is said to be very fiery and unwholesome, on account of their imperfect method of rectifying it. Declining the farmer's courteous invitation, I bade him good morning and rode on my way. At the end of two hours it became time to give my horse something to eat, or rather to begin looking for a house at which a feed could be procured, for I have learned that it is not the first attempt which usually obtains it. To-day I stopped at four farms without meeting with success; they hardly had fodder enough for their own horses, they said.

In the course of my inquiries for lodging and horse-feed, I find that in the common speech of people in North Carolina, the phrase, "a poor chance," is not intended to convey any sense of doubt or contingency, but means that certainly the thing desired cannot be had. And, among other variations from ordinary usage in language, farewell is often substituted for good-by, and other words of leave-taking; and the past tense of the verb to help is formed in the ancient way, holp being used instead of helped. The l is silent in pronouncing the word.

At the fifth house, a long log cabin, my application was successful.

"Yes," said the woman to whom I made it, "ye can hev a feed, I reckon, if yer hoss 'll eat hay or cane. We ha' n't any corn yit, and we ha' n't raised any oats." I signified my willingness to take hay, and followed the woman to a crazy barn at a little distance from the house. I have seen a great many women on the roads and in the houses of this region whose appearance resembled hers. She was barefooted, and wore a man's hat, from beneath which escaped some locks of tangled hair; her sallow face was thin and dirty, and stained at the corners of the mouth with the juice of tobacco, which she chewed. The original colors of her cotton dress had run together and faded, till it had become of a uniform dingy white or clay color, that matched her complexion, and it clung about her as she walked with long strides. On one shoulder she carried a pitchfork, and a chain halter was thrown over the other. Unsaddling the horse and tying him in a business-like manner, she set hay before him, and then invited me to come into the house and rest; so I entered one of the two rooms and sat down in a rush-bottomed chair. Overhead skeins of brown and blue yarn were hanging from the cross-beams, and at a spinning-wheel near the fire-place a woman, younger than the other, was spinning cotton thread. She looked up as I entered, and nodded, but neither removed the pipe from her mouth nor spoke till I had sat for some minutes looking about me; then she said: "Be you a preacher, sir?" "No, ma'am," I said. "You 're a doctor then, I reckon?" I answered in the negative again. "I tuck notice o' your saddle-pockets, and I thought you mout be one or t' other," she said; after which remark she went on spinning and smoking in silence, and I made no attempt to continue the conversation, for half-a-dozen children were crying and fighting on the floor, so that nothing but their noise could be heard. After a while they became a little stiller, one of the older ones amusing the rest by placing my saddle-bags across her back, and creeping up and down in the character of the "preacher's hoss." I took advantage of the lull to ask the woman if they had regular preaching in that neighborhood.

"Over to High P'int they hev, and we hev it yer now and agin."

"What sort? Methodist?"

"Most all kinds—Presbyterian, and Missionary Baptist, and Hardshell, but there 's more o' the Methodists."

"What do you mean by Hardshell Baptists?"

"Them as believes in predestination. Everything 's foreseen from the foundation o' the world, they say, and nothin' comes out any different from it 's ordained. The Missionaries, they holds to free grace."

"What 's free grace?"

"Expect you know better 'n me. Salvation free, I reckon; but I never tuck to Baptists much. I 'm a Methodist myself. My husband's mother was a Hardshell."

"No, I do n't know much about it; I come from the North myself, and they have n't any Hardshells where I live."

"They hev the Methodists, do n't they?" "Yes," I told her, "a good many," and the thought seemed to please her. By-and-bye she said: "Be they makin' the laws in your country, mister?" "Laws about what?" I enquired. "Why, they do say you 're a-goin to take away all our land down yer, because we made the rebellion. But this State never did go out; we 's all Union through yer, and they should n't harrish us, for we could n't help it. My man used to lay out many a night for fear them volunteers would git him to go to the war. I hope they 'll make good laws."

Her husband had been drowned some months before, and not long afterward her son had died, so she was left alone to manage the farm. She never had been obliged to attend to such things before, she said; she did n't know how much land she owned, nor how heavy a tax she would have to pay; the land was almighty poor; it would n't fetch more 'n a bushel o' wheat to the acre, so much of it was washed out, and all guttered. She did n't know whar to hunt a man that would crap it for her. It was a mighty hard case for a widow woman with seven gal children and nary boy.

I told her I had seen that some of the landholders were renting out small farms to negro families. She replied, with less of apathy in her manner:

"Do n't want nothin' to do with black ones. They a' n't good for anything on a farm. My man tried some 'fore he died, and they 'd eat and steal more 'n they 'd make. One o' the gals was in the house and she car'd off more soda and sugar than we eat. People ha' n't much use for black ones yer; now they 's got their freedom, they say, I expect they 'll be worse."

So far as I have seen, all native Southerners, the poorest and most degraded equally with the rich, and people of the most undoubted Unionism as well as secessionists, unaffectedly and heartily despise the negroes. Truly they are a despised race. Everybody feels contempt, as often, perhaps, mingled with pity as with hatred, for their morals, their mental capacity, and their character as laborers. An old lady who gave me a drink of water this afternoon, a woman of the same class as those whom I have above described, gave me her opinion of colored servants. She was Union, she said, and so was most all the folks along that road till I got down to Lexington. They did say A. L. was a secessioner, but she reckoned they made lies on him. When she learned I was a Northern man, she wanted to know if the black ones would n't be sent out of the country, or up North. I said I thought not, and enquired if they were not doing well where they were.

"No, mister, they a' n't goin' to do well. They run about a good deal, I 'm told, and they a' n't workin' like they did. There 's Captain B., he 's got five young men, and they 's allus been treated well; too well, I say. You never could go by the place arter three o'clock but you 'd see 'em on the broad o' their backs. They 's goin' off, he tells me. They 'd better look whose kitchen they 's goin' out of, I say; they 'll never be so well off agin. He says he wishes they would go, for they do n't do what 'll keep 'em. They 's too sassy, mister. One of 'em come to me last week for work. 'How many rails can you split in a day?' I axed him. I knowed a day's work was a hundred rails if the wood was n't cut, and two hundred if it was. 'Oh, he could split a right smart o' rails,' he said. 'And how much do you ax?' says I. Wal, he said, he reckoned about a dollar and a half a day would be right. I jest told him to go on, for I had n't no use for him. He was travellin' to Caswell, he said."

I asked what she could hire negroes and white men for before the war.

"White men we give nine and ten dollars a month, and we paid a hundred dollars for a nigger. But the owners got to askin' so much shoes and blankets, that it cost as much for the black ones a' most as for the hirelin's. The hirelin's would work jest twice as much, and the black ones would give away your corn, and if they wanted half soles, they like enough cut up your gears."

At three houses, this evening, I found it impossible to procure a supper and lodging, and was obliged to ride for more than an hour after nightfall. There was no moon, and the road was dark among the trees, so that I let my horse pick his way at his own pace along the road, which for some miles had been gradually descending. At last, the rush of water and the sound of machinery warned me that I was approaching a mill, and soon, on the bank of a little stream, I found a shed where three men were sawing boards by the light of pine torches, which sent red reflections across the road and showed me the miller's house. His little girl was sick with the typhoid fever, he said, as he scrutinized me with the light-wood in his hand, and for some moments I dreaded that here, too, was "a poor chance" for entertainment. He took me in, however, and his wife prepared a supper of coffee, wheat bread, and fried fish from the mill stream.

The miller said he ran the saw at night because in the day all the power was needed for the grist-mill. Lumber was scarce, he said, but the people needed bread in this country. My bed-chamber is a very small room, and bids fair to be suffocatingly close before morning, for I can raise neither of the windows. There are feather beds on two lofty bedsteads, which almost fill the room; there are two great piles of folded counterpanes and quilts at the feet of the beds; and I count twenty-nine dresses hanging from pegs and completely covering the walls. The dresses and counterpanes are all of simple cross-barred patterns, and evidently were woven at home in the hand-loom.

SALISBURY, ROWAN CO., N. C., September 12, 1865.

Lexington is a small village, wide-streeted, and standing in a little, bare green plain. I passed through it without stopping, and observed nothing noteworthy in its appearance. As I passed the last houses in the village, a well-dressed young woman came to the door-step of a very respectable looking house, with a snuff-dip in her hand, and spat once or twice as she glanced at the stranger. I see that black women as well as white give themselves up to this indulgence, some having even acquired the power of swallowing the snuff.

Apparently a heavy shower had fallen during the night, and for several miles the road from Lexington to the Yadkin River was deep in mud. When I reached the river bank, a ferry-boat was on its way to the other shore, and I bathed in the stream while awaiting its return. The ferryman was an old negro of seventy, with a gray beard and a face wrinkled but of mild expression. He spoke with deliberation and slowly, and nothing in his language indicated his African descent. Indeed, the language of most of these negroes is quite as correct and elegant as that employed by the white people, and it is the tone of the voice alone which betrays their origin. Daniel was his name, the old man said, and he had been ferryman there, winter and summer, for forty-three years. Seven masters had owned him since he first put the boat across, but they were all done buried now.

"Well, old man, you 're free now," I said.

"I dunno, master. They say all the colored people 's free; they do say it certain; but I 'm a-goin on same as I allus has been."

"Why, you get wages now, do n't you?"

"No, sir; my mistress never said anything to me that I was to have wages, nor yet that I was free; nor I never said anything to her. Ye see I left it to her own honor to talk to me about it, because I was afraid she 'd say I was insultin' to her and presumin', so I would n't speak first. She ha' n't spoke yet."

"What will you do? work on just the same till you die?"

"Ye see, master, I am ashamed to say anything to her. But I do n't 'low to work any longer than to Christmas, and then I 'll ask for wages. But I want to leave the ferry. I 'm a mighty good farmer, and I 'll get a piece of ground and a chunk of a hoss, if I can, and work for myself."

I wished him all success, and bade him good-by, to which he replied with a "farewell, master," that sounded paternally benevolent.

Salisbury, an old town of three thousand inhabitants, is situated in a wide stretch of comparatively flat ground, and is certainly a pretty place. It is laid out with much regularity, and the wide streets, adorned with fine shade trees and supplied with frequent public wells, are, in general, quiet and clean. Many of the houses have a respectable, old-fashioned look, and are surrounded by spacious yards and gardens, in which the roses are still in bloom and the figs are half ripe. On one of the side streets is the town whipping-post and pillory, and on another a little, dilapidated, crumbling edifice, much like a New England shoemaker's shop, is pointed out as the law-office in which Andrew Jackson was once a student.

But there are two objects connected with the recent history of Salisbury that are also a part of the country's history, and are of universal interest—the prison pen, and its necessary adjunct, the prisoners' burying-ground. The site of the former is upon a gentle eminence at the south-eastern edge of the town. As the visitor approaches it, his eye is first caught by the tall walls of a brick building that stands among oak trees near the road. This was once a cotton factory, and afterwards a hospital. A few rods distant are three smaller houses designed for the operatives, and these, together with the hospital, were ruined by Stoneman in his last great raid. A space of ten acres around these buildings was enclosed by a ditch; outside of that, a high fence was made, and thus the prison-yard was formed. The ditch is still in existence, but of the fence nothing now remains except the posts. The grove near the factory shades but a small part of the enclosure; the open field I found covered with a rank, ill-smelling weed, which conceals the traces of the excavations made by the prisoners. Soon after the town was first occupied by the Federal troops these caves were all filled up by order of Gen. Cooper, for it was feared that the sight of them, recalling the miseries of their fellow-soldiers, might lead the men to acts of violence. Just outside the fence may still be seen the outer orifice of a tunnel that was carried along many feet under the yard, beneath the ditch and the rebel sentry's beat, and by means of which more than a hundred of the men made their escape. It is impossible to estimate the length of the passage, its opening within the prison being now closed, but, whatever the distance, so accurately was it calculated by the diggers, that its outer mouth is not six inches from the fence line. It is hardly bigger than a man's body.

I have looked into a book, found in the town soon after it was first occupied, which contains a report made by the surgeon in charge of the prison during the months of January and February last. A certain part of the report, setting forth the whole number of the prisoners, and various facts in relation to them, I could not clearly understand, and from that part of it I do not venture to quote; but the figures given below are correct, I think, and suggestive. They are from a statement of the number of patients under medical treatment in January, 1865, of the diseases with which they were suffering, and of the number of deaths that occurred:

Disease.	Cases.	Deaths.
Acute Diarrhœa	580	345
Scurvy	28	13
Intermittent Fever	89	62
Frost-bites	21	15

These diseases are only a few of those which are mentioned, and the footing up of the cases and the deaths, as given in the original report, shows that there were 1,342 men sick, and that of these 1,012 died. The book I speak of is in the hands of Col. Packard, of the 120th Indiana Vols.

The grave-yard lies within eye-shot of the prison pen. Crossing a field, in which cows were feeding, and a muddy little brook, and climbing a rough fence, I was in the cemetery. The fence was erected by Federal soldiers, and encloses about an acre of ground on the hill-side, nearly bare, for there is only one oak tree among the graves and perhaps a dozen of the stunted pines that spring up in worn-out fields. There are a few separate graves with stakes at the head and foot, and four or five are marked by rude headboards, on which are inscribed the masonic compass and square and the names of those interred beneath. But not more than twenty bodies were so decently buried. The vast majority of those who died were put into trenches, of which there are fourteen close beside each other, seventy yards long and wide as the ordinary length of a human body. In these it is computed that more than five thousand corpses lie buried. The space seems narrow, but it is said that, though often the burial was done so carelessly that the limbs were not covered, yet no room was taken up by coffins, which were never used, and in some places the bodies are laid one above another to the number of four and five. The people of the town dislike to speak of the prison or the cemetery, but I have heard some dreadful stories of the manner of the interments. Disregarding these, however, surely there must be few acres of ground more dismal than this, or fitter to arouse emotions of painful melancholy tinged with harsher feelings. The effect is aided by the desolate appearance of the spot—a weedy field, a rotting stake here and there, long red mounds of clay, and a pine fence warping in the sun.

There is an Assistant Superintendent of Freedmen in Salisbury, whose office is, of course, thronged by complainants. The great majority are people who have recently been turned away from home by their former owners, who are, in most cases, compelled to pay such persons a certain amount of money, or to give them sufficient corn to feed them until February 1, 1866. During the month of August applications for redress were, on an average, twenty-one each day. For the present month the average will be higher.

Having been permitted to look over the superintendent's books, I made this digest of all cases of alleged abuse of negroes that have been reported during the first fortnight of September: Complaint is made

By colored man, John: that G. S. whipped his wife's sister because she left him, and forced her to go back and work for him. G. S. fined.

By colored man, Norris: that E. J. struck him with a brick, and threatened him with an axe.

By colored man, Anderson: that his master whipped him because he went off the plantation to see his cousin, and threatens to whip him again when he comes back from making his complaint.

By colored man, Dick: that J. W. whipped him severely, striking him seventy-two blows.

By colored woman, Martha: That J. F. Parker overtook her while on her way to the office of the Superintendent of Freedmen, put one end of a rope round her neck, tied the other round the neck of his mule, and so dragged her more than two miles. Showed marks of rope.

By colored man, Julius: That he had been sick of a fever two months, and had not yet recovered, when his master came to his cabin and beat him severely because he was not at work.

By colored woman, Louisa: That J. T. is whipping her children continually, and when she asked him not to do it, ordered her off his place and told her not to come back.

By colored man, Robert: That his sister works for a man named A. S., who ordered her to go out and make fence; that afterwards A. S. went out, and, getting angry, cut her head with a rail.

By colored man, Elias: That some citizens took his gun away from him and told him no nigger had a right to carry a gun.

By colored man, Levi: That W. F. L. has whipped him severely with a buggy-trace. Shows his back all raw.

By colored man, Sandy: That Ch. and J. L. said he must leave the plantation, or take a hundred lashes.

ENGLAND.

London, September 9, 1865.

With the thermometer standing at 80° to 90° Fahrenheit in the shade, and I am afraid to say at what figure in the sun, we are reduced to a condition of mental as well as physical exhaustion. Never, within the recollection of that mythical authority, the oldest inhabitant, has there been such a September as we are now undergoing. At the time that I am writing it is still early morning. The air is heavy with the white haze-fog which covers London at this season of the year till the day is well on; the brown, dust-sodden leaves of the trees before my window, in the little city garden on which I look, are so absolutely motionless that it is hard to fancy they are not stage properties instead of living leaves; and the harvest-moon nights are beautiful with a soft Italian beauty, to which we in this climate are almost strangers. To those who like heat it would be pleasant enough, if it were not for the feeling that this abnormal temperature must portend sickness. It is hard to fancy that the state of the weather has not something to do with the pestilence now raging among the cattle. The controversy as to the causes and nature of the Rinderpest is growing as animated as any discussion can be in this atmosphere, but no satisfactory explanation has been offered which has not been disproved by the facts of the case. While doctors are disputing, the cattle keep dying. As yet, the malady is pretty well confined to milch cows. Out of 16,000 within the metropolitan districts, 2,000 have been already killed as tainted with the plague. Lord Granville and Miss Burdett Coutts, who both keep model dairies, where every sanitary precaution is naturally taken, have already lost, respectively, 81 out of 130 and 69 out of 70 head of cows. If the pestilence spreads at its present rate, our grazing counties will be visited with a calamity hardly inferior in its extent to that which visited the manufacturing districts during the cotton famine. Meat, no doubt, will rule unusually high this winter; and the poor will suffer in consequence. Fortunately, however, this burning hot autumn has saved the outstanding crops, and we shall have, at least, an average harvest; and, as the working population in the rural districts depends far more on bread than meat as a staple of food, the high price of meat is far less of a calamity than the dear loaf.

In fact, we could view the cattle-plague with equanimity if it were not for the fear that it should prove the forerunner of the cholera. A consolatory theory has been lately propounded to the effect that the visitation of this epidemic is confined to the Mediterranean basin. There is, indeed, some evidence to show that it has kept hitherto within reach, if I may use the expression, of the Mediterranean coast. But still it is gradually coming nearer and nearer, and if it should strike inland we may still have it upon us before the winter has set in. With an epidemic amongst our cattle, and with such exceptional atmospheric conditions as have prevailed of late, it seems almost impossible to imagine we can escape some form of disease. However, as yet nothing is certain, and it is not much in our nature to trouble ourselves about uncertain contingencies. We are, besides, too much oppressed by the heat to care very much about anything, cholera not excepted. In public matters there is an absolute dearth of any interest or intelligence. Till within the last two days every member of the royal family was out of England; not a minister was in London; and not a single political meeting has been held or speech delivered within the last few weeks. The moors are full; the watering-places are crowded to overflowing; and the rush of English tourists to Germany and Switzerland has been greater than was ever known before. Political gossip there is none; or if there is, there is nobody to retail it, which comes to the same thing.

In this sort of general stagnation, even the few public questions which have been mooted in any way have failed to attract any interest. A feeble attempt has been made to get up a discussion about the Canadian confederation. But even this has failed. Indeed, I can hardly recall an agitation which has broken down so signally as the effort made lately to rouse public feeling with reference to our North American possessions. At the time when the Canadian commissioners came over, last spring, their arrival created some attention. They were received at civic banquets, and Messrs. Cartier, Galt, and MacDonald stood some chance of being the lions of the season. In a confused sort of way it was imagined that the projected confederation was an injury to the cause of the Union, and therefore the idea was patted on the back by people of some position, who could not have told you, to save their lives, whether Prince Edward's Island lies north or south of the equator. Society—to use an expression invented by Mr. Bright—had sent down the "mot d'ordre" that the Canadas and their commissioners were to be treated with respect. Unfortunately for these gentlemen, within a few days of their arrival we received the news of the surrender of Richmond and the assassination of President Lincoln. Forthwith the public feeling changed, and, with the downfall of the Confederacy, the scheme of a Canadian union lost its charm for the classes who favored it under the idea that it was unpopular in America. So the interest in Canada died away as suddenly as it sprang into existence. Every now and then paragraphs appeared in the London papers announcing that the commissioners had transacted business at the Colonial Office; and when we saw it announced that they had returned home, we were rather surprised to remember they had ever been here at all. The intelligence lately received as to the result of their negotiations with the British Government, from the communications made to the Canadian Parliament, has taken people somewhat by surprise. If we are rightly informed, the engagements entered into are of a very comprehensive character, involving unlimited liability in the event of war, and guarantees of a very large amount for the expenditure of the colony in time of peace. A few newspaper articles have appeared on the subject, deprecating, for the most part, any unnecessary engagements towards the Canadas. But as yet there has been no active controversy about the matter. For the time there is such an absolute cessation of all political interest, that we should hardly be excited if we learnt our Government had pledged itself to the resuscitation of the Byzantine Empire or the annexation of Central Africa.

But when the dead season is over and Parliament meets again, this Canadian question will probably give trouble. The public feeling on the subject is, I think, intelligible enough. The school of which Professor Goldwin Smith is the ablest exponent, which holds as a dogma of faith that England would be better for getting rid of all her colonies, has absolutely no hold upon the country at present, whatever it may have in times to come. Like all "doctrinaire" theories, the one in question is based upon an abstract principle, not upon the merits of the case to which it is applied. As a nation we have long ago given up the superstition that we could not abandon an acre of British territory without surrendering our imperial supremacy; but we are not prepared to admit that India stands on the same footing as Australia, or Gibraltar, or the Ionian Islands. We grant that, under certain circumstances, a colony may be left to assume independence without any injury to the mother country; and we are not indisposed to admit that Canada is fast attaining the requisite conditions for independence. But this is as far as we have advanced as yet in the renunciation policy. We care very little about the connection with the Canadas or British North America. Our trans-Atlantic colonists have arranged their home affairs with a sublime disregard for English interests; and our faith in the value of their professions of loyalty and affection is much shaken by their resolute refusal to undertake any part of the burden of their own defence. Our part in the Anglo-Canadian firm appears to consist in the duty of supplying them with garrisons to spend money in the provinces, and in enabling them to borrow money upon our security. A more unsatisfactory arrangement it is impossible to conceive. If the Canadas were to declare their desire to establish themselves as an independent country, we should feel considerably relieved. If they were even to express a wish for incorporation with the United States, we might tell them, in diplomatic language, they were fools for their pains, but we should not oppose their wishes actively. But we cannot make up our minds to turn our countrymen adrift, unless they wish themselves to sever the tie which binds them to England; and we cannot allow them to be detached from our rule by external force so long as we have the power to protect them. In case of any attack upon Canada, we should be bound, or believe ourselves bound, to defend it with the whole force of the empire. If this is all that our Government has assured the Canadian commissioners, they are perfectly justified in their assertion; and such a pledge would be endorsed by a perfectly overwhelming majority both in Parliament and in the country. If they have promised anything further, it is doubtful, in the altered state of public feeling about American affairs generally, whether they will be able to obtain the sanction of Parliament for their engagements.

The murder mania has apparently reached its crisis, as during the last two weeks we have had no novelty in crime, except one or two cases of aggravated manslaughter. And as the subject of murders is pretty well exhausted, we have fallen back on those domestic topics whose discussion has so great an interest for ordinary English newspaper readers. The great "servant gal" question is again to the fore. Probably if this weather continues, the old questions, "Can you marry on three hundred a year?" and "Is smoking injurious?" and hoc genus omne, will be resuscitated. At present we are content with discussing whether servants are or are not what they used to be in the good old times. The complaints of our masters and mistresses are of a kind with which I have no doubt many American householders will sympathize. It is urged that it is impossible to find faithful domestics in these degenerate days; that servants want more wages and do less work; that they care nothing about their employers' interests; have no affection for their masters or their families; dress above their station, give themselves airs, and leave their situations, however kindly they have been treated, the moment that they can better themselves in any way. Similar complaints have always been rife at all times, and I have no doubt that Rebecca declared servants were not in her days what they were in the days of her mother-in-law, Sarah. And of course there is a good deal of exaggeration talked about the misdoings of our serving population. Still there is a certain amount of truth about this grumbling. The truth is that the social relations of England are undergoing a very great, though not a very self-obvious change. Masters are not what they used to be any more than servants. With the spread of education and refinement, ladies live less in their kitchens and occupy themselves less in domestic cares; children are not so much brought up amidst servants as they used to be; and with the increase in the facilities of locomotion, families are less tied to one spot than they were formerly. All this is to my mind good; but it has this defect, that it increases the separation between the serving and the servant-employing class. The servant is no longer the friend of the family, and not being educated to the old intimacy has not the old interest in its affairs. On the other hand, the prosperity and education of the class from which domestic servants are taken have increased universally of late years. The growth of trade and emigration have opened hosts of new channels for labor. And the consequence is, that women servants marry younger, and men servants look out more and more for independent employment. Formerly the offer of a good home and kind treatment were almost sufficient to ensure the services of first-class servants. Now, wages have become the chief inducement to take service; and as the supply of servants has not increased in proportion to the demand, but the contrary, the price of wages has risen largely. This is the common sense of the whole matter. But a number of very worthy people think something must be rotten in the state of England because good treatment alone will not secure the whole services, labors, and devotion of a man or woman. Mr. Ruskin, with his usual marvellous talent for confusing a plain subject, has rushed into print on the service question, and has written a series of letters to the papers filled with a medley of half truths and whole errors, and muddle-headed benevolence. After laying down the doctrine that political economy has nothing whatever to do with the supply of labor, and that there are two ways only of obtaining good servants—the "Christian way," and the "sound, wholesome, thorough-going slavery way"—he proceeds to say "that all nature and all humanity will serve a good master and rebel against an ignoble one. And there is no surer test of the quality of a nation than the quality of its servants, for they are the masters' shadows, and distort their faults in a flattered mimicry. A wise nation will have philosophers in its servants' hall; a knavish nation will have knaves there; and a kindly nation will have friends there. Only let it be remembered that kindness means, as with your child so with your servant, not indulgence but care." If this Ruskinian disquisition should enable any American lady to understand the proper way of dealing with a help, I can only say she must be wiser than Mr. Ruskin's countrywomen.

The only other public topics of the slightest interest are the escape of Mr. Moens, a London stock-broker, from the Neapolitan brigands, after three months' captivity and the payment of five thousand pounds sterling; and the release of Consul Cameron from the clutches of King Theodore of Abyssinia. Earlier in the year very great interest was felt about these gentlemen, and the Foreign Office was severely censured for not using more forcible measures to secure their release. But, at the present temperature, it is far too hot to think of Calabria, not to mention Africa.

The Index is dead, having died of inanition or want of funds. The last number came out a few days ago, and the sign-board, on which the Union Jack and the Confederate flag were painted waving together, is taken down from above the office in the Strand. As far as I could learn, it never had any genuine success as a newspaper, and I should think the list of its paying subscribers must, at the best, have been extremely limited. I hardly ever saw a paper which was better "billed" and distributed. Wherever you went you saw advertisements of the Index; and the sums spent in pushing its sale must have been a heavy charge to somebody or other. After the downfall of the Confederacy, the Index made a feeble attempt to secure a fresh public as a general newspaper, especially devoted to American news, given with a strong pro-Southern bias; but the speculation was an absolute failure and the assets of the defunct periodical will, I suppose, go towards the liquidation of the various dishonored Confederate securities held by disconsolate speculators in the city.

You will perhaps be interested to hear that Mr. Jefferson has achieved a very genuine success on his appearance at the Adelphi in the character of Rip Van Winkle. It is a curious feature in our stage, but of late years some of the chief pecuniary successes have been won by American players. Sothern, who gained his reputation in the States, has made more money by Lord Dundreary in the "American Cousin" than any living actor. Miss Bateman, whom with all respect I think a very handsome woman and a very indifferent actress, had an almost unparalleled run in Leah, though in every other part she proved a failure. Adah Isaacs Menken rehabilitated the fortunes of Astley's, though her popularity was due to other than histrionic merits, and now Jefferson seems likely to be the great attraction of the coming theatrical season. Mr. Owens as Solon Shingle could not hit the public taste, though the audience imagined that his caricature of a New England farmer was a genuine portrait of the ordinary American. Coming immediately on Mr. Owens's failure before the same public, in the very hottest and deadest part of the year, Mr. Jefferson had a good deal to contend with; but in a short time he carried the audience away, and created a more hearty sensation than I have seen since the night when Lord Dundreary made his first appearance.

FRANCE.

SEPTEMBER 9, 1865.

I HAVE had the curiosity to see the great iron-clad Anglo-French armada. I did not visit it at Cherbourg, where the two fleets met first, on the Emperor's fête of the 15th of August. Why Napoleon I. chose the day of the Virgin Mary's Assumption as his own fête, in want of a Saint Napoleon, is a mystery which I have never been able to fathom. I must suppose that he chose the 15th of August because there was a fair chance of fine weather at that time for the national holiday he wished to institute. This hope was, however, disappointed this year at Paris and at Cherbourg; at Paris a disrespectful rain spoiled the illuminations, and at Cherbourg it had no more regard for the gilded uniforms of the French and English admirals. I doubt if M. de Chasseloup-Laubat, the French minister of the navy, a civilian who has but a slight acquaintance with old Neptune, enjoyed much the visits he had to make on board every English man-of-war. It was bad enough to show his pallor and anguish before the French sailors, but to appear before the English blue-jackets in that peculiar state of mind and body when the stomach and not the brain is the centre of the universe, must have been too unpleasant. At Portsmouth the weather was beautiful, the sea smiled like a Swiss lake, between the old walls of Portsmouth and the shores of the Isle of Wight. The heavy iron-monsters seemed themselves lighter and, as it were, idealized in the transparent light of August; they stood so calm and tranquil that any daring boy could have followed the sailors in the rigging; on the yards, where they stood motionless and in perfect order, they looked like so many wooden figures, so sharp were their outlines on the blue sky. I visited first the cupola-ship, the Royal Sovereign, the pride and glory of Captain Coles. She appeared to me like a huge monitor; instead of one or two towers, she has four, each of which contains a very heavy gun; in one of the towers there were two such guns; the whole armament is, therefore, formed of five guns; I cannot tell you exactly their calibre, but they seemed to me inferior in size to the American fifteen-inch. The Royal Sovereign, no doubt, is a very formidable monster, but I doubt if she could, any better than the monitors, make a cruise across the Atlantic. I went through all the parts of one of the French men-of-war, and was not spared a single hole or corner. My conductor, an innocent Vendean, was kind enough to explain to me the nature of a revolver, of a gun, and of the Sainte-Barbe (such is the French name for the powder magazine). So glad was he to find a Frenchman among the visitors of the ship, that he would probably have delivered to me a lecture on the uses of a man-of-war and on the difference between land and sea, if I had encouraged his amiable disposition. He spoke to me like a father, and if I was hardly grateful for his information, I certainly was for the feeling in which it was conveyed. I was not so anxious to betray my nationality to the sailor who conducted my yacht from ship to ship; he was a thorough Briton, and compared the plates which cover the Magenta, the Solferino, and the Gloire to so many tiles; no anatomist ever felt so much pleasure in perceiving slight differences between the bones of two allied species as this strong and good-natured fellow in noticing what would seem to constitute an advantage for the English ships. I wish M. Dupuy de Lhôme, the constructor of our iron-clad navy, could have heard his criticisms; he would have been more amused and instructed by them than by the speeches made in all the banquets of Cherbourg and Portsmouth. Of such speeches there is, of course, nothing to say. I drink your health, you drink my health. It was noticed, however, that the Duke of Somerset spoke with very few comments of "our great ally." His speech was not found enthusiastic enough, not up to the occasion. But some people are not enthusiastic, even when they have to speak of Napoleon III.

Why should I speak myself of this naval review, if there was not an after-thought behind these mutual attentions, a secret reverberation of this joyous booming of guns? Many innocent witnesses thought they were merely seeing a great international pageant of a new kind; but the review was not so much a review as a demonstration. A demonstration!—such is the vague, diplomatic, indefinite word, whispered only into some ears. Punch betrayed the secret. He showed us Napoleon III. in an Arab burnous (an allusion to his recent journey to Algiers), and Britannia, a young and blushing girl, embracing each other in sight of a banditto-looking Yankee looking obliquely on their demonstration. To speak seriously, there is no doubt that the meeting of the fleets was an indirect intimation intended for yourselves; not a provocation, but a warning. If you don't behave yourselves, if you speak too much of Canada or of Mexico, you may find some day these two magnificent squadrons in the waters of New York or of Norfolk. I have even heard that the demonstration was only a corollary to a secret maritime convention between France and England. By this convention the two countries are bound to keep two squadrons, of equal and considerable force, in such places that they can, at a moment's notice, be called together for action

This convention has been made for the term of two years, but can be renewed afterwards at the will of the "hautes parties contractantes." I cannot vouch for the truth of this affirmation, and the convention being a secret one, any mention of it will, of course, be answered by a denial. What the objects of the convention are, I leave you to imagine. I doubt if they are very distinct; there is as much likelihood that a naval force should sooner find employment in the Old World than in the New World. I suspect that America was the first objectif in view, to use a military term. But Herr von Bismarck has worked so actively lately, that there may be a desire now in France, as well as in England, to check his conquering career. I will not drag my reader into the depths of the Schleswig-Holstein question. I will content myself with saying that the question is muddier than ever, and that there is some probability that it may involve Europe in a general war. So the time for demonstrations has arrived, and the captain of the little Austrian war-frigate which entered Portsmouth at the same time as the armada, a mere molecule among these terrible masses, will have an interesting report to send to his government.

As my subject has brought me in the land of rumors, I will remain in it a moment longer. It may be that you take a very moderate amount of interest in your great neighbor, Emperor Maximilian I. of Mexico. You are ignorant, perhaps, that though he is young, as well as his wife, he has no hope of ever having any children. While he is struggling to establish his new empire, our great political schemers are already at work in order to find an heir to his throne. They are selling, as a French proverb says, the bear's skin before they have killed him. The future sovereign is found at last: he is no other than the Count of Flanders, the second son of Leopold, the King of the Belgians, and therefore the brother of the actual Empress. Quiet and fat Flanders! he will have to leave you for the volcanic plateaux of Mexico. No more will he then lounge, thoughtlessly and happily, on the boulevards of Brussels, or hunt in the forests of the Ardennes. He also will have to devote himself to the great interests of the Latin race, and to the regeneration of Central America by railway contractors, mine-jobbers, and German professors. Providence, in its actual Napoleonic form, has chosen him. Who can resist Providence? Not even Leopold, the Nestor of European monarchy, wiser than Ulysses. On that very 15th of August when the French fleet greeted the English fleet in the harbor of Cherbourg, there appeared in the Revue des deux Mondes an admirable article on the American navy signed by Victor de Mars, the editor. The real author of the article is the Prince de Joinville, who has had such excellent opportunities to study the American navy. No more sympathetic narrator or better judge could have told the wonderful exploits of your navy during the last war. I hope his dramatic and intelligent narrative will be noticed by the American press. I hope especially that it will fall under the eyes of that great and modest hero, Farragut, to whom the prince pays a merited tribute of admiration. The second part of the prince's essay relates only to the French navy, and to the uses which it ought to make of your experience. It shows very forcibly that we have blundered as well as the English during the last ten years; that more attention ought to be paid to gunnery and less to iron-plating; it shows, besides, that while our Government has made great efforts to build fine ships, it has done nothing to improve the personnel of the navy; our best men-of-war have been constantly used as transports, and this service has disgusted men and officers. Half our officers have made applications to enter the merchant service, and the examinations for the naval school have been so unsatisfactory that some lads have been admitted who had not attained the ancient minimum of admissibility. Our economists are trying to get rid of our old inscription maritime, the system by which we procure our sailors. As we get our soldiers for the army by conscription, we inscribe all the inhabitants of the maritime districts, and during the time of their inscription they are liable to be transferred from the merchant service to the national navy. The inscribed seamen are, of course, exempted from military service. This system has flourished in France for two centuries, and has, in times of war, preserved the population of our coast from impressment. But the economists represent it as an obstacle to the development of the merchant navy, and are making great efforts to abolish it; they are supported in their attacks by the English press and the English ship-owners. The Prince de Joinville does not pretend to defend the system on any other than on political grounds; he maintains that if France will maintain a navy she must maintain the inscription maritime; he points out, also, the curious fact that, while the English economists are anathematizing the system as a violation of the freedom of trade, etc., etc., the English Government is organizing silently a reserve navy, which, under a new name, is very similar to our inscribed navy. The article of the Prince de Joinville has created much sensation in France as well as in England, though it has not been much discussed openly. The entente cordiale required that too much public attention should not be paid to the work of a prince who is not a friend of the Emperor. It is wonderful to see how such necessities are quickly and tacitly understood; how, without any mot d'ordre in England, and with a mot d'ordre in France, a certain uniformity of action and opinion is easily obtained on some of the most delicate and difficult questions. It is touching to see how easily Jupiter himself takes a hint, and if he is so complacent, why should the other gods of the political Olympus be less so?

The only question which is creating now some agitation in France, is that of décentralisation. I might translate this word by provincial or communal rights. The French Liberals feel that the powers of the state are too absolute; life has left every part of the country, except that great brain called Paris. The question of provincial rights in France is such an important one that I must treat it with some development in my next letter. It will have, perhaps, an interest for some of your readers, as compared with the question of State rights. France and America are, however, placed at two opposite poles—you are struggling for unity and attenuation of State rights; we are struggling for liberty and a development of local rights. Unity we must and will preserve; but we hope to have it some day without a central despotism

A. L.

A SOCIETY FOR IMPROVING THE CONDITION OF THE RICH.

One of the ways in which modern philanthropy develops itself is by forming societies of various sorts to improve the condition of the poor. Might not the benevolent do something of the same kind for the rich? for there are many rich people among us. Singular and startling as the fact may be to the numerous unfortunates, with fixed salaries or incomes, who have been growing poorer and poorer as the war went on, and now find themselves no better off pecuniarily for the peace, it is a fact. We have plenty of millionaires, and some of them stand very decidedly in need of improvement. It may, at first sight, appear as if our suggestion was superfluous, since there is an endless number of writers for the daily and weekly and monthly and quarterly press always ready to tender their valuable advice. Unluckily, these persons generally find it easier, for various reasons, to ridicule or abuse some very superficial follies than to strike at the root of any great evil.

The first labor of our imaginary society would naturally be the inculcation of the eighth commandment, which many wealthy men have practically expunged from their copies of the Decalogue. If the rigid and patient parsimony by which the Girards and McDonoughs of the last generation amassed their large fortunes had its unamiable features, it had also its sterling virtues, and foremost of these was its unquestioned honesty. But the present haste to be rich is not honest. It differs only in its technical legality from gambling, and gambling of the very worst kind, in which the players are continually trying to cheat one another. What are bulling and bearing and cornering, and the other Wall Street dodges, but packing the cards and loading the dice? And this dishonesty, when become inveterate in private transactions, does not stop there, but extends itself to public matters, as we shall have occasion to note further on. Here, then, is a large opening for our reformers.

But as dishonesty is, unfortunately, not confined to the rich, our society will have to seek some other special object. Such would be the substitution of more refined tastes for a pecuniary and material standard of enjoyment. Here let us remark that this vulgar extravagance is not a product of democratic institutions, nor, on the other hand, is it to be denounced merely as something at variance with them. It is to be found wherever and whenever a facility exists of making fortunes rapidly. We see it in Australia; we see it, though to a less degree, in the second French Empire; and even in aristocratic old England, any period of speculation brings out a large crop of those parvenus of whom Thackeray's Jeames was the fictitious, and great "railway kings" the real, type. The aim of our philanthropist should be to give the wealthy a bias towards the liberal arts when they are not too old to learn; when they are, at least to inspire them with some respect for the intellectual and æsthetic. Because a man has made very successful use of the things which he knows, he should have no license to despise all the things which he does not know. It can be no disgrace to a nouveau riche that he is ignorant of those branches of polite education which he has had no opportunity of learning; but it ought to be a disgrace to him and to his son if that son grows up with no higher ambition than to import dry goods, and no higher relaxation from business than a dance, a game of cards, or a drinking bout.

From one point of view, indeed, the prospect is cheering and the encouragement great. When we reflect how, within the memory of persons not very old, our "solid" merchants usually classed the artist with the actor and the actor with the mountebank, lumping all three together as professional vagabonds, while at present we see in this city rich men and the sons of rich men devoting themselves to art, not in a dilettante way but as a serious business,—before so great a change we cannot but feel a pleasurable surprise. The artistic, however, is but a small part of the field, and the difficulties which await us on the intellectual and literary side are formidable.

First, there is a great diversity of opinion as to the knowledge and accomplishments which a man having the means of choice should admire or seek to possess. The old notion that what are technically called the humanities should hold a prominent place in all first-class education has still numerous supporters. Others are strenuous in urging the paramount claims of the physical sciences. Others again insist upon all that is comprised in the somewhat vague term of general information; while yet others contend that a youth will waste his time if he occupies himself with anything but the special matter which is to engage his attention in maturer life. Amid this conflict of advice a rich man may well be puzzled, not merely as to what sort of persons he should choose for the companions of his leisure, but (a more important question) how his children and grandchildren shall be brought up.

There is this much, at least, to be urged in favor of the old standard—that it is a standard. Say what you will of the old notion that a collegiate education is indispensable to a gentleman—call it narrow, illiberal, behind the age; surely it is better to have an imperfect criterion than none. Any fixed intellectual and æsthetic test is better than leaving the point to be ultimately decided by those vulgar ideas which measure a gentleman by his consumption of wine or clothes, by his fine house or his fine horses. And when we consider, moreover, that, contrary to the generally received opinion, classical studies, more than any other, promote and involve the acquisition of modern languages and a knowledge of English literature, it seems the positive duty of every rich man to send his sons to college, even if the curriculum be somewhat inadequate.

Our next difficulty is the provincial and obstructive dogma that a rich man ought to thrust his children into business (meaning by "business" some directly money-making and self-supporting employment) for the sake of keeping them out of mischief! It is unnecessary to show how and why this precious plan is pretty certain to defeat its own end, and we mention it only to denounce it with all our might. Of all the advantages which wealth confers—for we are not going to assume a cheap stoicism, and deny that honestly acquired wealth has advantages—the greatest is that it enables a man to give his children the best general education that time, pains, and money can procure—an education lasting till their majority, and even longer, if they will listen to him. Then, if any of them prefer business, into business let them go. If a young man has not a soul above buttons, let him make or import buttons. We only think it a pity he was not born poor; just as when we have seen foreign noblemen imitate professional horsemen so cleverly as to be mistaken for their own grooms or jockeys, we have thought it a pity they were not born jockeys or grooms. But a liberal education will go far to prevent such a catastrophe; and it is exactly because certain studies do not profess to be "practical" that we deem them advantageous for their counteracting effect to the materializing spirit of the age. The popular mania is for immediate utility. Even science is to most men, as Goethe well puts it, not the high and heavenly goddess, but the convenient cow who furnishes them cheese and butter.

Finally, we meet with a principle which is hardly a different one from that just stigmatized, but rather its general application and natural development. It may be called the doctrine of government by sumptuary or prohibitory laws, written and unwritten. A large number of excellent persons seem really to believe that if they could, first, prevent, by legal enactment, the manufacture and consumption of all fermented beverages; next, shut up all theatres and operas; then destroy all race-horses; and lastly, by force of public opinion or otherwise, put down all style and neatness in private equipages—this done, all dissipation and extravagance would vanish from the land, and all rich men would bestow their incomes in charity and leave their fortunes to public foundations. Such is the dream of these good folks; could they but have their own way, its realization would be—every man of independent means flying from the country as fast as a Cunard steamer could carry him, and bringing up his children (as too many were brought up before the war) in utter abhorrence of their fatherland and all its institutions.

It is most Utopian to expect or aim at the abolition of all elegance and decoration and luxury. These things cannot be abolished, and ought not to be if they could. What we want is to keep them in their right place; and the way to do this is by furnishing wealthy men with intellectual tastes and resources, so that they will of their own accord, and from a sense of pleasure as well as duty, seek for higher gratifications than merely sensuous ones. [A man does not necessarily dislike champagne because he likes metaphysical criticism; but, having only the means to purchase one of the two, he will buy Grote's "Plato" rather than a case of dry Verzenay. He is not necessarily indifferent to equestrian amusements because he is fond of art; but when he has a few thousands "lying loose," he will sooner invest them in pictures or statues than in a pair of fancy horses.] A reforming influence, to affect a wealthy class, must be more subjective than objective in its nature; that is to say, each individual will be more influenced by the opinion of his own class than by that of outsiders and the general public. And all history testifies that a diminution of the intellectual field is accompanied with an increase of material luxury, and vice versa, except in some exceptional case, like that of Sparta, where the whole nation was a permanent camp. Compare the French under Louis Napoleon with the French under Louis Philippe, or the Romans under the Empire with the Athenians under Pericles. Pericles! His name reminds us of our dream, our design—perhaps, also, somewhat too Utopian—for improving the condition of our rich. Europeans have often asserted, and natives sometimes admitted, that the practical tendency of our democracy is to banish all wealthy men from public life. One is tempted to wish the charge were true, the real truth behind it is so much worse. The active though underhand influence of our rich men in public affairs is almost uniformly evil; and the corporation system gives them nearly unlimited power to do mischief. They injure the community directly by aggressions on individual rights, and indirectly by corrupting what small remains of honesty the local rulers have still left. Why, instead of this, should they not aspire to train up their descendants into real statesmen, especially since the terrible blunderings of professed politicians during the war have shaken the people's traditional confidence—or it might be more strictly correct to say, acquiescence—in those gentry? The proper education of a statesman or a diplomat is one of the highest that can be acquired, nay, that can be conceived; and more, it is in itself a "possession for ever." Should the republic prove ungrateful, it would not be a wasted means, but a great end in itself. The possessor of it, for instance, might honorably represent his country in a private capacity when he travels, instead of bringing ridicule on her name by his ignorance of many things which a European gentleman knows as a matter of course. Above all, he would have a property at home of which no defaulting tellers or bubble companies, no rise or fall of stocks or gold, could deprive him.

GOLDEN-HAIRED GERTRUDE,
THE CHOICEST OF JUVENILE BOOKS.
BY
THEODORE TILTON,
Editor of The Independent.
Illustrated from original drawings by H. L. Stephens. Printed on heavy tinted paper of finest finish. Nearly ready.
TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 Park Row, N. Y.

OUR MARTYR PRESIDENT.
Now Ready, Price $2,
AGENTS WANTED.
STIER'S WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.
HEARTHSTONE SERIES.
SCHÖNBERG-COTTA WORKS.
SUNDAY-SCHOOL BOOKS.
A complete library can be made up from our stock, which includes the lists of all the societies of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.
Terms as low as can be had of the publishing houses.
BOOKS FOR SALE BY
TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus,	Barnes' Notes,
Lange's Commentary on Matthew,	Bush's "
Knapp's Christian Theology,	Jacobus' "
McKnight on the Epistles,	Edwards' Works,
Home's Introduction,	Woods' "
Alexander's Commentary,	Kitto's "
Hodge's "	Shedd's Christian Doctrine,
Olshausen's "	Schaff's Church History,
Henry's "	Mosheim's " "
Benson's "	Eusebius' " "
Clark's "

Also, a great variety of Theological Works, Sermons, etc. A liberal discount to ministers.
TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 PARK ROW, New York.

The Largest, the Cheapest, and the Best Children's Paper in America.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

A FIRST CLASS PAPER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS,

Published Monthly, in Chicago, Ill., 138 Lake Street,

By ALFRED L. SEWELL.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL contains sixteen pages of first class literary matter. It is intended that it shall contain better original Stories, Poems, and other reading for children, and more matter for the price, than any other children's paper on the continent. First No. published July, 1865.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Though the paper itself is more than worth the price, yet for the sake of offering such an inducement as will ensure beyond all doubt a very large list of subscribers to start with, I have determined to give the following beautiful present to every subscriber for one year:

A Superb Quarto Steel Engraving,

THE CHILDREN'S PORTRAIT OF MR. LINCOLN,

Size, 9¼ x 11¼ inches,

engraved in the highest style of the art, expressly as a premium plate for this paper—which can be had nowhere else in this style.

This is the best portrait for children of our martyred President, and is alone worth more than many pictures that sell for one dollar, but is presented gratis to every subscriber for one year to The Little Corporal.

☞ SPECIMEN NUMBER WILL BE SENT ON RECEIPT OF TEN CENTS.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,
CHICAGO, ILL.

PREMIUMS TO CLUBS.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the above Engraving.
Other inducements advertised in the paper for larger clubs.
All pages are electrotyped, and back numbers can always be furnished,

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—This first class monthly for boys and girls is receiving commendatory notices from every part of the Union, and these, too, are from our first-rate newspapers. The following notice is from the Pittsburg Christian Advocate:

"'The first number is the best children's paper, of a high literary tone, that we have ever had the pleasure of reading. If after issues shall fulfil the promise of this avant courier, Chicago will have the honor of making the best child's paper in the nation. We bid a hearty welcome to The Little Corporal and trust it may long live to grace the catalogue of newspaper literature for children.'

"The July, August, and September numbers are before us, and we assure the Pittsburg Advocate and our young readers of the Northwestern that these 'after issues' are fully up to the standard of the first number, and more—they are far beyond it. The Little Corporal is growing in stature, and the muscles of his literary and moral arm are hardening with exercise.

"In plain terms, Mr. Sewell is determined to make his paper a success, and he has secured the services of able writers, for whose productions he pays liberally. We re-echo the words of the Chicago Evening Journal:

"'It is bright, sparkling, and promising, both in typography and contents. It already excels every children's paper that we know of in this country.'

"The periodical looks as if it had been printed by the 'Riverside Press.'—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

"A NEW CHILD'S PAPER.—We have received two copies of The Little Corporal, a monthly paper for children, the publication of which has been commenced at Chicago, Illinois, by Alfred L. Sewell. Judging from these specimens, it is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America. Its whole appearance is in capital taste, and there is evidence in it that its editor has rare tact in catering for the wants of the little ones. The enterprise deserves to be a decided success."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal, Aug. 5, 1865.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Bright, sparkling, and pure; a gem, both in typography and contents. We have been accustomed to think that the West, however she might excel in agricultural products, was far behind the East in literary matters; but we begin to think it is time for the latter to look to her laurels. Certainly we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

"Judging from the appearance of the two numbers before us, The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America.—Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press.

"We have read with great pleasure the first number of this entertaining periodical. We trust The Little Corporal will continue to fulfil the promise of this first number. Will the editor accept our congratulations?"—N. Y. Independent.

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Union Press.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"The Little Corporal really excels any child's paper we have seen. The premium picture is of itself worth a year's subscription."—Sandusky [O.] Reg.

TO MINISTERS THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES:

I desire to secure the co-operation of the MINISTERS throughout the country in the furtherance of a work which cannot fail to meet their approval and appreciation.

As editor of THE LITTLE CORPORAL, I hope to induce Ministers to favor the circulation of my paper among their children as a means of doing them good; and I ask each one to send me the name of some intelligent and respectable lady (for whose integrity they can vouch), who will be willing to energetically canvass her own neighborhood for subscribers to THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Any Minister addressing me, as shown below, will receive by next mail Circulars, showing the opinions of the Press, and will also be informed in relation to the percentage allowed to canvassers.

Address

ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of DUNLOP, SEWELL & SPALDING,
CHICAGO, ILL.

Refer, if you wish, to

BISHOP SIMPSON, Philadelphia.
REV. W. W. PATTON, Chicago.

QUACKENBOS'S STANDARD

SCHOOL-BOOKS.

"THE BEST IN THEIR RESPECTIVE DEPARTMENTS."

FIRST BOOK IN ENGLISH GRAMMAR. 40 cents.

AN ENGLISH GRAMMAR. 90 cents.

FIRST LESSONS IN COMPOSITION. 80 cents.

ADVANCED COURSE OF COMPOSITION AND RHETORIC. $1 50.

PRIMARY HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. 90 cents.

ILLUSTRATED SCHOOL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. $1 80.

A NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. $1 80.

APPLETONS' ARITHMETICAL SERIES. Primary and Elementary, now ready.
PRACTICAL in press, and nearly ready.

"The singular excellence of all Quackenbos's school-books is well known to the educational community. They are generally admitted to be the best manuals on the subjects of which they respectively treat."—J. W. BULKLEY, City Sup't of Schools, Brooklyn.

ALSO PUBLISHED BY THE UNDERSIGNED,

YOUMANS'S NEW CHEMISTRY. Entirely rewritten. $1 80.

HARKNESS'S LATIN GRAMMAR. $1 50. Everywhere received with unqualified approval.

HARKNESS'S LATIN READER. (Just published.) $1 25.

NOW READY,

A New Edition of QUINTILIAN. By Prof. HENRY S. FRIEZE, of the University of Michigan. $1 25.

Specimen Copies of any of the above works mailed, post-paid, to Teachers and School Officers, on receipt of one-half the retail price. The most favorable terms made for introduction.

D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers,
443 and 445 Broadway, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED.

KERL'S FIRST LESSON IN ENGLISH GRAMMAR.

Designed as an introduction to the Common School Grammar. The plan, definitions, observations, and exercises are in the simplest style, and suited to the capacity of children. Price 50 cents.

KERL'S COMMON SCHOOL GRAMMAR.

A clear, thorough, and practical grammar of the English Language. Great care has been taken to make it, if possible, the best treatise of its kind now before the public. The parts relating to Idioms, Analyses, and False Syntax are particularly valuable and original; and instead of dry task-work, an attempt has been made to present the subject in a lively and agreeable manner. $1.

The Public Schools of Boston and Cambridge have already endorsed and adopted these text-books.

COLTON'S AMERICAN SCHOOL QUARTO GEOGRAPHY,

Comprising the several departments of Mathematical, Physical, and Civil Geography, with an Atlas of more than 100 Steel Plate Maps, Profiles, and Plans, on 42 large sheets, DRAWN ON A NEW AND UNIFORM SYSTEM OF SCALES. $2 25.

Accurate and beautiful in delineation, giving effect to all recent discoveries and territorial arrangements, copiously illustrated with exquisite engravings, comprehensive and yet condensed, this work, fitly completing the "Colton Series," challenges comparison with the best School Geographies hitherto published.

The Series now consists of

THE PRIMER OF GEOGRAPHY. 16 Maps.
INTRODUCTORY GEOGRAPHY. 24 Maps.
MODERN SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY. 48 Maps.
AMERICAN SCHOOL QUARTO GEOGRAPHY.
AMERICAN SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY. With Atlas.
PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY.

Liberal terms for specimen copies for examination, and first supplies for introduction into schools.

IVISON, PHINNEY, BLAKEMAN & CO.,
48 and 50 Walker Street, New York.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

AGENTS WANTED

TO SELL

THE AMERICAN CONFLICT,

BY HORACE GREELEY.

This work has no rival as a candid, lucid, complete, and authentic history of the Great Civil War. Its popularity is sufficiently indicated by the fact that the weekly sales of Vol. I. are greater than those of all similar histories united.

Vol. II. will be completed at the earliest day consistent with thoroughness and accuracy. The author having availed himself of the full Official Reports of the Confederate as well as the Union authorities, will present both sides of the great struggle with equal fairness. This volume will abundantly sustain the high reputation of Vol. I.

From The Albany Evening Journal.

"No man in America is more conversant with the subject than Mr. Greeley, and none more competent to do it justice. . . . We confess that in this work we are agreeably disappointed. It is pervaded by a spirit of catholicity and a freedom from partizan leaning that his best friends did not expect."

From The New York Herald.

"'The American Conflict,' by Horace Greeley, may prove to the progressive thinkers of all nations a work of equal interest with Napoleon's 'Life of Cæsar.' . . . The Emperor, with his mighty legions at his back, has been the leader of the nations during the past thirty centuries; the Editor, with his burning thoughts printed in front, will be the leader of the nations in the fifty centuries to come."

From The New York Leader.

"No public man, whatever his politics and prejudices may be, should refuse to it a prominent place in his library."

From The Cincinnati Enquirer.

"It is of course a history from a stand-point of observation far distant from our own, and from the Democracy generally, but it is marked by much less prejudice, and is disfigured by far less partizan feeling than most of our friends would imagine. It contains a vast amount of information, and is altogether superior for reference to any volume on the subject that has yet appeared."

From The London Daily News.

"We earnestly recommend this history as a work of marked ability and perfect good faith. No person of candor, whatever may be his opinions, could read it without feeling indebted to the author."

From The London Saturday Review.

"Mr. Greeley is qualified above all his contemporaries for the task which he has undertaken. . . . No writer has shown more fully how the leaders of the South were gradually tempted and encouraged into a fatal and almost inexplicable mistake."

Address O. D. CASE & CO., Publishers, at Hartford, Conn.; Boston, Mass.; Cleveland, Ohio; Cincinnati, Ohio; and Detroit, Mich. J. C. DERBY, General Agent, No. 5 Spruce Street, New York. GEO. & C. W. SHERWOOD, Chicago, Ill.

JUST PUBLISHED.

DAVID WOODBURN,

THE

MOUNTAIN MISSIONARY.

The scenes recorded in this volume have their unfolding in the wild and semi-civilized regions of the "Blue Ridge," in Western Virginia, and are a faithful record of individual experience.

"DAVID WOODBURN," as our author is pleased to call him, had his birth and home in these mountain seclusions, and the history and abounding labors of this untaught youth, who died at the early age of 27 years, form the main features of the work. While yet a rude and unlettered boy, he became a colporteur of the American Tract Society of New York for the "Mountains," and it is no exaggeration to say that the Society, in its widely extended and valuable labors, has never employed a worker of such tireless activity, or one on whom the divine blessing so manifestly rested. To give in this advertisement even a synopsis of his missionary toils and successes, would be to copy out the book itself. The publisher prefers to furnish the work in a handsomely bound and beautifully illustrated volume, at moderate cost, to those who are in sympathy with the noblest enterprise in which a Christian association can engage. Six illustrations. Price $1 25.

HENRY HOYT,
S. S. Publisher.

AGENTS WANTED

TO SELL

GRANT AND SHERMAN:

THEIR

CAMPAIGNS AND GENERALS.

BY HON. J. T. HEADLEY,

Author of "Washington and his Generals," etc., etc., with numerous steel Portraits and Battle Scenes, comprising Popular Biographies of the prominent Generals who brought to a triumphant close the great Rebellion, including graphic descriptions of

BATTLES, SIEGES, ADVENTURES, ETC.

SOLD ONLY BY AGENTS.—To returned and disabled Soldiers, and all seeking profitable employment, a rare chance is offered to make money.
For terms and territory, address at once, with stamp,

E. B. TREAT & CO., PUBLISHERS,
130 GRAND STREET, NEW YORK

LEE & SHEPARD'S LIST OF

NEW BOOKS AND NEW EDITIONS,

IN PRESS AND ALREADY PUBLISHED.

IN PRESS:

THE BUSHRANGERS; OR, A YANKEE'S ADVENTURES DURING HIS SECOND VISIT TO AUSTRALIA. By the author of "The Gold Hunters, or Life in Australia." 1 vol. 12mo. Handsomely illustrated. Ready October 1. Price $2.

LITTLE PRUDY'S STORY BOOK. By Sophie May. 1 vol. 18mo. Illustrated. Ready October 1. Price 70 cents.

LITTLE PRUDY'S DOTTY DIMPLE. By Sophie May. 1 vol. 18mo. Illustrated. Ready October 1. Price 70 cents.

WORK AND WIN. By Oliver Optic. The fourth volume in the series of Woodville Stories. Ready about October 15.

THE YANKEE MIDDY. A sequel to "The Sailor Boy." By Oliver Optic. The fourth volume of Army and Navy Stories.

NEW EDITIONS.

OLIVER OPTIC'S ARMY AND NAVY VOLUMES. 3 vols., viz.:

THE SOLDIER BOY; or, Tom Somers in the Army.
THE SAILOR BOY; or, Jack Somers in the Navy.
THE YOUNG LIEUTENANT; a sequel to the Soldier Boy.

Each volume handsomely illustrated. Price $1 50.

OLIVER OPTIC'S WOODVILLE STORIES. 3 vols., viz.:

RICH AND HUMBLE.
IN SCHOOL AND OUT.
WATCH AND WAIT.

Each volume handsomely illustrated. Price $1 25.

OLIVER OPTIC'S "BOAT CLUB" SERIES. 6 vols. Handsomely illustrated. Price $1 25 per vol.

OLIVER OPTIC'S RIVERDALE STORIES. 6 vols. Handsomely illustrated. 45 cents per vol.

OLIVER OPTIC'S FLORA LEE STORIES. 6 vols. Handsomely illustrated. 45 cents per vol.

SOPHIE MAY'S LITTLE PRUDY STORIES. 6 vols.:

LITTLE PRUDY.
LITTLE PRUDY'S SISTER SUSIE.
LITTLE PRUDY'S CAPTAIN HORACE.
LITTLE PRUDY'S COUSIN GRACE.
LITTLE PRUDY'S STORY BOOK.
LITTLE PRUDY'S DOTTY DIMPLE.

Each volume handsomely illustrated. Price 70 cents.

Full Catalogues of our numerous publications will be sent by mail on application. Any book on our list, or any book published in the United States, will be sent by mail post-paid on recept of price.

LEE & SHEPARD,
PUBLISHERS AND GENERAL BOOKSELLERS,
149 Washington Street,
OPPOSITE OLD SOUTH.....BOSTON.

NOW READY.

PRAED'S POEMS—IN BLUE AND GOLD.

2 VOLS., $2 50.

WIDDLETON, PUBLISHER.

This is a literal reprint of "Moxon's," the first authorized and only complete edition, with many poems before unpublished. Edited, with a memoir, by the Rev. Derwent Coleridge.

ALSO,

A handsome "library edition" on fine paper, in 2 vols. crown 8vo, $4 50; half calf, $8; full Turkey, $10.

"Horace is not more charming in his gayest moods than Praed."—Christian Examiner.

"Wherever there shall be found a mind which appreciates the beauty of graceful thoughts and kindly sentiments, expressed in flowing lines and melodious cadences, there will be found an admirer of the poetry of Winthrop Mackworth Praed."—North American Review.

It may be safely predicted that "these poems will have a large sale in this country, where Praed's wit and tenderness are highly appreciated."

WIDDLETON, PUBLISHER,
17 Mercer Street, New York.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen,
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

JUST PUBLISHED,

GOLDEN LEAVES

FROM THE

DRAMATIC POETS.

Collated by JOHN W. S. HOWS.

In one vol. 16mo, 576 pp., toned paper, gilt top, vellum cloth, bevelled boards. Price $2 50. Uniform with:

I.

GOLDEN LEAVES FROM THE AMERICAN POETS.

II.

GOLDEN LEAVES FROM THE BRITISH POETS.

Extract from the Preface to "Golden Leaves from the Dramatic Poets:"

"In the Dramatic Poets of a country are embodied the highest efforts of its genius. Our series of 'GOLDEN LEAVES' from the BRITISH AND AMERICAN POETS would be, therefore, incomplete without a collection of specimens from the Dramatic Poets of those countries. In the present volume we give selections of recognized beauties from the BRITISH AND AMERICAN DRAMATISTS, arranged in chronological order, commencing with the earliest known dramas in the English language, and continuing the series down to the present time. The collection, we trust, will be found interesting to the student of dramatic literature, as exhibiting in a condensed form the mutations in taste, style, and method of treatment which the drama has undergone through the last three centuries. We believe it will also be acceptable to lovers of the Legitimate Drama who still cling to the recollections of the past glories of the stage, and will receive and welcome these souvenirs of the cherished favorites of their youth."

The "GOLDEN LEAVES" series are uniform in size, style, and price. The convenient size of the volumes, the beauty of the page, the elegance of their external appearance, unite in commending them to persons of taste and culture. They are put up in sets in boxes, but are also sold separately. Price each volume, $2 50. Mailed post-free on receipt of price.

BUNCE & HUNTINGTON, PUBLISHERS,
540 Broadway, New York.

REV. W. R. ALGER'S

POETRY OF THE ORIENT.

A New Edition, entirely revised and enlarged by the addition of one hundred pages new matter.

"It is full of wisdom and beauty."—John G. Whittier.

"Extraordinary sentences for extraordinary readers."—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

"The modesty, enthusiasm, and interest of this book will keep it fresh and valuable."—George William Curtis.

One handsome 16mo vol. Price $1 75. Mailed on receipt of price.

ROBERTS BROTHERS,
Publishers, Boston.

ONLY AUTHORIZED EDITION.

This Work appears under the Official Sanction of the Judge Advocate-General and the Secretary of War.

THE ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN,

AND THE

TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

EDITED BY BENN PITMAN,

RECORDER OF THE MILITARY COMMISSION.

1 vol. octavo, of about 450 pages. Nearly ready. Neatly printed in double columns, bound in embossed cloth, $3 00; sheep, law style, $4 00.

This work contains the Testimony relating to the general Conspiracy, together with the Official Record introduced in evidence.

Also, the Arguments of Counsel for the Accused; Reply of Hon. J. A. Bingham, Special Judge Advocate;

Findings and Sentences of the Accused, etc.;

Portraits of the Accused on Steel, by Ritchie;

Map of the Route Travelled by Booth and Harold in their Flight;

Plan of the Locality of Ford's Theatre; and Plan of the Theatre showing the President's Box, and the Track of the Assassin.

☞ In this volume the incidents and details of the terrible plots and crimes developed by the trial are, for the first time, clearly presented with all the fidelity and completeness of history and the interest of romance.

Sold only by Canvassing Agents. ☞ Send $1 50 for Prospectus Book, and name Territory wanted, or address

MOORE, WILSTACH & BALDWIN,
Publishers, Cincinnati, or 60 Walker St., New York,

Who also publish BARRETT'S ILLUSTRATED LIFE OF LINCOLN, of which nearly 100,000 copies have been sold. Agents wanted.

NEW BOOKS PUBLISHED THIS DAY

BY

TICKNOR & FIELDS, BOSTON.

RECOLLECTIONS OF SEVENTY YEARS. By Mrs. JOHN FARRAR. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 50.

This is one of the most readable volumes ever issued from the press. It presents, in a pleasing style, the experiences of the author in the Old World, reminiscences of distinguished people, many of whom it was her fortune to meet and know, and abounds in anecdotes of celebrities never before made public.

The New York Tribune says of the book:

"Written in a style of most unaffected simplicity, flowing with a certain colloquial ease, and marked with a rare good sense, as well as remarkable knowledge of the world. It has fallen to the lot of few persons to pass through such varied experiences as the author. . . . She has treasured up a store of recollections, which cannot fail to interest readers of the present generation. . . . The general spirit of the narrative, its quiet illustration of the highest principles, and the variety and interest of its incident, as well as its charming English diction, will make the book a favorite with the intelligent and refined reader."

HESPERUS; OR, FORTY-FIVE DOG-POST DAYS. By JEAN PAUL FRIEDRICH RICHTER. Translated by Rev. CHARLES T. BROOKS. 2 volumes. Uniform with "Titan." $4 00.

This is the work which first made Richter popular with the German public, and has been pronounced his best production. It abounds with noble thoughts, and vividly illustrates the author's reverence for Deity, his catholic humanity, and his tender appreciation of female character.

LYRICS OF LIFE. By ROBERT BROWNING. With 12 Illustrations, from Drawings by Sol. Eytinge. Paper, 50 cents.

This, the fourth volume of the series of Companion Poets, contains the most popular of Mr. Browning's shorter poems, among which are "My Last Duchess," "The Lost Leader," "The Pied Piper of Hamelin," "How they brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix," "Propice," "In a Year," "The Confessional," and fifty others.

TICKNOR & FIELDS, PUBLISHERS,
124 Tremont Street, Boston.

THE MOST POPULAR BOOK OF PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION

IS

RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD,

Having a regular sale of Twenty-five Thousand Copies a Year.

It is superior in excellence to all other "Methods," and

THE BOOK THAT EVERY PUPIL NEEDS

for the acquirement of a thorough knowledge of Piano-forte playing! It is adapted to all Grades of Tuition, from the Rudimental Studies of the youngest to the Studies and Exercises of advanced Pupils. Two editions are published, one adopting American, the other Foreign Fingering. When the work is ordered, if no preference is designated, the edition with American Fingering will be sent.

☞ Be sure that in ordering it you are particular in specifying the "New Method. Price, $3 75. Mailed, post-paid.

OLIVER DITSON & CO.,
Publishers, Boston.

EVERETT MEMORIAL,

Containing the action of the different societies of which he was a member, and the

EULOGIES OF HIS MOST EMINENT COMPEERS,

embracing in all forty-two

ADDRESSES BY DISTINGUISHED MEN.

1 vol. royal 8vo, tinted paper, 315 pp.; two steel plates; morocco cloth, green and gold. Price $5 00.

ONLY 100 COPIES FOR SALE.

A HISTORY OF WILLIAMS COLLEGE.

BY REV. CALVIN DURFEE,

assisted by Hon. Joseph White, Professor Hopkins, Professor Tutlock, D. A. Wells, A.M., and others.

1 vol. 8vo, 429 pp.; two steel portraits, three wood-cuts. Price $2 50.

JAQUES' RULES FOR CROQUET.

THE MOST COMPLETE AND ELEGANT EDITION OF THE RULES YET PUBLISHED.

8vo; 16 plates and diagrams; morocco cloth, green and gold. Price 75 cents.

N.B.—The attention of the trade is called to this edition of the Rules of Croquet, which, from its elegant style and clear illustrations, meets with the most ready sale.

AN ATTRACTIVE JUVENILE.

EDITH PRESCOTT;

OR,

LESSONS OF LOVE,

BEING

AUNT BERTHA'S VISIT TO THE ELMS.

BY EMMA MARSHALL.

16mo, cloth, all bright colors; 251 pp.; illustration on tinted paper. Price $1 25.

"It is a tale of English life, very engagingly told, and superior in style and treatment to most of the juveniles of the day."—DR. HOLLAND ("Timothy Titcomb").

A. WILLIAMS & CO., PUBLISHERS,
100 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS,
PUBLISHERS AND BOOKSELLERS,
PHILADELPHIA, PA.,

Take pleasure in calling the attention of the public to their Choice and Extensive Stock of Books, comprising a collection of the Most Popular and Choice, in all styles of binding, by all the Favorite and Standard Authors.

TO COLLECTORS OF LIBRARIES, OR THOSE DESIRING TO FORM THEM.

Many who have the taste, and wish to form a library, are deterred by fear of the cost. To all such we would say that a large number of books may be furnished for even One Hundred Dollars—which, by a yearly increase of a small amount, will before long place the purchaser in possession of a Library in almost every branch of knowledge, and afford satisfaction not only to the collector, but to all those who are so fortunate as to possess his acquaintance.

Catalogues are sent, on application, and great attention is paid to communications from the country, and the goods ordered carefully packed and forwarded with expedition on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Our arrangements for supplying Standard American Books, suitable for Libraries and Private Families, are complete, and our stock second to none in the country.

Orders Solicited. Address

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS,
306 CHESTNUT STREET,
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

PREPAID BY FIRST MAIL TO ANY POST-OFFICE FOR $4 50.

THE NEW ILLUSTRATED

HYDROPATHIC ENCYCLOPÆDIA

contains nearly 1,000 pages, illustrated with more than 300 Engravings, with Index complete. Agents wanted. Address

FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

"Of all the publications which have attained such a wide popularity, as issued by FOWLER & WELLS, none are more adapted to general utility than this rich, comprehensive, and well-arranged Encyclopædia."—N. Y. Tribune.

ENOCH ARDEN.

In compliance with the request of many Artists and Lovers of Art, the publishers of the "Artists' Edition" of "Enoch Arden" will print for Subscribers

100 COPIES ONLY,

on large, heavy paper, made expressly for the purpose.

This is the edition illustrated by Hammatt Billings. James Jackson Jarves, Esq., in his "Art Idea," thus speaks of him, on page 241, in contrast with others:

"Hammatt Billings has capacity of higher order. His taste is refined, talent versatile, fancy subtle, and imagination inventive. In the limited scope of architecture allowed here, he has given evidence of a latent genius which in any other country would be stimulated and developed to its fullest power. Thus far he is more commonly known by his beautiful illustrations of Keats, Tennyson, and the most intellectually spiritual of the poets. In the lyrical grace, variety, and delicate beauty of his compositions, and sympathetic rendering of the text, he has no superior in this country. His brain is a rich mine of æsthetic wealth. He does not so much translate poetry into pictorial art as recast it in exquisite shapes of his own invention. The mere overflow of his mind would make a reputation for the common run of artists and architects."

Subscriptions received by the publishers,

J. E. TILTON & CO.,
BOSTON,

Also publishers of the beautiful "Cambridge Edition" of "Enoch Arden," containing all of Tennyson's late poems, with vignette illustrations.

Gilt top, very fine	Price $1 50
Half calf	" 3 50
Morocco antique	" 4 50

AGENTS WANTED
FOR
THE STANDARD HISTORY OF THE WAR,

Complete in One Large Royal Octavo Volume of over 1,000 pages.
Splendidly Illustrated with 127 Fine Portraits of Generals and Battle Scenes.

This is just the book the people want. It presents a rare chance for agents. Teachers, ladies, energetic men, and especially returned and disabled officers and soldiers, in want of profitable employment, will find it peculiarly adapted to their condition. Send for circulars. Address

JONES, BROS. & CO.,
Philadelphia, Pa., and Cincinnati, O.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

FEW writers of the day, or indeed of any time, are accustomed to "pour themselves as plain" on paper as John Ruskin. One charm of his works consists in the perfect openness and absence of disguise that makes the reader a confidant of every passing thought and changing emotion, fearless of the reproach of inconsistency. Among the disturbing elements of his mind, the influence of a narrow theological creed was formerly very conspicuous. His glowing and impulsive ideas seemed constantly chafing against a set form of belief, almost ascetic in its tendencies, that kept him out of true communion with the great spiritual workers who wrought with the chisel and the pencil in past times, and tormented him by the suggestion of doubts as to the worthiness of the pursuits to which his life has been dedicated. There are signs, however, that he is gradually working clear of these disturbing forces, and we are sure his readers will join with us in admiration of the following noble passage. It will be new to all of them:

"Superstition, in all times and among all nations, is the fear of a spirit whose passions are those of a man; whose acts are the acts of a man; who is present in some places, not in others; who makes some places holy, and not others; who is kind to one person, unkind to another; who is pleased or angry according to the degree of attention you pay to him or praise you refuse to him; who is hostile generally to human pleasure, but may be bribed by a sacrifice of a part of that pleasure into permitting the rest. This, whatever form of faith it colors, is the cause of superstition.

"And religion is the belief in a spirit whose mercies are over all his works—who is kind even to the unthankful and the evil; who is everywhere present, and therefore is in no place to be sought, and in no place to be evaded; to whom all creatures, times, and things are everlastingly holy; and who claims, not tithes of wealth or sevenths of days, but all the wealth that we have, and all the days that we live, and all the beings that we are; but who claims that totality because he delights only in the delight of his creatures, and because, therefore, the one duty that they owe to him, and the only service they can render him, is to be happy. A spirit, therefore, whose eternal benevolence cannot be angered, cannot be appeased; whose laws are everlasting and inexorable, so that heaven and earth must indeed pass away if one jot of them failed; laws which attach to every wrong and error a measured inevitable penalty, to every rightness and prudence an assured reward,—penalty of which the remittance cannot be purchased, and reward of which the promise cannot be broken."

This solemn and striking utterance, reminding one, in its copiousness and yet compression, of the old masters of English sacred eloquence, is quoted by Dr. Colenso from an address by Mr. Ruskin, in the "Sessional Papers of the Royal Institute of British Architects," for 1864–5, and forms the motto of his last book.

—One of the most unassuming and really meritorious of the English publishing clubs is "The Hakluyt Society," instituted, as its name indicates, "for the publication of rare and valuable voyages, travels, and geographical records." It necessarily follows that the discovery, conquest, and colonization of America must form an important portion of any such collection, and, in fact, more than two-thirds of the volumes issued by the society relate to this continent, and are most important for its early history. Among them are the letters of Columbus, the original narratives of the voyages of Sir Francis Drake, Henry Hudson, Champlain, Raleigh, etc., all well edited and illustrated with maps and charts. The two latest volumes brought out by the society equally relate to America; and comprise details of the progress of the Spanish conquerors of the New World by contemporary actors in the scenes they describe. They are "The Travels of Pedro de Ciezo de Leon, 1532–50," contained in the first part of his "Chronicle of Peru," and Pascual de Andagoya's "Narrative of the Conquest of the Provinces of Tierra Firme, and the discovery of the South Sea, and the Coasts of Peru and Nicaragua." They are both translated and edited by Clements R. Markham, whose intimate acquaintance with Spanish America has been shown by his travels in Peru, and his adventurous journey through the tropical forests of South America, for the purpose of procuring the chinchona, or tree yielding the well-known "Jesuit's bark" of the materia medica, for the purpose of naturalizing it in British India. Pedro de Ciezo arrived in South America, a boy of fourteen, in the year of Pizarro's conquest of the Peruvian empire. He commenced his journal at the age of twenty-two, and continued it under every variety of discouragement, for many years. Its chief value consists in the faithful picture it presents of the country of the Incas while traces of its civilization presented themselves on every side, before they were swept away by the ruthless conquerors. He was a man of acute observation, and possessed an enlightened curiosity for the wonders of nature and the relics of art that the region then abounded with. The narrative of Andagoya is a ruder work by a Spanish soldier of fortune, who served under Vasco Nunez, and was one of the first to hear tidings of "the great empire of Peru," in 1522, ten years before it fell under the sword of Pizarro. Andagoya was prevented by illness from accompanying that chieftain, but was engaged in expeditions against Nicaragua and the Indians of the peninsula. His accounts are in some instances the only ones ever made public respecting the Darian Indians, and some other free and warlike tribes. The subscription to the Hakluyt Society is one guinea per year; and two volumes are generally published annually for its members.

—The autumn list of Messrs. Longman & Co.'s forthcoming publications is not marked by any startling novelty, and, in fact, is meagre in objects of general attraction. In belles lettres it comprises two new translations of Homer's "Iliad," both probably inspired by Lord Derby's success, one in English hexameters by J. H. Dart, an Oxford prize poet, the other in English blank verse by Ichabod C. Wright, well known as one of the most successful translators of Dante; Miss Berry's "Journal and Correspondence," edited by Lady Theresa Lewis, already mentioned, may come in the same department, as well as "Mozart's Letters," edited by Dr. Nohl and translated by Lady Wallace, and the production of a poet who has found his hippocrene in "the cup that cheers, but not inebriates;" "Tea: a Poem," by C. B. Coles; "Chapters on Language," by F.W. Farrar; and "The Amulet: a Tale of Spanish California." The arts, fine and useful, are represented by an illustrated work by George Barnard, professor of drawing at Rugby School, on "Drawing from Nature," a splendid embellished work of novel character; "The Life of Man Symbolized by the Months of the Year," the text selected by R. Pigot, and many hundred wood-cut illustrations from original designs by John Leighton, F.S.A. (this, we may mention, will be published here as a Christmas gift-book by Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., who have secured the American market for it); and "Iron Ship-building, its History and Progress," by William Fairbairn, of Manchester. In natural and medical science will be found a new volume of Maunder's "Treasury of Knowledge" series, "The Treasury of Botany," by Dr. Lindley and T. Moore; "The Formation and Management in Health and Disease of the Thorough-bred Horse," by Digby Collins; "Manual of Materia Medica," by Drs. Farre, Bentley, and Warrington; Professor Richard Owen's long-promised book, "Comparative Anatomy and Physiology of the Vertebrate Animals;" an abridgment of Dr. Copland's large "Medical Dictionary," by himself and his son. Theology is feebly supported by two works only: one, "The Truth of Christianity; compiled from the Writings of Archbishop Whately," by his friend and disciple, Dr. Hinds, late Bishop of Norwich; and "The Temporal Mission of the Holy Spirit, or Reason and Revelation," by the Romish Archbishop Manning. History rests solely on the labors of Mr. William Massey, whose lively, but somewhat slight and superficial, "History of England during the Reign of George III.," has arrived at the honors of a popular edition, and will be brought out in four monthly volumes, in post 8vo. Of miscellaneous books there are indicated, "Transylvania, its Products and People," by Charles Boner; "Chess Problems," by F. Healey—being a selection of two hundred of the author's best positions, with the solutions; and "Occasional Essays," by Charles Wren Hoskyns, author of "Talpa." The greater part of these will probably be published before the end of the year. They afford a sample of the intellectual activity put in motion by the transactions of one of the large English publishing houses.

—It appears that the Germans, so rich in a language that possesses unlimited powers of combination of native roots, have condescended to borrow the word "essays" from the English. It is said to owe its present sense to Lord Bacon, who first used it to indicate "brief notes, set down rather significantly than curiously" (or, as we should now say, elaborately). In this sense it has long been adopted by the French, and first appeared as a German word about a year ago, in the title-page of a translation of Sir Henry Holland's essays. It has recently been used as the designation of a collection of "New Essays on Art and Literature" by Herman Grimm, the son and nephew of the two Brothers Grimm, who died while engaged on their great dictionary of the German language, so it may now be regarded as authentically grafted into the Teutonic speech. The collection includes several papers of interest, especially one on "Ralph Waldo Emerson." It appeared originally as an introduction to a specimen of a German version of his writings, but, strange to say, they did not appear to be relished in Germany, and the proposed undertaking was abandoned.

—The primeval or prehistoric men, inhabiting the caves of what now is Central France, appear to have been endowed with more of the artistic element in their composition than any other of their contemporaries yet known. The rude attempts at the representation of animals, as the reindeer, etc., on the bone implements of domestic use among them, have been already noticed, and recently M. Lartel, to whom the investigation of this interesting field of science is mostly due, has discovered, in a cavern in Perigord, some fragments of ivory which, when put together, show a roughly engraved figure of a mammoth, its most remarkable characteristic being a long mane. It is to be presumed, fairly, that this carving was the production of one who must have been contemporary with the extinct animal, and its discovery confirms the results already arrived at by geological indications of the most positive character.

—"The Autographic Mirror," a periodical gathering of "inedited facsimile autographs of illustrious and distinguished men," and published in London and Paris, furnishes us with the following letter of Charles Dickens. There may be some question, we should suppose, about the propriety of making public a private communication of this kind, but—that being once done—it is certainly too clever and characteristic not to deserve a wider circulation:

DEVONSHIRE TERRACE,
2d January, 1844.

MY DEAR SIR:

That is a very horrible case you tell me of. I would to God I could get at the parental heart of —— ——, in which event I would so scarify it that he should writhe again. But if I were to put such a father as he is into a book, all the fathers going (and especially the bad ones) would hold up their hands and protest against the unnatural caricature. I find that a great many people (particularly those who might have sat for the character) consider even Mr. Pecksniff a grotesque impossibility, and Mrs. Nickleby herself, sitting bodily before me in a solid chair, once asked me if I really believed there ever was such a woman.

So ——, reviewing his own case, would not believe in Jonas Chuzzlewit. "I like Oliver Twist," says ——, "for I am fond of children; but the book is unnatural, for who would think of being cruel to poor little Oliver Twist?"

Nevertheless, I will bear the dog in my mind, and if I can hit him between the eyes so that he shall stagger more than you or I have done this Christmas under the combined efforts of Punch and Judy, I will.

Thank you cordially for your note. Excuse this scrap of paper; I thought it was a whole sheet until I turned over.

My dear sir,
Faithfully yours,
CHARLES DICKENS.

—The recent completion of the sixth edition of the "Manuel du Libraire" of M. J. C. Brunet, has revived attention to the work that, since its first publication in 1809, has in its various modifications always stood in the front rank of bibliographical authorities. It is a very rare thing for an author to be able to revise and enlarge his work fifty-four years after its original appearance. Such, however, has been the good fortune of M. Brunet, and the book in its present form is an astonishing instance of the preservation and active use of the mental faculties of one now in his eighty-sixth year. Its six large and clearly printed royal octavo volumes are a credit to the press of MM. Didot, though it must be said the text is frequently deformed by mistakes in the spelling of English words and names that meet the eye too readily, and would seem to be of easy avoidance so near as the two capitals, London and Paris, are now brought together. With its unquestioned usefulness in its own department, few books have been more misunderstood than "Brunet's Manuel," when its true purpose is overlooked. Many have supposed it is a literary guide to the world of books, and have been surprised proportionably in finding the object of their search unnoticed. It has no pretension of the kind, however, and professes to be the manual of the bookseller, not of the student or literary man. Now as intellectual merit, and the various causes that combine to make a book rare, choice, or precious in the eyes of collectors, exist quite independently of each other, it follows that a large portion of the pages of the "Manuel" are occupied with mere curiosities—works the particulars of which are important to be known by those who buy or sell them, but of very problematical value in any other point of view. This is particularly the case with the class of old French books generally designated as "Facetiæ." These being now sought after with great avidity, are described with a minuteness and prolixity that, when the subjects are considered, seem often surprising to any other people than the French. The "Table," or Catalogue Raisonné, however, forming the sixth volume, and comprising a classical arrangement of some forty thousand distinct works, is a very extensive synopsis of human knowledge, and the sources from whence it is to be gathered. Altogether the book is an indispensable one, and should be found in all libraries of five thousand volumes. The large-paper copies are fine specimens of mechanical perfection in the art of printing. It is said more copies of these were subscribed for in the city of Philadelphia alone, than in all Great Britain. They now bear a large premium over the publishing price.

—The principle of association, under the guarantee of "limited liability," by which each member is only answerable for his individual number of shares, is making rapid progress in England in almost every description of business, and already begins to be perceptible in its effects on the production of books. Its application to the circulating library system, started by Mr. Mudie—the ramifications of which penetrate into every corner of England—was highly successful, and dividends of ten per cent. have been realized in the undertaking. Another association, "The Library Company," projected with the same purposes, is also flourishing. The great chromo-lithographic publishing establishment of Messrs. Day & Son, from whose presses have proceeded most of the recent fine illustrated works, as "Roberts's Views in the East," "Simpson's Crimea," "Digby Wyatt's Industrial Masterpieces of the Nineteenth Century," "Owen Jones's Alhambra," and a host of others, have recently been transformed into a company on the same principle, with a share capital of three or four hundred thousand dollars. Two large copper-plate printing concerns are among the latest private establishments so transformed, and the results are, in every case, said to be so favorable that we shall certainly soon see publishing conducted on the same plan.

—The genius of Napoleon III. has hit upon a new attraction for the coming Universal Exhibition of 1867, to be held at Paris. His minister of public Instruction, M. Duruy, has lately announced to the professors of the schools of Paris and Versailles that, "while the immense edifice is being erected which is to display all the march of industry, the Emperor desires to see another temple raised by able hands to the genius of France. What she has thought set side by side with what she has done, will form a noble exhibition, wherein the sciences, arts, and letters shall recount their progress and history for the last twenty years—showing what theories they have produced, what ideas they have given birth to, what facts they have discovered or explained, what new form of imagination or art they have originated." The details of the plan are not yet touched upon, but the idea of a grand international scholastic and intellectual competition is new and startling, and it seems at present difficult to understand how it can be successfully carried into execution. It might seem invidious to suggest that a desire to propitiate the class of literati and men of science who have hitherto, more than any other order of persons, stood aloof from the second empire and its seductions, may be one of the motives of the scheme.

—It was generally supposed that the existing heavy rates of duty and the high cost of specie and exchange would limit the importation of books in the United States to a point below the usual average of the years previous to the war. Such, however, is not the case, and while money continues as plentiful in supply as it now is with the few fortunate ones who give the tone to the business of the time, we may expect to see this branch of commercial enterprise largely developed The high price of labor and materials at present ruling here is, of course, one cause of the demand for foreign books, and it is said by those who have examined the subject, that a book can be manufactured in England, and after paying the duties and charges, etc. (now amounting to about forty-five per cent.), can be placed in New York at a less price than it could be produced for here; this applies only to cases, be it noticed, where large quantities are in question, and large capital is employed in England in their publication. The market for Bibles affords an illustration of this fact. The supply of cheap copies of the Bible formerly manufactured at Philadelphia, Hartford, and other places in the Eastern States, is now derived almost entirely from abroad. The quantities imported are very large, and comprise the varieties printed at Oxford, London, and in Scotland. The finer qualities have always been in demand from their superior artistic finish, binding, etc., but we now refer to the cheap editions—so cheap, indeed, that we believe a complete Bible can be purchased, wholesale, in a durable and attractive form for twenty-five cents. The same cheapness is claiming notice in other quarters. Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have recently made a purchase of a great many thousand volumes of miniature poets, etc., manufactured in England, to be incorporated in their "blue and gold series," and, of course, for less than they could replace them here. When books are stereotyped abroad, it is usual for English publishers to accept offers for editions from their plates at a very small advance over the cost of paper and printing; a liberal practice, that tends to introduce good books among us, and will gradually raise the native standard of manufacturing skill.

—Thomas Chandler Haliburton, of whose decease we are notified by the last European arrivals, made at one step a mark in the literature of English-speaking nations that will ensure the continuance of his fame. His previous dĕbut in literature, by the production of an instructive and laborious "History of Nova Scotia," had little prepared the world for the mingled bonhomie and shrewdness, the worldly sense and humor, apparent to every one in "Sam Slick, the Clockmaker." His creation of a dialect appropriate as a medium for the expression of his keen, sagacious satire, is not the least of the writer's achievements, for no Yankee ever talked in the style attributed to "Sam." The success of this book is scarcely more remarkable than the comparative failure of all his other numerous writings. Certainly none but the Clockmaker can be said to survive him. The first lively runnings of his fancy seem to have exhausted a subject that owed its reception in some measure to its novelty and oddity, which palled on subsequent attempts to revive it. We believe the circumstances have not been made public that induced Judge Haliburton, at mature years, to leave his native country, and attempt a new career in England. The borough of Launceston, represented by him for some years in Parliament, is in the patronage of the Duke of Northumberland, but if his presence was considered desirable in the House of Commons as a recruit who might render service to the Conservative party, the expectation was not fulfilled, as want of physical power made him ineffective as a speaker, and the late period of life at which he was introduced to so new a scene has always proved an insurmountable obstacle to those so circumstanced who have sought distinction in this arena. Judge Haliburton was born in Nova Scotia three years before the commencement of the present century. He was said to be preparing a new edition of his magnum opus, "Sam Slick," at the time of his death.

—If any one wants to see what have been the scientific results of the war we have so recently emerged from, they will be found in the series of volumes summed up in an excellent list of American books on military history and science contained in the July number of "Trübner's American and Oriental Literary Record." They are arranged under the heads—I. Military History; II. General Treatises on Military Art; III. Military Administration; IV. Military Law; V. Tactics and Strategy (1, General, 2, Cavalry, 3, Infantry); VI. Artillery, including Musketry and Rifle Practice; VII. Military Engineering and Fortifications; VIII. Military Hygiene, Pathology, and Surgery. The number of works catalogued is about one hundred and fifty, and with few and unimportant exceptions they have all been called into being by the demands of the war of the rebellion. Such an example of a literature extemporized, so to speak, on the exigencies of the moment, so creditable in mechanical execution, and so well posted up in the latest scientific discoveries and investigations, is a thing never before equalled in literary annals. It displays wonderfully the faculty of adaptability to emergencies that characterizes both the nation and the individuals that compose it, and will remain not the least monument of the glorious results of the contest.

—Messrs. Little & Brown have made arrangements to receive an early supply of Dr. Smith's "Concise Dictionary of the Bible," wherein he condenses into one volume the information contained in the three closely printed royal octavos of the large edition. Like the other dictionaries of Dr. Smith, it is offered by Little & Brown, by special arrangement with the English publishers, at a price so low as to leave no room for the competition of a reprint while the original English copy has far greater claim to preference than any hasty or inferior impression could have, if any such was intended.

—A work of great utility to the scientific world has been for some years in progress at the expense of the Royal Society, and now approaches completion. It is an index to the separate papers, articles, memoirs, etc., contained in the transactions of learned societies and the journals published periodically in the various countries of Europe and America. The number of series grouped together under the head of "Transactions," whose contents are analyzed, is over two hundred and twenty-five. The journals similarly treated amount to about three hundred and fifty in number. The obvious benefit of this work is so great—since the general circulation of periodicals fits them more and more as receptacles for the news of discoveries and researches in science—that its publication has been undertaken by the Government. Copies will be liberally distributed to foreign societies, libraries, etc., and a portion reserved for sale. It is to be feared that for American journals, etc., much will be wanting to the completeness of this index that an application for co-operation in the United States could supply. Few indeed have any idea of the extent to which this system of publication has prevailed in this country. A professional gentleman of New York has been engaged in his leisure moments for some years in bringing together the journals and magazines published in America relating to medical science alone. His collection of these works now comprises above fifteen hundred volumes. It is perfectly unique, and, as such, it is hoped will never be separated.

DRAPER'S CIVIL POLICY OF AMERICA.*

THE title of this volume may perhaps define the design contemplated by the author in writing it, but fails to describe its contents. Nor is the reader much helped to understand what these are by the somewhat obscure preface and introduction. Dr. Draper says, for instance, in the preface, that "in a work on the 'Intellectual Development of Europe,' published by me in 1863, I showed that the historical progress of the nations of that continent illustrated the fact that social advancement is as completely under the control of natural law as is the bodily growth of an individual. It was my intention, in that work, to limit the application of the principles employed to the case of Europe, but it is plain that they may equally be made to apply to the case of America. . . . Selecting, therefore, some of the prominent principles thus presented, I design to show in this work their bearing on certain questions of great political interest in America." But half a page later he tells us that "to appreciate the workings of some of those natural laws in the case of America, to divine the future tendencies of the republic, to extract from the observations we make rules for national conduct—these are the objects to which the following pages are devoted." In the introduction there is still another statement of the purpose of the book: "There are principles specially applicable to each nation, which guide it in its determinations, and settle the course of its life. Some of these principles I propose now to point out, selecting from many topics the four following: influence of climate, effects of emigration, political force of ideas, natural cause of national development, and making these serve as a frame-work for the convenient presentation of these principles."

To recapitulate briefly, we have then the four following statements by the author concerning the object of his work:

1. To present thoughts on the future civil policy of America.

2. To show the bearing of principles (of what nature is not explained, save by the statement that they were employed by the author in a former work in which the fact was established that social advancement is under the control of natural law) on certain questions of political interest in America.

3. To appreciate the working of some of "these" natural laws in the case of America.

4. To point out some of the principles which guide a nation.

It is plain from the analysis that though the author himself may have a distinct conception of what he proposes to write about, he fails to communicate it to his reader, and that his use of the terms law and principle is, to say the least, somewhat vague. A similar confusion of thought, and a similar reiteration of statement to the foregoing, are characteristic of the book throughout. To be able to state his thought precisely, to hold it firmly, to give it definite form, and to use the fundamental terms on which it depends with precision, are the first qualifications required of a writer on any subject of philosophy. These qualifications Dr. Draper does not possess. He exhibits intellectual activity, and considerable literary and scientific acquisition, but his mind is discursive, and in spite of his scientific training his thought is often inexact and his reasoning often illogical, while his attainments are more various and wide than solid and profound. The natural result of these facts is exhibited in the work before us, in the vast number of ingenious, but too frequently altogether hasty, generalizations with which it abounds, and in the superfluity of illustration by which the theories of the author are accompanied rather than supported.

In spite of these great defects, and of not less obvious defects of literary style, to some of which we shall hereafter refer, the book is not without interest. Any serious attempt to bring before the attention of American readers, and to exhibit in the case of America the operation of those "natural laws," so called, by which national progress and development are effected, deserves to be treated with respect; and even though the design be very imperfectly executed, as in the present instance, it may succeed in directing the thoughts of the thoughtful portion of the community to subjects of the highest importance.

The cardinal doctrine with which Dr. Draper sets out is "that in individual life, in social life, in national life, everything is influenced by physical agents, and is therefore under the control of law," p. 36. "The progress of human generations is shaped by the physical circumstances in which they live," p. 66. "Physical circumstances control the deeds of men, as it may be said, in spite of themselves," p. 80. "Man yields helplessly to the powers operating upon him" p. 56. 'His will is overridden and for ever kept in check," p. 37. "The historian relying on the immutability of nature may predict the inevitable course through which a nation must pass," p. iv. Having thus laid down in the broadest manner this doctrine of fatalism and materialism, Dr. Draper devotes the first chapter of his volume to an exposition of the power exerted by the influence of climate upon the physical and intellectual nature of man, and over the destiny of nations. A single remarkable sentence will be sufficient to show to what extremes he pushes his conclusions. He says (p. 25), "Without the Gulf Stream, Newton would never have written his 'Principia,' nor Milton his 'Paradise Lost.'" Why not go further back? What if the British Isles had never risen from the sea?

And yet, as if shrinking from the terrible results of his own doctrine, and with a curious logical inconsistency, our author says, "In thus ascending to primordial laws, and asserting their immutability, universality, and paramount control in the government of the world, there is nothing inconsistent with the free action of man." We do not understand Dr. Draper as meaning what he says here, that in this assertion there is nothing inconsistent with the free action of man,—it would hardly be necessary to declare this,—but that in the paramount control of immutable law there is nothing inconsistent with man's free action. He goes on with a statement which no one will contradict, but the connection of which with what he has just said is not obvious: "The appearance of things depends altogether on the point of view we occupy," and he then proceeds to tell us, as if in proof of man's free action, that if man "could attain to the truly philosophical point of view, rising high enough to see the whole world at a glance, his acutest vision would fail to discern the slightest indication of man, his free will, or his works," p. 35. Except in Dr. Draper's own pages, we have not often met with such confusion of thought as is here manifest.

The utter disregard, in this portion of Dr. Draper's philosophy, of the fact that Man is a higher power than the Nature by which he is surrounded, and that while subjected to her inexorable laws he is also superior to them and capable of mastering them through the laws of his superior being, leads him to various conclusions which have no other foundation than his own assertion. Thus he lays it down, without qualification, that nations, like individual men, are born and die. "What," he asks with awful solemnity, "does the inexorable hand of History write? Rome, Macedon, Persia, Assyria, Egypt, all are gone. . . . . How vain it is to close our eyes to the portentous lesson, to refuse to read what is written in the Book of Destiny!" History is altogether too short a record to warrant us in drawing any such absolute conclusion from it as Dr. Draper has done. The nation, he declares, moves through the same inevitable career as the individual—of birth, childhood, youth, maturity, old age, and death, in a like helpless and predestined manner. But the analogy between an individual and a nation is as unphilosophical as it is imperfect. Dr. Draper does but confuse himself and his readers by declaring that the analogy arises from a similarity in their constitution. He substitutes a metaphor for a reality. The nation has no abstract existence; no existence save in the lives of the individuals that compose it. The history of the past is the history of the rise and fall of nations, conditioned on the characters of the people composing them. There is no law of nature, or of human nature, which renders the death of a nation inevitable. The perpetuity of a nation depends on moral more than on physical conditions; its progress is directed by moral as well as by material laws—each set of laws being bound together in mutual interactions, the intricate results of which no study of the past will enable us to foresee. Modern civilization is under the conscious influence of moral laws, of which the civilization of the old world was ignorant. It is directed towards an ideal of which the fundamental conception is the brotherhood of man, the unity in diversity of mankind, the destruction of all national hostilities, the co-ordination and co-operation of all nations in the promotion of the common welfare of the race. The existence of this ideal as a motive force, continually acquiring more and more power over the thoughts and wills and actions of men, is not only an assurance of the advance of civilization, but also of the future perpetuity of nations. No nation is doomed to decline and death from the operation of material causes, for these causes may be held in check and counteracted by the moral force of continually fresh, renewed, and everlasting human energies. The will of men is short, but man is a power of endless life, and in the long conflict of will with fate, will at length prevails.

* "Thoughts on the Future Civil Policy of America. By John William Draper, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York, author of a 'Treatise on Human Physiology' and of a 'History of the Intellectual Development of Europe.'" New York: Harper & Brothers. 1865. 8vo, pp. 317.

Dr. Draper, with his fondness for iteration, repeats his notions in regard to the destined career of nations in various connections; but leaving the subordinate matter, we return to the main subject of his first chapter, which we find him repeating in an axiomatic form on p. 58. "Uniformity of climate," he says, "makes people homogeneous. They will necessarily think alike, and inevitably act alike." Not satisfied with one utterance of this astonishingly sweeping affirmation, he repeats it on page 67, and again on page 78. "The writing in aphorisms," says Lord Bacon, "has many excellent virtues. For, first, it trieth the writer whether he be superficial or solid."

We can hardly doubt which of these epithets belongs to Dr. Draper, especially when we find him, toward the end of his chapter, arriving at the conclusion that these climatic influences, under which he has declared man to be helpless, forcing him to necessary thoughts and inevitable actions, may be neutralized by his own efforts and action. The whole of this chapter amounts to this—man is compelled by natural laws to an inevitable course of action, he may, nevertheless, pursue another course; his thoughts are necessitated, but he may have other thoughts. Such is Dr. Draper's logic. But we conceive that he is much more sensible than appears from his loose and contradictory thought. We believe that he means merely that man, though subjected to the influence of natural laws which he cannot escape from, has it yet in his power to modify, resist, and in greater or less degree counteract their operation. The methods of doing so which he recommends as most efficient in America are education and intercommunication.

Dr. Draper's second chapter treats of what he calls the effects of emigration. It is exceedingly desultory, and it is over-weighted with illustrations which are of little value in throwing light on the main topic. The principles which the author proposes to establish are, in his own words, first, "that the political effect of emigration depends upon the grade of society from which the emigrating mass has issued;" second, "that homogeneousness in a community imparts stability, though it eventually implies stagnation;" third, "that a community suffering incessant blood-disturbance will exhibit social activity, though if the disturbing element is very base, a corresponding depreciation of its absolute value will ensue"—by which we suppose him to mean a depreciation of the value of the community, not of the disturbing element. The application of these principles to the case of America made by Dr. Draper does not seem to us philosophical or fortunate, with the exception of some brief and excellent remarks on the probable effects of emigration from the Northern Atlantic States to the South. A similar looseness of thought and hastiness of generalization to those which we have pointed out as pervading the first portion of the work prevail also in this. Thus, for example, on page 108, Dr. Draper says that the cause why, on the continent of Europe, "government has become so difficult, and that there is nothing certain as to its right principles, and no unanimity in religion" (we are not responsible either for his assertion or his grammar), is "the intrinsic difference between the conclusions of the intelligent few and the fetichisms of the innumerable illiterate mass;" while, on page 177, he tells us that Europe "has attained to no settled maxims of political life, and to no definite religious opinions," because of "her want" of "the impossibility of securing consistent action among so many rival and antagonistic states."

Dr. Draper, in his third chapter, proposes to treat of the political force of ideas. He begins with the sound reflection that "philosophical conceptions of the historical progress of humanity must not be altogether of a material kind." "An idea," he says, "may possess supreme political influence." A sentiment "may re-arrange races of men and revolutionize the world." Having exaggerated the influence of natural laws, he here exaggerates that of moral forces. He illustrates the impelling power of ideas by the instance of Mohammedanism in a gloomy episode of some twenty pages. In this long passage our author has plainly laid himself out for effect. Few readers, we fancy, can read these pages without a smile. To delight those who may not have an opportunity of seeing the volume we make a short extract:

"The wilderness of Arabia is the birthplace of that most noble of all quadrupeds, the horse. Though his neck is clothed with thunder, and the glory of his nostrils is terrible—though he paweth in the valley and rejoiceth in his strength—though he swalloweth the ground in his fierceness and rage, neither [sic] can he persuade himself that it is the sound of the trumpet—though he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains and the shouting, he plays with the Bedouin children that are round his master's tent. How deeply has a love of that beautiful creature affected the civilization of Europe! What had it not to do with chivalry! It turned the bloodthirsty warrior into a gentle and courteous knight."

Dr. Draper has given a long list of the precious and useful objects which we have received from Arabia and the East. He does not inform us that some philologists have derived "bosh" from the same region.

In the earlier part of his book, Dr. Draper has told us that "though seemingly the master man is really the dependent of physical agencies," p. 29. Here he tells us "that man can comprehend nature, and subjugate physical agents." "A most audacious idea!" he adds; "modern Europe is fast submitting itself to its rule." It is not easy to understand in what the audacity of this ancient idea consists—the right of the human race over nature, that right which, as Lord Bacon admirably says, "humano generi ex dotatione divina competit."

Dr. Draper here diverges from his track to enter on "a partial illustration of what has been done toward obtaining a true knowledge of nature and the subjugation of physical agents to the use of man." After giving a very al and very imperfect summary of the advance of science, he asks, "Why is it that in Europe the doctrines connected with these facts, instead of being welcomed with delight, have had to fight their way? Why is it that those who have revealed them suffer obloquy, in some instances have suffered death?" "What is there, I ask, in such things as these to provoke the resentment of man?" "Is it any answer to reply that, some fifteen hundred years ago, there was a Roman general who seized imperial power from his competitors, and whose political necessities were such that he had to inaugurate this untoward course?" Whatever "to inaugurate an untoward course" may be, we can assure Dr. Draper that this reply is no answer whatever to his question, notwithstanding his assertion that "this is the only answer that can be made." The whole passage from which these last citations are made, appears to belong to that species of philosophical writing of which Burke somewhere speaks, in which "paradoxes which affront common sense, and uninteresting barren truths which generate no conclusion, are thrown in to augment unwieldy bulk, without adding anything to weight."

The fourth and last chapter of this book is entitled "On the Natural Course of National Development," and, according to the author, "the general object of this chapter is to show that, in all durable human associations, there is a natural, an inevitable tendency to the concentration of power." This proposition is unintelligible to us, and although Dr. Draper devotes eighty pages to its elucidation, we are as much at a loss at their end as at their beginning to know what vague shadow of an idea the author himself may have attached to it. What power is concentrated, or where it is concentrated, whether in society, in a class, in the government, or in an individual, does not appear. On page 244 he says: "The course of nature is for the development and concentration of intellect." On the next page, he "pauses a moment to make this significant remark—everything is tending to a concentration of power." On page 248, we are told "that all political institutions, imperceptibly or visibly, spontaneously or purposely, should tend to the improvement and organization of national intellect." Two pages later, we learn that "for stability to be attained, a nation must submit to be controlled by its reason; it must organize its intellect, it must concentrate it." But as if aware that this axiom was somewhat enigmatic, Dr. Draper exclaims, "How true it is that, for a nation to be great, it must aim at something above its animal nature!" and he then tells us that "we are in the act of transition from the animal to the intellectual." It would seem from all this that his "concentration of power" has some relation to the "concentration of intellect." But the latter phrase is not less unintelligible than the former, and in a maze of confusion we have to guess out our author's meaning as well or as ill as we may.

The solemnity of Dr. Draper's manner is so magisterial, his assertions are so absolute, his discourse so peremptory, and he sweeps the contents of the encyclopædia with such a portentous air of labor and information into the grand reservoir of his speculation, that it is plain he would have us listen, like the votaries at some ancient shrine, with unquestioning awe to his oracular deliverances. And no doubt there will be many disciples to gratify him. Loose thought suits loose thinkers. "It is far more easy," to quote another sentence from Burke, "to support paradoxical opinions to the satisfaction of a common auditory, than to establish a doubtful truth by solid and conclusive arguments."

We would by no means be understood as implying that Dr. Draper never comes out of the region of enigmas, fallacies, and half-truths into that of truth. In this chapter, for example, he dwells on the fact that "the American political system is founded on public intellectual culture," in other words, on universal education. But although he sees and enforces this truth, he connects with his statement of it a series of observations in respect to the nature of education so shallow as greatly to weaken the value of his general statement. Even after all the occasions for astonishment which Dr. Draper has given us, we confess to a new sense of surprise when we find him saying on page 273, "There was a vague notion, which, as we shall see, still unhappily prevails as regards the higher establishments of education, that the training of the mind is of more importance than the nature of the information imparted to it." It will be an unhappy day for America when this "vague notion" is discarded. So too in connection with the subject of education a long contrast is drawn between what Dr. Draper calls "the European method of government through the Morals, and the American of government through the Intellect," which is based on the hastiest inductions, and exhibits a lamentable confusion alike of language and of thought.

The value of Dr. Draper's contributions to the elucidation of the problems of the future civil policy of America may in some degree be estimated from what has already been said. The mere discussion of these questions in the light of science and of history is a commendable work. And this is the praise that justly belongs to Dr. Draper's volumes. But beyond this we cannot go. His collection of information is too indiscriminate; his judgment of the character of facts too unsound; his philosophical method too faulty, to give intrinsic importance to his speculations. Although he asserts that "the historian who relies on the immutability of nature may predict the inevitable course through which a nation must pass," he has really done little or nothing to help us to foresee the future career of the United States. He has dwelt on the necessity of education and intercommunication, on the effects of emigration, on the duty of protecting free thought, on the force and virtue of democratical institutions, but his views on these subjects are for the most part such as are familiar to men who have thought upon them at all. While he fails utterly to establish the correctness of the small portion of them which is original, a striking instance of the nature of his original speculations is exhibited in his considerations in regard to the possible spread of polygamy in America. He states that "there is imminent danger of the spread of polygamic institutions in the West," particularly as "a solution of the portentous problem of the admixture of the Pacific races." But he here makes no allowance for the operation of religious sentiment, of political institutions, and of the progress of intelligence, as well as of the long-established habits of our race. The illustration which he draws from the history of Arabian conquests and their extraordinary results is purely fallacious.

We have already devoted more space to this work than it deserves, except from the reputation of its author, but we cannot close without affording our readers the pleasure to be derived from a little selection of what we may call its prose Tupperisms, gems of platitudinarianism, the latest wisdom of the ages.

Thus, on p. 240, we have the striking and original remark in reference to the past: "There are many good men who look lingeringly on the past, expecting its wished for return. The past never returns."

Again, on p. 257, the startled reader is informed that "our daily experience assures us that for the success of any human undertaking, opportunity is essential."

On p. 249, Dr. Draper exhibits a fine sense of logical relation and great profundity of observation in the following somewhat depressing sentences: "A dozen rich gentlemen may meet together and proceed to build a railroad across the continent, or lay a telegraphic wire under the Atlantic Ocean. They may do whatever is possible to the omnipotence of wealth. But though all Americans should constitute themselves a joint stock company, they never by any votes or any resolves could call into existence a great soldier, a great lawyer, a great philosopher. They could never create a Newton, a Milton, an Alexander. Talent is a God-given gift." And truly, as Holofernes says, "The gift is good in those in whom it is acute."

Again, on the same page, how valuable is the information contained in the statement that "public education is an eminent advantage, but it is far from being everything;" and a little later, how instinctively we recognize the truth which we suspect nobody but Dr. Draper has ever taken the pains to point out, that, "do what we may, no organization, no education will ever make all men alike,"—or, according to the old proverb, "You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear."

When our author applies himself to moral philosophy, the result is equally valuable and unexpected. How just is the following remark! "The head of a family would act unwisely if he attempted to apply to his son at twenty-one the methods he had successfully used at ten; such methods could only be rendered effective by a resort to physical compulsion"—in plain English, you cannot treat a man as you treat a boy.

"How much," says he in his happiest vein of reflection,—"how much has the morality of the world been improved by coffee! It has refined society, imparted innocent comfort to individuals, and peace to many a family." And how lofty and lively is the humor with which he adds, "We abuse the abstemious religion of Mecca, the berry of Mocha we use."

CAN YOU FORGIVE HER?*

This new novel of Mr. Trollope's has nothing new to teach us either about Mr. Trollope himself as a novelist, about English society as a theme for the novelist, or, failing information on these points, about the complex human heart. Take any one of his former tales, change the names of half the characters, leave the others standing, and transpose the incidents, and you will have "Can You Forgive Her?" It is neither better nor worse than the tale which you will select. It became long ago apparent that Mr. Trollope had only one manner. In this manner he very soon showed us his maximum. He has recently, in "Miss Mackenzie," showed us his minimum. In the work before us he has remained pretty constantly at his best. There is, indeed, a certain amount of that inconceivably vulgar love-making between middle-aged persons by which "Miss Mackenzie" was distinguished; but the burden of the story rests upon the young people.

For so thick a book, there is certainly very little story. There are no less than three different plots, however, if the word can be applied to Mr Trollope's simple machinations. That is, there is a leading story, which, being foreseen at the outset to be insufficient to protract the book during the requisite number of months, is padded with a couple of underplots, one of which comes almost near being pathetic, as the other falls very far short of being humorous. The main narrative, of course, concerns the settlement in life—it is hard to give it a more sentimental name—of a beautiful young lady. Alice Vavasar, well-born, high-spirited, motherless, and engaged to Mr. John Grey, the consummate model of a Christian gentleman, mistrusting the quality of her affection, breaks off her engagement, after which, in a moment of enthusiasm, she renews an anterior engagement with her cousin, George Vavasar, a plausible rascal. John Grey will not be put off, however, and steadfastly maintains his suit. In the course of time George's villany is discovered. He attempts, unsuccessfully, to murder Grey. Grey follows his mistress, pleads his cause once more, and is taken back again. The question is, Can we forgive Miss Vavasar? Of course we can, and forget her, too, for that matter. What does Mr. Trollope mean by this question? It is a good instance of the superficial character of his work that he has been asking it once a month for so long a time without being struck by its flagrant impertinence. What are we to forgive? Alice Vavasar's ultimate acceptance of John Grey makes her temporary ill-treatment of him, viewed as a moral question, a subject for mere drawing-room gossip. There are few of Mr. Trollope's readers who will not resent being summoned to pass judgment on such a sin as the one here presented, to establish by precedent the criminality of the conscientious flutterings of an excellent young lady. Charming women, thanks to the talent of their biographers, have been forgiven much greater improprieties. Since forgiveness was to be brought into the question, why did not Mr. Trollope show us an error that we might really forgive—an error that would move us to indignation? It is too much to be called upon to take cognizance in novels of sins against convention, of improprieties; we have enough of these in life. We can have charity and pity only for real sin and real misery. We trust to novels to maintain us in the practice of great indignations and great generosities. Miss Vavasar's dilemma is doubtless considerable enough in itself, but by the time it is completely unfolded by Mr. Trollope it has become so trivial, it is associated with so much that is of a merely accidental interest, it is so deflowered of the bloom of a serious experience, that when we are asked to enter into it judicially, we feel almost tempted to say that really it is Miss Vavasar's own exclusive business. From the moment that a novel comes to a happy conclusion, we can forgive everything—or nothing. The gradual publication of "Can You Forgive Her?" made its readers familiar with the appeal resting upon their judgment long before they were in a position to judge. The only way, as it seems to us, to justify this appeal and to obviate the flagrant anti-climax which the work now presents, was to lead the story to a catastrophe, to leave the heroine primâ facie in the wrong, to make her rupture with Grey, in a word, final. Then we might have forgiven her in consideration of the lonely years of repentance in store for her, and of her having been at any rate consistent. Then the world's forgiveness would have been of some importance to her. Now, at one for ever with her lover, what matters our opinion? It certainly matters very little to ourselves.

* "Can You Forgive Her? By Anthony Trollope." New York: Harper & Bros.

Mr. Trollope's book presents no feature more remarkable than the inveteracy with which he just eludes being really serious; unless it be the almost equal success with which he frequently escapes being really humorous. Both of these results are the penalty of writing so rapidly; but as in much rapid writing we are often made to regret the absence of that sober second thought which may curtail an extravagance—that critical movement which, if you will only give it time, is sure to follow the creative one—so in Mr. Trollope we perpetually miss that sustained action of the imagination, that creative movement which in those in whom this faculty is not supreme may, if you will give it time, bear out the natural or critical one, which would intensify and animate his first conception. We are for ever wishing that he would go a little further, a little deeper. There are a hundred places in "Can You Forgive Her?" where even the dullest readers will be sure to express this wish. For ourselves, we were very much disappointed that when Alice returns to her cousin George she should not do so more frankly, that on eventually restoring herself to Grey she should have so little to expiate or to forget, that she should leave herself, in short, so easy an issue by her refusal to admit Vavasar to a lover's privilege. Our desire for a different course of action is simply founded on the fact that it would have been so much more interesting. When it is proposed to represent a young girl as jilting her lover in such a way as that the moral of the tale resolves itself into the question of the venality of her offence, it evinces in the novelist a deep insensibility to his opportunities that he should succeed, after all, in making of the tragedy but a simple postponement of the wedding-day.

To Mr. Trollope all the possible incidents of society seem to be of equal importance and of equal interest. He has the same treatment, the same tone, for them all. After narrating the minutest particulars of a certain phase of his heroine's experience, he will dwell with equal length and great patience upon the proceedings of a vulgar widow (the heroine's aunt), who is engaged in playing fast and loose with a couple of vulgar suitors. With what authority can we invest the pen which treats of the lovely niece, when we see it devoted with the same good-will to the utterly prosaic and unlovely aunt? It is of course evident that Mr. Trollope has not intended to make the aunt either poetic or attractive. He has intended, in the first place, to swell his book into the prescribed dimensions, and, incidentally, to make the inserted matter amusing. A single chapter of it might be amusing; a dozen chapters are inexpressibly wearisome. The undue prominence assigned to this episode is yet not so signal an offence against good judgment as the subordination of Lady Glencora Palliser's story to that of Alice Vavasar's. It is a great mistake in speaking of a novel to be over-positive as to what ought to be and what ought not; but we do not fear to dogmatize when we say that by rights Lady Glencora is the heroine of the book. Her adventure is more important, more dramatic, more interesting than Alice Vavasar's. That it is more interesting is not a matter of opinion, but a matter of fact. A woman who forsakes her husband belongs more to the technical heroic than a woman who merely forsakes her lover. Lady Glencora, young and fascinating, torn from the man of her heart and married to a stranger, and pursued after marriage by her old lover, handsome, dissolute, desperate, touches at a hundred points almost upon the tragical. And yet her history gets itself told as best it may, in the intervals of what is after all, considering the dénoûment, but a serious comedy. It is, to use a common illustration, as if Mr. Forrest should appear on the "off-nights" of no matter what fainter dramatic luminary. It signifies little in the argument that Lady Glencora's adventure came also to an anti-climax; for in this case the reader rejects the conclusion as a mere begging of the issue. Of all literary sinners Mr. Trollope deserves fewest hard words, but we can scarcely refrain from calling this conclusion impudent. To a real novelist's eye, the story on which it depends is hardly begun; to Mr. Trollope, it is satisfactorily ended. The only explanation of all this is probably that the measure of his invention is not in his subject, in his understanding with his own mind; but outside of it, in his understanding with his publishers. Poor little Lady Glencora, with her prettiness, her grace, her colossal fortune, and her sorrows, is the one really poetic figure in the novel. Why not have dealt her a little poetic justice? Why not, for her sake, have shown a little boldness? We do not presume to prescribe to Mr. Trollope the particular thing he should have done; we simply affirm in general terms that he should have gone further. Everything forbade that Lady Glencora and her lover should be vulgarly disposed of. What are we to conclude? It is easy to conceive either that Burgo Fitzgerald slowly wasted his life, or that he flung it suddenly away. But the supposition is by no means easy that Lady Glencora either wasted hers or carefully economized it. Besides, there is no pretence of winding up Burgo Fitzgerald's thread; it is rudely clipped by the editorial shears. There is, on the contrary, a pretence of completing the destiny of his companion. But we have more respect for Lady Glencora's humanity than to suppose that the incident on which the curtain of her little tragedy falls, is for her anything more than an interruption. Another case in which Mr. Trollope had burdened himself, as he proceeded, with the obligation to go further, is that of George Vavasar. Upon him, as upon Lady Glencora, there hangs a faint reflection of poetry. In both these cases, Mr. Trollope, dealing with an unfamiliar substance, seems to have evoked a ghost which he cannot exorcise. As the reader follows George Vavasar deeper into his troubles—all of which are very well described—his excited imagination hankers for—what shall we say? Nothing less positive than Vavasar's death. Here was a chance for Mr. Trollope to redeem a thousand pages of small talk; the wretched man should have killed himself; for although bloodshed is not quite so common an element of modern life as the sensation writers would have us believe, yet people do occasionally, when hard pushed, commit suicide. But for Mr. Trollope anything is preferable to a sensation; an incident is ever preferable to an event. George Vavasar simply takes ship to America.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Voices of the Soul Answered in God. By Rev. John Reid. Robert Carter & Bros., New York.

Letter of Hon. M. F. Conway to Senator Doolittle, of Wisconsin, in Support of President Johnson's Policy of Reconstruction. Office of The Republic, Richmond.

The Life and Times of Sir William Johnson, Bart. By William L. Stone. 2 Vols. J. Munsell, Albany.

The Backwoodsman; or, Life on the Indian Frontier. Edited by Sir C. F. Lascelles Wraxall, Bart. T. O H. P. Burnham, Boston.

Slavery and Southern Methodism. Two Sermons Preached in the Methodist Church in Newman, Ga., by Rev. John H. Caldwell. 1865.

Illustrated School History of the United States. By G. P. Quackenbos, A.M.—A Latin Grammar for Schools and Colleges. By Albert Harkness, Ph.D.—A Latin Reader. By the same. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

The Lost Will; and the Diamond Bracelet. By Mrs. Henry Wood. T. B. Peterson & Bros., Philadelphia.

The Rebellion Record. Part XLIX. D. Van Nostrand, New York.

Life of Abraham Lincoln. By Joseph H. Barrett. Moore, Wilstach & Baldwin, Cincinnati.

Fine Arts.

THE DESIGNS FOR THE CENTRAL PARK GATES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Permit me to offer for your consideration the following remarks, suggested by a careful reading of the criticism of "The Designs for the Central Park Gates," contained in your journal (No. 6). To be concise, the various points will be reviewed in the order in which they appear. But before entering into details, it might be well to state that I agree with the critic as to the inappropriateness of the nomenclature which he gives to the gates; and am led to believe that the nomenclature given in a communication to the Evening Post (July 21), is the proper one, as everything in the designs sustains the description. It is as follows:

"The entrance at the corner of Fifth Avenue it is proposed to call the Gate of Peace, the one on the opposite side, at Eighth Avenue, the Warrior's Gate, thus representing the two great divisions with which all human industry and effort are divided—the arts of peace and the arts of war. The intermediate entrance at Sixth Avenue it is proposed to call the Gate of Commerce, and that at the Seventh Avenue the Artists' Gate. The designs are of a monumental character, in keeping with these several designations."

Comprehensive views of the several entrances, with their surroundings, have been given for the purpose of making them more thoroughly understood. In consequence, the scale of the drawing is very small. And has not the artist been eminently successful in his endeavor to make the general disposition understood, since an attempt at criticism of the details is made? As regards the sculpture shown in the designs, it should be considered as an indication merely of the position and importance of the same. This matter belongs to the sculptor. It is hardly possible that the statuary should have been decided upon. Even were it otherwise, would it not be expecting rather too much of the artist, to offer for criticism groups, equestrian statues, etc., on such a minute scale? To proceed then. From th statement in reference to the Eighth Avenue entrance, "that the roads of the Park, as they were originally laid out and built and still remain," one might infer that no alteration was contemplated. On careful examination, however, it appears, that, without disturbing the general disposition of the place and its accessories, this entrance, as is the case with the other three, is altogether changed. Here, at the Eighth Avenue entrance, besides its contour being greatly simplified, the open area or place, in the accepted design, has been greatly enlarged, its capacity more than double that originally contemplated. For the extrances to the Park, on the northern side of the place, are now carried back, and situated opposite Sixtieth Street—an improvement not easily over-estimated—thereby giving space, besides direct access from another street, a great desideratum ; Fifty-ninth Street being already a thoroughfare for the city horse cars, and particularly objectionable at this point, where it is crossed by the Broadway and Eighth Avenue tracks. The adopted design also contemplates the widening of the drives themselves, just at the entrance ; they being made sufficiently large to accommodate the pedestals designed for the middle of each. Moreover, the walks, instead of turning off just at the entrance into Eighth Avenue and into Fifty-ninth Street, as originally designed, now have their exits directly on the place, being set back some twenty feet ; thus enlarging the sidewalks, for the more ample accommodation of the public, and giving more importance to the carriage entrances. Again, as originally designed, and as the place now exists, great risk is incurred by pedestrians attempting to cross, with vehicles driving in every direction. It would soon become necessary to provide for their safety by clustering posts, or by some similar means, which we see resorted to daily in our city thoroughfares. (The open space, between the south end of the City Hall Park and the site formerly occupied by Barnum's Museum, furnishes an example of what is alluded to.) Now, with the intended enlargement, this objectionable feature disappears, as it facilitates the introduction, in the middle of the place, of a spacious circular sidewalk ; forming thus a place of refuge, as it were, for pedestrians. Here, also, is introduced a fountain, which will enliven and add greatly to the general effect. The critic is right, when he alludes to the "natural advantage in favor of this over the other main entrance on Fifty-ninth Street—namely, at the corner of Fifth Avenue. . . . . The most is made of this advantage by the really successful adaptation of the architectural structures to the carriage drives and foot-path" [paths].

After a clear description of the general features of this entrance, the criticism reads :

"Owing to the nature of the drawing, we have been able, in describing the general character of the design, to speak with as much confidence as if a map or plan of the whole were in question. The praise we have given the design it evidently deserves. But, owing to the small scale of the drawing, it is impossible to see all the architectural detail, the minuter portions being lost. Thus it is evident that Ionic capitals are used, but whether they are good Ionic is not so clear.

"Indeed, there is some uncertainty whether these capitals crown pilasters in every case, or whether some of them belong to three-quarter columns. This uncertainty in regard to some of the details is the more to be regretted, because what is visible of this detail is not good. The design of the gate-posts, for instance—whether it is of four pilasters or of four engaged columns that the body of each is made—is very inappropriate. . . . Each is a clustered pier, cruciform in plan ; there is a base, in plan a Greek cross, and very high, about five feet high it seems to be ; upon this stands the cluster of pilasters or parts of columns ; four halves of Ionic capitals look four different ways ; and upon these rests a full classical cornice, which breaks around and into the twelve angles of this cross about four feet in greatest dimension, as if around the corners of a temple. The whole pier is about fifteen feet high, and upon each pier is placed a globe with a spread eagle perched upon it."

Now, the bases of these gate-posts form the abutments of the walls of enclosure on Fifty-ninth Street and Eighth Avenue, and are naturally of the same height with them. Besides, is it not well that the Ionic employed should thus be sufficiently elevated, so that the architectural effect may not be interfered with on occasions when the place becomes crowded? Again, the clustered piers are composed in neither of the ways described. There exists a combination of engaged columns and of antæ, the latter serving as hanging-styles, the former occupying the other two sides, each being crowned by its appropriate capital, that of the antæ differing in toto from the Ionic capital. Of course, these posts are surmounted by a cornice, but why, if unable to discern the component parts of the body of the post, undertake to describe in detail the cornice? In alluding to the globes surmounting the piers, the critic appears to spread the eagle rather more than the design shows.

Now, as to whether "a granite block or a square brick pier would have been in every way better." Were it thought advisable to treat these entrances in a rural manner, this suggestion might be followed. But it has been decided, and wisely so, that something monumental in character should adorn these principal entrance-ways. Besides, they should harmonize with the surrounding street architecture as well as with the Park. Any attempt at rusticity would be a failure. To bear out this statement it will only be necessary to allude to a somewhat similar attempt, made within the recollection of most of us, namely, the introduction of a rustic fountain in the Bowling Green. Nothing, certainly, could be more natural and rustic as a fountain than was that jet d'eau spouting out of a pile of rocks. But, pretty as it may have been, it was inappropriate for the site, and consequently replaced by another more formal but more suitable for the locality.

Next, I beg leave to correct an error in the general description of the principal entrance at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street. On inspection of the plan of the Park, where is shown a sufficient indication of the entrances for this purpose, and upon visiting the premises, one sees that "five gateways" do not "open into the park, all side by side." On the contrary, the footpath between the bridle-road and Fifth Avenue diverges from the others, and has its exit as far from them as possible, close to the boundary wall ; in fact, shrubbery and trees are here introduced, in order to distinctly separate it from the other entrance-ways. For what purpose, it is hard to conceive, as this disposition merely tends to break up the unity and detract from the importance of the whole. It may have been a necessity in the plan of the former architect of the Park, as there exists on the Central Park plans the indication of a very objectionable feature at this entrance, namely, the subdivision of the open area preceding the entrances into the Park by an enclosure or railing, running parallel with the Fifth Avenue, and extending from the solitary footpath in question to the circular parterre laid out in the middle of the place ; from thence at right angles to the outer wall of the Park, thereby presenting at this entrance a corner very similar to the corners at the intersection of any two streets in the city !—instead of providing for one uninterrupted, spacious place, as will now be the case. Besides detracting from the grandeur of the ensemble, would not this iron railing present somewhat the appearance of an immense cage? And why encumber the place with a double set of gates when one set at the entrance-ways suffices ?—to say nothing of doubling the expense ! The critic finds "the gate-posts themselves certainly much better than at the Eighth Avenue gate. There is nothing deserving of special praise—they are only solid and suitable piers ; nor is there anything deserving of blame, if we except what seems to us the degradation of the Doric cornice, thus put, with all its triglyphs, to do duty eight feet above the eye, and to answer no purpose except partially to conceal the sculpture above it."

Why not "with all its triglyphs?" Would the critic presume to find fault with the world-renowned tomb of Scipio, with all its triglyphs? And why are these triglyphs now "eight feet above the eye?" when "in height these piers seem to be about fourteen feet." Now, certainly there should be a cornice to these posts, and there is nothing in the cornice as shown, not even the triglyphs, which should necessarily hinder the view of the sculpture above it. To continue—

"The most remarkable feature of this entrance is the terrace near it, a structure which, if it should ever exist except in drawings, will be more entirely an addition for the purposes of ornament than anything about the Park."

As regards purposes of ornament, "the terrace" at the extremity of the Mall resembles it in this respect. But, were it as stated, if deemed necessary, in order to balance the entrance place and to take away the lop-sided look which it otherwise might have (a serious consideration in the minds of many), there certainly could be no objection to it.

"This terrace, with its accessories—itself an accessory of no value at all—would cost a great deal of money. Useless as it is, injurious, as Mr. Vaux has shown it to be, . . ."

As to the value and the utility of this feature, minds may differ. As to the injury that it would do, Mr. Vaux, in an elaborate article published in the Evening Post, gives his opinion on the subject ; I beg leave to differ ; and am glad to see that the advantages of this feature are deemed of sufficient importance to outweigh any disturbance of the rural aspect of the sunken corner of the Park which he alludes to. "The suggestion of the Kaatskills, or the Adirondacks" (so beautifully portrayed by Mr. Vaux), are hardly realized by others. The sinuous path, following the contour of the lake, at the foot of the steep embankments of the encompassing street, must, of necessity, be a great thoroughfare, being, as it is, the only direct communication within the Park between the Fifth and Sixth Avenue entrances. Were it possible to imagine one's self enjoying the charming solitude he alludes to, might not the noise of the streets, or the stump of a cigar heedlessly tossed over the boundary wall, so disturb the mind, that all idea of rustic repose and reverie would have to be abandoned, in such close proximity to this entrance of the Park ?

"The city would bear the cost of it with a little more grace if it were only beautiful. But it is very ugly. It is bare where it needs ornament, and covered with badly designed and false ornament where none is needed."

There is nothing which might be considered purely ornament about the terrace proper.

Again :

"The bronze vulgarities have their ruling group, also of bronze, on the top of a tall column of poor design, namely, the coat of arms and its supporters of the city of New York 'in the round'—an heraldic device not familiar to heralds, and certainly not ornamental."

What possible objection can there be to the introduction, here, of that majestic feature of the "piazzetta" in Venice—the column surmounted by the Lion of St. Mark ?

No reason is given why the introduction of flagstaffs and "gonfalons" is "meaningless." They certainly form as important a feature here as they generally do. Something high is needed to satisfy the eye, to counterbalance the continuous horizontal line of the railings and enclosures—which railings, by the way, have been very successfully treated ; the ordinarily monotonous horizontal line of railing being gracefully broken by an ingenious and varied introduction of a system of tie-rods, which add much to the beauty and stability of the gates—(these tie-rods connect the outer edge of the gates with a stationary point above the top-rail ; the gates being thus more easily handled, being relieved of a great deal of their weight, and being prevented from sagging.)

The flagstaffs, also, high in air, are distinguishable at a distance ; whilst they do not interfere with the view of the Park as you approach it—a matter of no small importance. Next as to the point so hurriedly alluded to in the criticisms of the Sixth and Seventh Avenue entrances ; but that which, of necessity, is the most important, namely, "the alteration of the whole face of the ground thereabouts." In the first place, the entrances at the corners of Fifty-ninth Street and Fifth and Eighth Avenues are intended for all; those at Sixth and Seventh Avenues are reserved for pedestrians only. Thus, a special invitation is here given to all on foot. Now what accommodations are here required? Most of the time, any ordinary provision for the public would suffice, but of necessity there must be occasions when crowds of people will present themselves at these entrances, and suitable provision must be made for them. On a holiday, about the hour of returning home, what numbers will direct their steps towards these exits! How ample, too, should the provision be for the masses that will here wish to gain admission! The sidewalks alone conducting to each of these entrances are, collectively, more than one hundred and fifty feet in width, as follows: those on either side of Sixth and Seventh Avenues and on both sides of Fifty-ninth Street (it being remembered that the walk on the north side of Fifty-ninth Street has been judiciously widened to forty feet). Besides, two lines of horse-cars lead directly to each of these entrances—the Sixth and Seventh Avenue lines, and the line which crosses the city running along Fifty-ninth Street. Now, however rural and pretty the present accommodations may be, it is simply absurd to think that they will answer the required purposes. One walk at each of these entrances, about fourteen feet wide, as originally intended, cannot possibly suffice, especially when these walks commence to turn, immediately on entering, to the right or to the left, as they do. Space must be gained, and how simply has this been accomplished in the accepted designs! By filling in a little more (for this is all made ground about these entrances), a spacious area or place is formed inside of each of the gateways. From these places broad walks, twenty feet in width, diverge: two at Sixth Avenue, three at Seventh Avenue—thus gaining three or four times the accommodation originally intended, without the introduction of a formal, wide walk directly entering the Park—a feature that may become, however, of absolute necessity, and the introduction of which, should it hereafter be deemed advisable, need only disturb slightly the entrance-ways, as shown in the adopted designs. C. P.

Much of our correspondent's letter consists of expression of opinions differing from those advanced in our criticism. To this no answer is needed. We are fully prepared to find many persons who disagree with us whenever we criticize a work of art or literature. But something more than expression of opinion is also contained in the letter; there are statements which we are content to leave as our correspondent makes them, and matters of fact or of principle are introduced which require our consideration.

First, of the names of the four gates on Fifty-ninth Street. The Board of Commissioners of the Central Park had publicly announced that the gate at Fifth Avenue was to be the Scholars' Gate, that at Sixth Avenue the Artizans' Gate, that at Seventh Avenue the Artists' Gate, and that at Eighth Avenue the Merchants' Gate. No public announcement of any change has ever been made, as far as we have yet been informed. The Seventh Annual Report of the Board of Commissioners, which was the last one published at the time of the exhibition of Mr. Hunt's designs on the walls of the Academy, merely states that "sketches for the four southerly gateways . . . were approved in their general features, and their erection authorized." The article in the Evening Post, in which our correspondent finds some of his facts, had not been brought to our notice.

We fail to find any greater appropriateness in one set of names than in the other. Appropriateness is just what they all lack. How is the name "Artists' Gate" peculiarly appropriate to an entrance at the corner of such a street and such an avenue? Our correspondent seems to think (with us) that it is "inappropriate" to name the Fifth Avenue entrance the Scholars' Gate; but evidently thinks that to name it the Warriors' Gate would be better. The distinction is not clear to us, nor the reason for C. P.'s preference.

We accept as true the assertion positively made that both antæ and engaged columns go to make up the gate-posts at Eighth Avenue. It will be seen, on reference to page 187 of The Nation, that we assumed as true that which we are now assured of, namely, that pilasters (and not engaged columns) were used for hanging-styles. That these are not well adapted to the purpose we think is evident. But our objections to these gate-posts are not to this or to that feature,—not to a cornice where Ionic columns are, nor to the capitals being alike or different; our objections are radical and to the whole design. The detail of the cornice is, it is true, invisible; moreover, if the cornice is there at all, it must "break around and into the angles of this cross about four feet in greatest dimension, as if around the corners of a temple." It is to the use at all of a full classical cornice in this place that we objected, and do decidedly and with good reason object. The fact that the design requires a cornice is one of its faults. "Of course the posts are surmounted by a cornice," says C. P.; and, again, speaking of the Fifth Avenue entrance, "certainly there should be a cornice to these posts." Certainly, in our criticism, we assumed that there should be none. Whether as gate-posts or as pedestals for statuary, cornices on them would be useless and out of place. The pedestal of the Washington statue, at Union Square, in New York, though not of any very striking merit as a design, is very much better than the best of Mr. Hunt's gate-posts, and one of its best features is the entire absence of anything like a cornice. The addition of one to it, or to any such structure, is wholly irrational—to be tolerated, if very excellent in detail and part of an excellent design; but not to be desired or approved.

As to the heraldry on the top of the tall column at the Fifth Avenue entrance, it differs from the bronze Lion of St. Mark on the Piazzetta column in this, that this is not decorative or beautiful, and that is. It would puzzle our most graceful designer to make a beautiful group out of the sailor (is it?) and Indian, with the shield of New York city between them; while any grouping of them will destroy even their poor pretensions to heraldic propriety. In general a full coat of arms with supporters is a stiff and formal, a very scientific, but very unbeautiful thing, never to be carved except in very slight relief, and requiring so much conventional scoring and grooving of the stone to represent technically the colors, that it ceases to be a work of art at all. But a single heraldic device, an emblem, a crest—the Lion of St. Mark and Venice, the Rose of England, the Lily of Florence, the Thistle of Scotland, the Double Eagle of Russia, King Arthur's Dragon, Lord Marmion's Falcon, Douglas' Bloody Heart—such a thing is not worse ornament nor less beautiful as a device than otherwise, is even more suitable and fit in many places and for many ornamental purposes. So the bronze lion at Venice, itself a noble work of art, is delightful, and an essential part of the scene, and so is St. Theodore, with his crocodile, on the other column. But it is matter of rejoicing that neither column has a shield and two supporters on it, the supporters turning their backs either to the sea or to the piazza, to the Zecca, or to the Ducal Palace, even as in this design they must choose whether to face the Park, the avenue, or the street, and turn their backs to the others.

The most visible changes in the face of the ground at Sixth and Seventh Avenues are the presence of bridges, or something like them. What the changes are, we did not assert; that changes were, was clear;—if these changes are, as asserted, merely for convenience' sake, we are not convinced of their necessity; if for effect's sake, they are to be regretted.

There is little more to say. We shall sincerely regret it if gates are built after these designs. The architectural accessories of the Central Park are many of them piquant and pretty, some few really good, many others very faulty; the Park needs really excellent art in its gateways, and should have it. The statues foreshadowed in these drawings it would take years to procure and pay for; there is need of good architecture to begin with.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

BAIRD & BRADLEY,

CHICAGO LOAN AND COLLECTION AGENCY.

Investments for a term of years made for Eastern Capitalists. Corporations and Estates amply secured by First Mortgage on Real Estate in Chicago and vicinity, with semi-annual interest payable at any point East.

Real Estate purchased, managed, and sold for Eastern parties.

Notes collected and avails promptly remitted.

FIRST CLASS FIRE INSURANCE

ON THE PARTICIPATION PLAN.

MARKET FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

37 WALL STREET, CORNER OF JAUNCEY COURT.

CONDITION OF THE COMPANY.

ABSTRACT OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF DEC. 31, 1864.

TOTAL ASSETS		$414,729 18
Viz.—Bonds and Mortgages	$134,672 00
Temporary Loans	92,630 00
Real Estate	10,000 00
100 Shares Mer. Ex. Bank	5,000 00
Government Sec., value	144,514 00
Cash on hand	18,042 34
Interest due	3,085 58
Premiums due	6,785 26
PRESENT LIABILITIES		$15,995 92
NET SURPLUS		198,733 26

This Company will continue, as heretofore, to insure respectable parties against DISASTER BY FIRE

At fair and remunerating rates; extending, according to the terms on its Policies, the advantage of the

PARTICIPATION PLAN OF THE COMPANY,

pursued by it for several years past, with such great success and popularity, and profit to its customers: whereby

(75) SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT. (75)

of the Profits, instead of being withdrawn from the Company in Dividends to Stockholders, is invested as a "SCRIP FUND," and held for greater protection of its Policyholders; and Scrip, bearing interest, is issued to Customers therefor: thus, IN THIS COMPANY, those who furnish the business, AND PAY THE PREMIUMS, derive the largest share of advantages; and when the accumulations of the SCRIP FUND shall exceed

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,

the excess will be applied to PAY OFF the Scrip IN CASH in the order of its issue.

☞ The liberal and prompt adjustment of Claims for Loss, WHEN FAIR AND SQUARE, is a specialty with this Company.

NOTE.—This Company does not insure on the hazards of RIVER, LAKE, or INLAND NAVIGATION; confining itself strictly to a legitimate FIRE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

ASHER TAYLOR, President.

H. P. FREEMAN, Secretary.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,

108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital,	$1,000,000
Surplus, over	400,000

This Company insures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND NLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

IF PREMIUMS ARE PAID IN GOLD, LOSSES WILL BE PAID IN GOLD.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
EDWARD A. STANSBURY, 2d Vice-President.
JOHN C. GOODRIDGE, Secretary.

E. W. CLARK & CO.,

BANKERS AND BROKERS,

35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS,

COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL	$1,000,000 00
ASSETS	1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.

PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

VERMILYE & CO.,

BANKERS,

44 Wall Street, N. Y.,

GOVERNMENT LOAN AGENTS,

KEEP ON HAND, FOR

IMMEDIATE DELIVERY,

THE ISSUES OF

7.30 TREASURY NOTES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS.

We BUY and SELL all classes of GOVERNMENT SECURITIES at market rates ORDERS from BANKS and BANKERS executed on favorable terms, and with dispatch.

Also, receive DEPOSITS, and ALLOW INTEREST on current balances.

VERMILYE & CO.

THE

MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY,

COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.

JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.

CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE.

Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary. B. C. MORRIS, President.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, $200,000

JOSEPH W WILDEY, Secretary. WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.

FOURTH NATIONAL BANK,

27 & 29 PINE ST., NEW YORK,

Has for sale U. S. 7 3-10 Notes, all sizes; also, One Year Certificates and all other Government Loans.

ANTHONY LANE, Asst. Cashier. B. SEAMAN, Cashier.

AETNA INSURANCE COMPANY, OF HARTFORD,

INCORPORATED 1819. CHARTER PERPETUAL.

Paid up Capital,	$2,250,000 00
Assets, July 1, 1865,	3,850,351 78
Losses Paid in 45 Years,	$17,485,894 71

T. A. ALEXANDER, Pres't. L. J. HENDEE, Sec'y.
JONA. GOODWIN, Jr., A. Sec'y.

Insurance against loss and damage by Fire, and of Inland Navigation.

NEW YORK AGENCY, 62 WALL STREET.

JAS. A. ALEXANDER, AGENT.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,

46 PINE STREET, NEW YORK,

BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,

56 WALL STREET,

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world.

BILLS ON LONDON

At Sixty Days' Sight and at Three Days' Sight, for sale by
WARD, CAMPBELL & CO.,
56 Wall Street, New York.

The National Park Bank of New York.

CAPITAL - - - - $2,000,000. | SURPLUS - - - - $1,200,000.

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.

J. L. WORTH, Cashier.

NEW YORK, Aug. 21, 1865.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY A.M.

THERE has been less activity in the dry goods line of business this week, and prices of domestic cotton fabrics are coming down, as they can well afford to do after the recent very large profits of the manufacturers. The raw material is maintained at about 45 to 46 cents per pound. The receipts of cotton from the South this week amount to 24,140 bales; the exports, 5,820 bales. The value of all domestic exports this week is $3,704,475, which is an improvement of about half a million over the previous week. Last week, the imports of dry goods and general foreign merchandise were the heaviest of the season, about $7,800,000 in value. This week the dry goods import falls off to $1,894,000. The general merchandise entries are not yet reported. The gold customs keep up to about three millions per week. For five days of the present week they amount to $2,640,152.

The Secretary of the Treasury has announced his readiness to prepay the November coupons on the 5-20 bonds of the United States; having more than double the sum of gold customs in hand to pay the entire sum of $18,000,000 gold interest due 1st November as fast as presented. We deem it quite probable, however, that the bond-holders, of whom more than one-third reside in Europe, will not be sufficiently prompt in calling for their interest to keep down a further accumulation of gold from customs through the month of October. The prepayments begin on Monday next, September 25. An effort will be made to have the New York Stock Exchange Board recognize this dividend as dating from 1st October, and deal in the bonds thereafter as ex coupon. This will facilitate the prepayments of gold, as heretofore the practice of the Board has been to continue dealings in the bonds with the coupon attached until the date of its maturity in course.

No action has yet been announced from the Treasury in the direction of funding part of the interest-bearing legal tender currency into gold-bearing stocks, though frequent rumors have been started in Wall Street that such is his purpose. He will not be a borrower of money, nor is he authorized under the last Loan Act of Congress to fund the ordinary greenbacks which carry no interest; but he can fund his interest-bearing notes, and it is not improbable, according to our present information from Washington, he may soon propose to the public to do so. Meanwhile, all the gold-paying stocks of the United States are on the advance, and are quoted ¾ to 1 per cent. higher on the 5-20s than last week. The price of gold, after recovering to 144¼, has returned to 143¾ per cent.

Another partial meeting of bank officers was held last Tuesday on the assorting plan for the National country bank currency, but no result was arrived at, except the naming of a committee who favor the plan, to canvass privately the views of the banks not represented at the meeting, and to report on Tuesday next.

Money tends to higher rates on merchants' paper, which is more freely offered to the discount brokers. The terms are 7 to 9 per cent. per annum, while call loans to the stock-brokers continue easy at 5 to 6 per cent.

The internal revenue taxes continue to be paid into the Treasury at Washington at the rate of $1,000,000 to $1,250,000 per day. These, with the proceeds of the auction sales of army and navy property dispensed with since the war, afford $8,000,000 per week, exclusive of customs.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The demand is brisk for the original 5-20s for transmission to Europe, at 108⅛ to 108¼, and for the new issue at 106¼ to 106⅜ per cent., the last being taken freely for home employment. The 6 per cents of 1881, which are really the cheapest of the gold-bearing bonds as a long 6 per cent. investment, irredeemable for 16 years, are selling at 108, including gold interest since July 1. The 10-40s, 5 per cent. bonds, are in request at 94¼ to 94⅜ per cent. The 7-30 currency loans have been rather pressed on sale at 99⅛ to 99⅜ per cent. Treasury indebtedness certificates of 1865 are wanted at 98¾ to 99 and interest. The compound legal tenders, 6 per cents of 1864, are also in demand at 105½ for June, and 104 to 102 for the later dates of that year. There is also a premium being paid for the 5 per cent. legal tenders of 1863 and 1864, all in view of the probable funding process.

STATE SECURITIES.

The Border State stocks continue in demand, and a further advance to 80 per cent. made on North Carolinas. There is a pause in the rise on Tennessees and Missouris, which are now selling at same figures as quoted last Saturday: 82½ to 83 for Tennessees, 76 for Missouris.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The New York and Western shares and the Philadelphia and Reading are nearly all on the advance within a day or two past, although the early part of the week was quite dull. Erie has risen from 87 to 88½; New York Central, 93 to 93½; Reading, 106⅝ to 109½; Michigan Southern, 67¾ to 68½; Michigan Central, 109½ to 111; Pittsburg, 71 to 72; Rock Island, 112¼ to 112½; North-West, 27½ to 28; North-West Preferred, 61¼ to 62—market firm at close of the week.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

These are also upward. The Panama Company 300 bid, on account of an extra scrip dividend of 40 per cent. from the sinking fund of the past five or six years, and a quarterly cash dividend of 6 per cent., instead of 5 per cent. quarterly as heretofore. The scrip shares of the Pacific Company have advanced from 145 to 210 per cent., and the full shares to 240 to 250, on the purchase of the property and good-will of the Atlantic Mail hence to Aspinwall. Cumberland Coal shares have gone up to 46½; Canton Land Company to 41. The Mariposa, Quicksilver, and Atlantic Mail about the same as last week.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Exchange on London, after going up to 109⅞ to 110, has suddenly receded to 109½ to 109¾. Gold is 143⅝, as against 142⅝ last Saturday.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, is pursuing a journey through the South. His letters appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW,
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL,
JOHN G. WHITTIER,
SAMUEL ELIOT (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford),
PROFESSOR TORREY (Harvard),
DR. FRANCIS LIEBER,
PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH (Oxford),
PROFESSOR CHILD (Harvard),
HENRY JAMES,
CHARLES E. NORTON,
JUDGE BOND (Baltimore),
EDMUND QUINCY,
PROFESSOR W. D. WHITNEY (Yale),
PROFESSOR D. C. GILMAN (Yale),

JUDGE DALY,
PROFESSOR DWIGHT (Columbia College),
PROFESSOR TAYLER LEWIS (Schenectady),
N. TOURGUENEFF,
AUGUSTE LAUGEL,
JUDGE WAYLAND,
FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED,
REV. DR. MCCLINTOCK,
REV. DR. JOS. P. THOMPSON,
REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS,
REV. DR. BELLOWS,
C. J. STILLÉ,
HENRY T. TUCKERMAN,
BAYARD TAYLOR,
C. A. BRISTED,
C. L. BRACE,
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON,
SYDNEY GEORGE FISHER,
THEODORE TILTON,
JAMES PARTON,
GAIL HAMILTON.

TERMS:—Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER,
130 Nassau street, N. Y.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

Celebrated Gold Medal
GRAND,
SQUARE,
AND UPRIGHT
PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,
AND
CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL.

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

Great Improvements in Sewing Machines.

EMPIRE SHUTTLE MACHINE!

Salesrooms, 536 Broadway, N. Y.,
250 Washington Street, Boston.

This Machine is constructed on entirely new principles of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements, having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION COMBINED.

It has a straight needle perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither RIP nor RAVEL, and is alike on both sides, performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nansook Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is

EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE!

AGENTS WANTED where none are established, to whom a liberal discount will be given.

T. J. MCARTHUR & CO.,
Manufacturers and Proprietors,
536 Broadway, N. Y.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH
B. T. BABBITT'S
Pure Concentrated Potash,
OR READY SOAP-MAKER.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.

B. T. BABBITT,
64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

FINKLE & LYON'S
IMPROVED
LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

The Third Annual Term of the N. Y. Medical College for Women, with homœopathic teachings as well as the branches taught in all other medical schools, will begin the third Monday in October, at 74 East Twelfth Street, New York. Address

I. M. WARD, Dean.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,
GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.
HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.
Also,
KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,
The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,
1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of
GIFFARD'S INJECTOR,
For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

STATIONERY.

TO STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS, AND NOTION DEALERS.—The undersigned, being the oldest envelope manufacturers in this country, and having the amplest facilities, are always ready to supply, by the thousand or by the million, envelopes of every variety of size, pattern, and color, at the lowest prices.

Samples furnished when called for.

WM. P. LYON & WHITTEMORE,
537 Pearl St., New York.

Away with Spectacles!

Old Eyes Made New, without SPECTACLES, DOCTOR, or MEDICINE. Pamphlet mailed free on receipt of ten cents. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

Schools Furnished

with Desks and Seats, Locking Ink-wells, Outline Maps, superior PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS for colleges, etc.; object teaching apparatus, with the latest improvements for COMMON AND PRIMARY SCHOOLS, and everything wanted for any school. For details, send for a "Messenger." Liberal terms to agents, AMERICAN SCHOOL APPARATUS CO.

21 John Street, New York.

BOYNTON'S FURNACES.

Boynton's Brick and Portable Furnaces, Fire-place and Parlor Heaters, Kitcheners, Ranges, Parlor and Office Stoves, are warranted to give satisfaction. Send for circular.

RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,
234 Water Street, near Beekman, New York.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!
Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees
IN EVERY STYLE,
MANUFACTURED BY
ROBERT PATON,
24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,
45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,
STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS,
AND
BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,
Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

DECKER & CO.
MANUFACTURERERS OF PIANO-FORTES
419 BROOME STREET,
One Block East from Broadway, N. Y.

Our instruments combine all the improvements of REAL WORTH known in their manufacture, and are warranted for the term of seven (7) years.

W. H. Schieffelin & Co.,
SUCCESSORS TO
SCHIEFFELIN BROTHERS & CO.,
Importers and Jobbers of
DRUGS,
Indigo, Corks, Sponges,
FANCY GOODS, PERFUMERY, ETC., ETC.,
170 and 172 William Street, N. Y.

T. C. SELLEW,
MANUFACTURER OF DESKS AND OFFICE FURNITURE,
107 FULTON ST., near NASSAU ST., N. Y.
LIBRARY AND SCHOOL FURNITURE MADE TO ORDER.

JOHN V. FARWELL & CO.,
WHOLESALE
DRY GOODS AND NOTIONS,
42, 44 & 46 WABASH AVENUE,
CHICAGO,
AND NO. 5 COLLEGE PLACE, NEW YORK.

CRUSHERS AND PULVERIZERS,
FOR WET OR DRY WORKING,
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.
MANUFACTURED BY THE
BOSTON MILLING & MANUFACTURING CO.,
105 STATE STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Miners should not purchase machinery before seeing, or sending their friends to examine, the practical working of this series of machinery.

☞ The Whirling Table, or Crusher, weighs less than two tons, and crushes from ten to twelve tons of ore per hour to fine gravel, or two hundred and fifty tons in twenty-four hours.

The Pulverizer weighs two tons, and pulverizes to dust, infinitely finer than stamp work, one ton of ore per hour, or twenty-four tons per diem, equal to the yield of twenty-five or thirty stamps; and the first cost and wear, as compared to this number of stamps, is about one-tenth;—the entire yield being fit for amalgamation without further reduction. The fine dust is not obtained by screening, but by the immediate action of the Pulverizer.

Fifteen horse-power, net, is the maximum power required for one machine.

The cost of the wear, per ton, is less than by any other machine. All wearing parts are now made of Franklinite iron.

Let miners and their friends carefully study the practical working of all other machines and processes offered, and then see ours working in East Boston, Mass. We ask only this.

All of our machines are now made in our own shop. No CONTRACT WORK.

OFFICERS OF THE COMPANY:
President—HORATIO R. STORER.
Gen. Agent and Treasurer—JACOB J. STORER.
Consulting Engineer—JAS. D. WHELPLEY.

DIRECTORS:
John A. Blanchard, Benjamin P. Cheney, Bradley N. Cumings, Ichabod Goodwin, Horatio R. Storer, Jacob J. Storer, James D. Whelpley.

Agent in New York,
CHAS. H. GARDNER,
16 CORTLANDT STREET.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,
Importers and Dealers in
TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;
Manufacturers of
COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,
19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

DECKER BROTHERS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PIANO-FORTES.
FACTORY AND WAREROOMS,
91 BLEECKER STREET,
(MARBLE BUILDING,)
One block west from Broadway,
NEW YORK.

MARVIN'S
PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.
Superior to any others in the following particulars:
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by
MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.
Send for a descriptive Circular.

JESSUP & MOORE,
27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,
PAPER MANUFACTURERS,
Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

DEMULCENT SOAP,
FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,
FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.
MANUFACTURED ONLY BY
J. C. HULL'S SON,
32 PARK ROW, N. Y.
Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Benedict's Time,
171 BROADWAY, COR. CORTLANDT ST.,
NEW YORK.
TO SOLDIERS.
AMERICAN (WALTHAM) WATCHES.
Let every soldier, before he returns home, provide himself with an AMERICAN WATCH; no better use can be made of money than to invest it in one of these durable and accurate time-pieces. It is a kind of property that constantly returns good interest, and its money value is so well-known that a pocket full of silver dollars wouldn't be as useful.
For sale and warranted by
BENEDICT BROTHERS, Jewelers,
Keepers of the City Time, and Agents for the sale of the American (Waltham) Watches,
171 Broadway, cor. Cortlandt St.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.
THE WEED MACHINES,
With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.
Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.
WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,
STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

OAKLEY & MASON,
PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS,
AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS,
21 MURRAY STREET,
OLD STAND OF PRATT, OAKLEY & CO.,
Between Broadway and Church Street, New York.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines
FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.
THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,
ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,
629 BROADWAY.
Agents wanted.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,
625 BROADWAY, N. Y.,
MAKE THE
LOCK-STITCH,
and rank highest on account of the elasticity, permanence, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching, when done, and the wide range of its application.—Report of American Institute.

CARTER, KIRTLAND & CO.,
Manufacturers and Jobbers of
CLOTHING,
340 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK,
OFFER TO FIRST-CLASS BUYERS A LARGE AND VERY COMPLETE STOCK OF
FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING
OF ALL GRADES,
EMBRACING FINE, MEDIUM, AND LOW-PRICED GOODS.

Having made extensive purchases at a time when all were sellers and very few were buyers, we are in a position to supply our customers upon the most favorable and advantageous terms.

Jobbers, Merchant Tailors, and Dealers generally will find it to their advantage to call and examine our stock before purchasing.

Particular attention paid to the execution of orders.

SAM'L CARTER, WM. H. KIRTLAND,
JOHN ROSE, CHAS. B. PEET,
JOHN H. WERTS, Special.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS
OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.
TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.
or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.
New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.
TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.
For sale by JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,
FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.
R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,
STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,
WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. / 42 JOHN STREET, New York.
Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.
CAUTION.
These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.
R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

Economical Housekeepers Use
PYLE'S SALERATUS. | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.
Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.
ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.
"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.
"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.
"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.
"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.
Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.
WM. B. BRADBURY,
425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 14. THURSDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1865. { SIX DOLLARS PER ANNUM / SINGLE COPIES, 15 CENTS

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK..... 417

"The Devil an Ass"..... 421
Jordan on Davis..... 422
The Naval Power of France and England..... 423
The National Highways..... 424

CORRESPONDENCE:
Another View of the Condition of the South..... 425

The South as It Is..... 427
Caste Feeling in England..... 428
A Day in Pompeii..... 430

LITERATURE:
Literary Notes..... 436
The Conversion of the Roman Empire..... 438
Dante in 1865..... 440

Current Literature..... 442

FINE ARTS:
Art Notes..... 442

SCIENCE..... 443

FINANCIAL REVIEW..... 445

Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

WHEN the publication of THE NATION was commenced, there was naturally a good deal of doubt felt and expressed in many quarters as to the existence of any demand on the part of the public for such a paper as THE NATION aimed to be. We are glad to say that the experience of the last three months has satisfied us that this doubt was not well founded. We believe we are justified in asserting that no such reception has ever in this country been accorded to any weekly paper, not pictorial, as this journal has received. We find, both in the number of our subscribers and the expressions of opinion which reach us from all parts of the country, abundant proof that such a paper as we seek to supply is sure both of wide circulation and hearty appreciation. The most sanguine anticipations we ventured to form on this point have been realized. In other words—and we trust we may say this without being held guilty of undue self-laudation—the American public has shown that its literary taste is higher than it has been commonly assumed to be.

We felt at the outset of our enterprise that in order to test thoroughly the popular opinion of our work, it was desirable to make the price so low as to submit the paper at once to the judgment of as large a circle of readers as possible. The experiment has been so successful that we now feel that it is no longer necessary to continue it, and propose with and after this number to raise the price to Six Dollars a year; a sum which will prove, we trust, amply remunerative. And as efforts have been made in some quarters to create the impression that THE NATION, as well as other periodicals called into existence by the return of peace, is destined to be short-lived, we may be pardoned for stating that the amount of our paid-up capital is such as to relieve us of all uneasiness on that score.

THE Massachusetts Democratic Convention met at Worcester on Thursday last. A Mr. Avery, of Braintree, was chosen president. He asserted that through all the late troubles the Democratic party has nobly done its whole duty. It would never admit that any State had ever been out of the Union, for its motto was: "Once a State always a State." On this Democratic doctrine Andrew Johnson now stood, and would have the unequivocal support of the followers of Andrew Jackson. Gen. Darius N. Couch, of Taunton, was the convention's nominee for Governor. Its fourth resolution acknowledged the obligation to pay the national debt, but in such a way as to remove the burden of taxation from the shoulders of the producing classes. The eighth was as follows:

"That we not only recognize any attempt on the part of the working classes to better their condition, but we heartily approve any movement having for its aim their elevation, comfort, and well-being, physical and mental, and cordially sympathize with any measure by which the true interests of the employer and employed can be promoted and secured."

The eleventh favored a judicious license system, which would harmonize with the internal revenue laws of the Union, but, upon debate, was expunged. Having thus discharged its patriotic duty, the convention adjourned. Next year its successor will probably observe the same formalities, with as little hope of affecting in any considerable degree the political complexion and management of the State.

THE extracts from Southern correspondence forwarded us by "E. A." make some very discreditable revelations with regard to the conduct of the negro troops at the South, which do much to confirm the charges recently brought against these corps by Governor Perry, as well as to justify the action of the Government in removing them to the coast. When soldiers, whether white or black, behave in this way, it is hardly ever the fault of the men. The discipline is in the hands of the officers, and when men are allowed to fire muskets at unarmed civilians it is on the officers the responsibility must fall. It is right to add that we are informed on excellent authority that General Gillmore maintains that these charges against the colored troops are exaggerations, and that their discipline is on the whole as good as that of the white troops.

A LETTER from the Prince de Joinville to a gentleman in Washington, dated April 28, containing what he himself calls "a chat on gunnery," has been printed, and is chiefly noteworthy because it foreshadows his recent article in the Revue des Deux Mondes with the signature "Victor de Mars." In both he admits the superiority of the American navy to the French and English in personnel, construction, and armament. He looks to the United States for the production of a large rifled gun for sea service, as soon as our workmen undertake the built-up guns of steel or wrought-iron.

THE first case we have noticed of the prosecution of those contumacious clergymen of Missouri who refuse to take the oath of loyalty required of them by the new constitution, is that of the Rev. J. A. Cummings, a Catholic priest of Louisiana, in Pike County. He refused to give bail when arrested, and being presently brought before a court, at first pleaded guilty, but afterwards, by the advice of his counsel, returned the usual plea. He was, of course, convicted, for the facts in the indictment were not disputed, and was sentenced to pay a fine of five hundred dollars, and meanwhile stand committed. After several days of incarceration Mr. Cummings appealed from the verdict, gave the necessary bonds, and on being set at liberty returned to his parish to resume his functions.

AFTER the almost interminable war of words between Mr. Dickerson and the Navy Department, the contest between the Algonquin and the Winooski was fairly inaugurated in this city at 4 P.M. of Friday, the 22d. According to the terms agreed upon, a run of ninety-six hours was to have been made, the boats fast at the wharf, coal weighed, and revolutions noted. At 11 P.M. of Sunday the boiler feed-pipe of the Algonquin burst, and Mr. Dickerson was obliged to stop his engine abruptly. The incomplete report of the board appointed to superintend the experiment shows the performance of the two vessels to have been as nearly equal as possible, and will incline the public to make a still greater allowance for Mr. Dickerson's magnificent promises. His machinery is unquestionably more complex than that of his rival, and its working vastly noisier, besides being attended by other accidents than that which brought it to a stand-still. Of the much-vaunted superiority, only one particular seems well established: the celerity with which the furnace can be made to get up steam—an advantage of special consequence in the blockading service.

A PRIVATE letter from Abraham Lincoln to Gen. Wadsworth, which fell into the hands of the enemy on the death of the latter, has appeared in the Southern Advocate of North Carolina. Anticipating the complete success of the Federal arms, "followed by a loyal and cheerful submission on the part of the South," the President had foreseen the probability of a universal amnesty. If this be granted, he says, "I cannot see how, under the circumstances, I can avoid exacting in return universal suffrage, or, at least, suffrage on the basis of intelligence and military service." This language is remarkable, because it shows that our late Chief Magistrate had a broader conception of his own powers than his successor. His mode of reasoning is obvious: As the military head of the nation he possessed the rights of a conqueror, with the liberty of exercising them. If he chose to forgive instead of to punish, he could impose conditions upon the recipients of his clemency; and, perceiving the perils of unexceptional amnesty, he was loth to leave the freedmen in part or wholly defenceless. Mr. Lincoln continues, with an emotion worthy of his great fame:

"How to better the condition of the colored race has long been a study which has attracted my serious and careful attention; hence I think I am clear and decided as to what course I shall pursue in the premises, regarding it a religious duty, as the nation's guardian of these people, who have so heroically vindicated their manhood on the battle-field, where, in assisting to save the life of the Republic, they have demonstrated in blood their right to the ballot, which is but the humane protection of the flag they have so fearlessly defended."

THE South Carolina Convention adjourned on Thursday last after a session of fifteen days. On the 19th, slavery was for ever prohibited by a vote of 98 to 8. The ordinance of secession was subsequently repealed. On the 22d, a proposition to make the basis of representation of the State rest upon the whole population, irrespective of color, was rejected by a large majority, and the clause stands as reported, making the whites the basis. The representation of the Senate, and taxation throughout the State, were equalized. The election of Governor and Presidential electors was committed to the people. Voting in the Legislature was ordered to be viva voce. A commission was instructed to submit a code to that body for the protection of the colored population. Judge Wardlaw, Alfred Huger, and Col. Dewkins were appointed to visit the President on behalf of Jefferson Davis, Gov. Magrath, and Mr. Trenholm. James L. Orr has been nominated for Governor, and "it is understood that Gov. Perry will be sent to the United States Senate." The despatch that contains this intelligence concludes with the cheerful announcement that "all are loyal and in good spirits." We are not advised of the fate of the following resolutions presented by the member from Edgefield, a son of the late Senator Hammond:

"Inasmuch as a fundamental difference of opinion in reference to the character, powers, and policy of the Government of the United States and of the State governments, existed in the convention which framed the Constitution, and, after more than three-quarters of a century of political contests, resulted in a bloody and exhausting war; and, whereas, when a people draw the sword, appealing to the last and highest tribunal known to man, they should abide by its decisions in good faith; and, whereas, it is neither wise nor politic in the people of the South to continue any longer a contest in which they have been twice defeated—once by political majorities, and once by the sword;—therefore we, the people of South Carolina, in convention assembled, accept, as the results of the war, the principles embraced in the following resolutions, and will sustain them fully and faithfully as a national policy:

"Resolved, That the Union is the first and paramount consideration of the American people.

"Resolved, That sovereignty, a unit absolute and indivisible, which in all nations must exist somewhere, resides in the American people, and its authorized representative within the limits of the organic law—the Constitution—is the Federal Government."

Gov. Perry, relying on the example of Gov. Sharkey, and also at the suggestion of Gen. Ames, commanding the north-western portion of the State, has issued a proclamation ordering each judicial district to organize one or more militia companies for a home police, to report to the respective brigadier-generals commanding in South Carolina, and to the provost-marshals. All persons arrested will be turned over to the civil authorities, according to the terms agreed upon with Gen. Gillmore. By this means it is hoped that the disorder and lawlessness now prevalent may be suppressed. The Alabama Convention, in repealing the ordinance of secession on the 25th, pronounced it wholly unauthorized, and though this declaration excited a protracted debate, the final vote was unanimous. In contradiction of its former action, the convention, by a vote of 60 to 19, renounced all obligations to pay the debts contracted by the State in aid of the late war, and forbade the General Assembly to ratify them or assume to provide for their payment in whole or in part, as also "for the payment of any portion of the debts contracted or incurred, directly or indirectly, by the Confedate States, its agents or its authority." By a vote of 61 to 25, it was decided to submit the amendments of the constitution to the people. The convention adjourned on Saturday.

A CINCINNATI paper publishes a letter from John Stuart Mill to Judge Dickson, of that city, in response to a request for his opinion of Gen. Cox's colonization scheme. He has little to say of this except that he regards it as a chimerical project, and not to be entertained seriously by President or Congress. On the general subject of reconstruction, he is positive that if the freedman is to be protected in his rights at all, he must either be allowed a vote in self-defence, or else the restored governments of the Southern States must be only nominal, and subject to the constant surveillance and overruling of the national Government. For if the Union is renewed without the condition of equal suffrage, the power to interfere with any State is gone; and without the aid of fresh legislation, or even with the old black laws repealed, partiality and prejudice would suffice in the courts to work the oppression of the colored citizen. Mr. Mill pronounces a military dictatorship to be contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and he is at a loss to understand the scruples of the President as to his power in the premises. Against the theory that the rebel States have never been out of the Union, "reason would say that by declaring themselves independent of the Union they could not, indeed, divest themselves of its obligations, but certainly forfeited its privileges." "It would be," he concludes, "on the part of the free States, a generosity partaking of silliness, were they to give back to their bitter enemies not only power to govern themselves and the negroes within their limits, but (through representatives in Congress) to govern the free States too, without first exacting such changes in the structure of Southern society as will render such a relation between them and the free States rational and safe. If you have not a right to do this, you had not a right to impose the abolition of slavery." Mr. Mill has no objection to an impartial requirement of education up to a certain point as a qualification of suffrage.

SENATOR SUMNER has written to the New York Evening Post, maintaining that a quorum of the States, for the purpose of ratifying a constitutional amendment, is founded on the States having legislatures and actually participating in the Government. Where a State has no legislature, it may still be a State, but it cannot be counted in the organization of Congress, and therefore cannot be counted in the ratification of a constitutional amendment. "If," he says, "you insist upon counting a rebel State having no legislature, you make a concession to the rebellion, and you concede to a mutinous State the power to arrest, it may be the organization of Congress, or it may be amendments to the Constitution important to the public welfare." This rule he deduces from the analogy furnished by Congress. The Constitutional Amendment was adopted in both houses organized on this rule, and the national debt was sanctioned in the same way. Therefore slavery has been abolished, not simply by the President's proclamation which, strictly speaking, only liberated slaves, and did not touch the power to enslave, but also by the Constitutional Amendment. The World has attempted a reply to this, which begs the whole question. It says that Mr. Sumner ought to have sought his analogy in the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that "a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice" in the election of the President where the electoral college has failed to elect. But, in counting up all the States, are States without legislatures to be considered States for this purpose?

FROM the complete election returns of Colorado there appears a very large majority in favor of adopting the State constitution. The clause which authorized negro suffrage was, however, defeated. We are sorry that at this day any free community exhibits such subjection to the prejudices of the past; yet, as the issue has been made, we hope it will not be dodged by Congress, and that the territory will remain as it is until it is ready to execute justice among all its citizens. The admission of Colorado now becomes analogous to that of any of the rebel States; and however desirable it may be for her prosperity, or for the balance of loyal power in the United States Senate, that she should be received into the Union, it is of infinitely greater consequence for the nation to determine its political creed and rule of action. Especially ought that miserable pretence to be frowned upon, that the wrong is slight because the victims are few. This is the very forfeiture of all excuse.

MR. G. JULIAN HARNEY writes us that of the Polish immigrants for whom the public have for some time been looking, between seventy and eighty have already arrived, and more may be expected before the setting in of winter. These pioneers are mostly in this city, but some are in Philadelphia, and others in Washington. They came last from Germany, and received some trifling aid from the Bavarian Government, which constrained them to leave the country. Among them are officers of rank in the late Polish national army, a few who were landed proprietors, some twelve or fourteen students, an ex-professor, a doctor, and several ladies. A part have been kept in Austrian prisons, and all are now in indigence and distress. Mr. Harney asks for immediate pecuniary assistance to provide food, clothing, and shelter, for these unfortunate strangers, and employment by the benevolent. Probably only a minority have a knowledge of special trades, and their ignorance of our language will be a temporary drawback; but only temporary, since the linguistic capacity of their race is notorious. Our correspondent suggests the formation of committees in the principal cities to attain the objects of his appeal, and he will be happy to answer any communication which may be addressed to him at No. 5 Van Rensselaer Place, Boston.

MR. SEWARD has called upon all persons having claims not founded on contracts against foreign governments to forward them with proper proof to the State Department. This will bring out all the sufferers by the various rebel cruisers, as well as by the St. Alban's raid, and promises to make the coming winter diplomatically a stormy one, as the bill will doubtless be presented to England forthwith. Dr. Lieber has written him a long letter, recommending the reference of all these international disputes to the arbitration of distinguished jurists. The ordinary mode of arbitration is to refer them to a third government, which simply adopts the opinion of one of its own lawyers, who, as he works behind the scenes, is not subject to the proper amount of responsibility, and does not even stake his reputation on his judgment. Why not, therefore, refer them at once and openly to the men who would in any case be the real, though not ostensible arbitrators? There is something almost absurd in talking of that as law which derives its chief sanction, as international law does at present, from the superiority of force of one of the two parties to a quarrel.

THREE topics engrossed the State Trades' Assembly which assembled in Albany on the 25th and adjourned on the 27th. The most important was the eight-hour labor reform, which has begun to be agitated of late, and to which the assembly gave its unequivocal approval, promising both to discuss it till fully appreciated by the public, and in due time to ask for a legislative enactment conformably to it. It was also agreed to petition the Legislature for a change in the law of apprenticeship, which now imposes no further penalty on a master who violates his share of the contract than the release of the apprentice. The system of paying convicts in our State prisons for their overwork was complained of as an unjust competition with honest toil outside. It was stated that some prisoners had been enabled to earn by carpentry $600 a year, where one of the same trade working in Auburn city could earn only $450, at $1 50 a day.

A STATEMENT made by the New York Times, in its issue of the 26th of September, may be worth correcting. This was that Brazil and Chili are the only South American countries in which religious liberty exists. It is true that it exists in Brazil by proclamation of the Emperor, but only nominally, for the bishops are still able to repress it in a great degree, as they enjoy the imperial patronage, and know how to use the influence which they retain. In some of their frequent public processions and other forms of captivating the populace, the Emperor takes a personal part, and readers of Mr. Ewbank's admirable work, "Brazil and the Brazilians," will be astounded at the superstitious nonsense which his majesty openly sanctions and recommends to his subjects by his example. As for Chili, it has scarcely a spark of religious liberty, as was manifested by the bill which the Senate passed in July, and which was violently opposed in the House, although it permitted worship by non-Romanists only in private houses. But the constitutions and laws of New Granada and Venezuela have for years guaranteed entire and universal religious liberty, and public opinion and custom are now quite in keeping with them. It may be added, if not quite pertinently, that the liberal government of Mexico, after proclaiming religious liberty in 1857, and fully establishing it in 1861, enjoyed it up to the time of the French invasion. The same constitution and laws which secured freedom of worship, reduced the clergy to the level of common citizens, confiscated their immense mortmain estates, and subjected them to the oath of allegiance. It was the refusal of their leaders to submit and their consequent banishment that invited the invasion. The Reformed Church of Mexico is synonymous with patriotism and liberalism.

A DASTARDLY attempt at the destruction of Gen. Grant was made on the night of Tuesday the 26th. The general had been spending the day at Indianapolis by special request of the citizens, and as he was anxious to return that night to Cincinnati, a special car was provided for him. At Guilford, just before reaching a bridge, the hind truck of the car was thrown from the track and dragged across the bridge at a speed fortunately diminished in consequence of a curve at that point. Investigation showed that the "accident" was designed by some miscreant who had broken the lock of a switch and meant to displace the rails. He was a bungler at his work, and the lieutenant-general is alive and uninjured. Almost at the very same hour a train on the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad which had left St. Louis for the East, had its two sleeping-cars thrown from the track and upset, but with no loss of life. Gen. Sherman was in one of them, but was quite unharmed. There was no malice in this disaster.

THERE is to be a trial of our city officials after all. Mayor Gunther, Comptroller Brennan, and others, are to answer before Governor Fenton for the malfeasance in office with which they are charged. The governor, after hearing the arguments in denial of his jurisdiction in the premises, has failed to be convinced, and the examination will be conducted for convenience' sake here instead of at Albany. The delicacy of the affair consists in the power of the governor to remove the parties if their guilt shall have been established, and he will naturally require much stronger evidence to satisfy him of this than if he were merely seeking to form a personal judgment, or even to make out a case before the public. At all events, ventilation must precede the abatement of any nuisance.

THERE is something refreshing in the pleasantry of Kentucky when she undertakes, as she has done, to indict Federal generals for abducting slaves and otherwise interfering with her slave laws. It is like the last effort of a decayed gentleman to appear in his former respectability. It is a sublime instance of short-sightedness in the presence of an accomplished fact—of that grossest of all blindness that does not see because it won't. We believe that Generals Palmer and Brisbinare are not above enjoying the joke, and that as for the likelihood of anything coming of their indictment, it might as well have been framed against the spirit of the nineteenth century, the Declaration of Independence, or any other arch offender against the dignity of Kentucky. It remains, indeed, to be seen whether the hares will be caught before they are cooked.

Gen. Howard reached Richmond on Wednesday, the 20th ult. He called at once on Gen. Terry, to consult with him in regard to the freedmen, knowing his hearty co-operation with the agents of the Bureau, and his efforts, through his district commanders, to ameliorate the condition of the colored people. On Thursday, Gen. Howard, in company with Col. Brown, visited the plantations about the city and conversed with many of the planters. There is a great scarcity of hands among them, although they offer six dollars a month and rations. In general they express a desire to have their old hands back, and often this desire is reciprocated. Plantations that used to employ fifteen or twenty hands can now only muster three or four. On Friday, the party proceeded to Danville, accompanied by Gen. Hawley, chief-of-staff to Gen. Terry. Along the way Gen. Howard conversed freely with citizens in the cars, among them prominent planters from various sections of the State, and explained to them the objects of the Bureau. Returning to Burkesville, where the agent of the Bureau had collected a number of the chief citizens of Nottaway, Gen. Howard held a similar conversation with them. On Sunday evening he addressed the colored people of Lynchburg and vicinity, in the colored church, which was quite unable to contain the throng that gathered there. He instructed them in their new relations to their former masters, and told them what was predicted of them by their enemies, and expected of them by their friends. Monday was spent in riding about the various plantations. On that of Dr. Morris a difficulty had arisen between him and his employees. By the terms of their contract, the latter were to work till the close of the present year for one half the crops, and to pay the expenses of the farm. The result was that they had received only their board from the doctor, and were twenty-five hundred dollars in debt! The ration, too, was insufficient for laborers, being only one pound of bacon, three mackerel, and a peck of meal a week to each able-bodied man, a little less for the women, and nothing at all for the children. The day previous the doctor had told his hands that they were entitled to no pay, but, on the contrary, were owing him; yet, fearing trouble, he had given five dollars a piece to the men and two to the boys. Gen. Howard enlightened him as to his duty, pacified the negroes by assuring them that justice should be done them, and left the matter in the hands of Capt. Lacy, the agent of the Bureau. On Tuesday the general addressed the citizens and planters of Charlottesville. The latter expressed a desire to deal fairly with the freedmen, and to have some form of contract established, promising to aid the operations of the Bureau. They were told that it would be well if two good men could be found, one acceptable to the blacks and the other to the whites, who would work in connection with the agent in drawing up and witnessing contracts, and in adjudicating cases of minor importance. Col. Brown has acted upon this suggestion, and issued an order to his agents in Virginia. The citizens of Orange and Louisa counties were afterwards addressed by appointment at Gordonsville, briefly, and Gen. Howard returned to Richmond the same evening (Tuesday). The trip has thus far been very satisfactory, and it has been ascertained that the condition of the freed people is much better than reports have indicated. Through the counties of Appomattox, Amherst, Nelson, Albemarle, Louisa, and Orange they are at work, although in some cases getting but four or five dollars a month. In many places, however, ten dollars are freely given for able-bodied men. There will be little or no suffering among the blacks during the coming winter in the districts enumerated, but more or less along the line of the Danville Railroad. No able-bodied men or women are supported by the Government, and orphans are bound out to persons approved by the agents of the Bureau sa loyal and responsible. Only the old and indigent are fed, and their support will be thrown upon the able-bodied as soon as possible.

Col. Thomas reports from Vicksburg that the records of that part of the State have been destroyed, and the citizens are reluctant to tell the truth about the property held by the Bureau. There are 115 plantations leased in Mississippi—57 by whites and 58 by blacks; 136 in Louisiana—113 by whites, 23 by blacks. These embrace in Mississippi 31,000 acres for the whites, 9,000 for the blacks; in Louisiana, 21,500 for the whites, 4,500 for the blacks. About one half of the lands leased to the whites were abandoned because of the overflow of the Mississippi, and the number of acres under cultivation cannot now be learned. The amount mentioned is what was turned over by the leasing agent of the Treasury Department, plus the land which the blacks are cultivating under the charge of the Bureau. No property has been libelled for confiscation in Mississippi, and the uncertain policy of the Government renders the occupation of confiscable lands uncomfortable and hazardous. During August, 4,278 freedmen received Government rations, of whom 600 will pay for what they receive. Only 407 refugees are reported as receiving rations, but the whole number is probably 2,000. The September returns are not expected to vary much from these. But little trouble is reported between freedmen and their employers. Contracts have been generally made, and for the most part faithfully observed. Col. Thomas declares that the organization of the militia has created a greater panic among the freedmen than any action of the Federal or late Confederate authorities. He confidently anticipates collisions and a thorough unsettling of the labor system. The prospect for the blacks is compulsory labor as soon as the Federal troops are withdrawn and the white people properly armed.

Gen. Swayne reports from Montgomery, Sept. 18, that much trouble is experienced from cases of freedwomen with large families of small children. Some of them are widows, others had their husbands sold from them, and others still were deserted by their husbands. The difficulty is most seriously felt where the planter's crop is small. Some interest is perceivable in the education of the freedmen, with here and there a practical effort in this direction. A company of ex-United States officers, with Gen. McArthur at their head, have rented 6,000 acres of land near Selma for raising cotton. Each plantation will have a school. A leading planter of Montgomery County has contracted with his employees to open a school, he to furnish the materials and they to put up the house and pay the teacher. Negotiations are now on foot with members of the State convention for the selection of citizens as agents of the Bureau. Of the freedmen 2,924 received Government rations in August, and of white refugees 3,712. Some cases have become known of persons with numbers of freedmen on their places between whom and themselves there is a mutual attachment, but who are out of food and destitute of money. Help will be extended to them.

Fenianism is still the British topic of the day. In Dublin the authorities have suppressed the Irish People, from which the Fenians are at liberty to draw what omen they please. The military, the police, and the telegraph are kept on the alert, and there is everything but a demonstration. Individual arrests have been made till "the number of prisoners is very large," but only "documents and a uniform" appear to have been found. The populace cheered but did not attempt to rescue the arrested offenders on their way to court. Mr. Judah P. Benjamin has undertaken through the Times to whitewash the Confederate ex-President in the matter of the ill-treatment of the Federal prisoners. The bulk of his letter consists of an unsuccessful attempt to shed some light upon the causes of the disagreement concerning the exchanges. The rest revives the falsehood about the "instructions" of Col. Dahlgren, in order to contrast Mr. Davis's clemency with the merciless disposition of his Cabinet towards the captured comrades of that unfortunate chief. Capt. Wise, of the United States Navy, exposed in the next issue of the Times the forgery by which it was sought to fasten the original calumny on Col. Dahlgren, and to cover the indefensible atrocities in which his fate was involved. A reported plot to assassinate the Emperor on his recent visit to the Queen of Spain, the death of Gen. Lamoricière, and a panic at Marseilles because of the spread of the cholera in that city, are the chief items of interest from France. The elections have been held in Florence, and it is thought that while the Government party has triumphed, the clerical has obtained no small advantages by the admirable drill and punctuality of its voters.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

"THE DEVIL AN ASS."

THE devil is quite as much of an ass now as he was in Ben Jonson's time. In fact, he never was anything else. His children show no more sense than their father, and are all the time worsting themselves in vain attempts to outwit the All-Wise and outmatch the Almighty. The newspapers record such every day. Perhaps we may not be ready to go the lengths of the enthusiastic dietetic reformer, who, at a physiological convention, offered the famous resolution—"Resolved, that all disease is crime!"—but it is safe to say that every crime is a blunder. How many ingenious gentlemen are sent to do the state some service at Sing Sing, or Wethersfield, or Charlestown, because they will persist in believing that it is a better business to engrave bad notes than good ones! And how many skilful artificers go after them, because they think it a more profitable investment of their time and talents to break into houses than to help build them! We have, indeed, lately seen recorded the demise of a lamented pickpocket who left behind him a comfortable estate of sixty thousand dollars as the fruits of his prestigiatory industry. But he must have been a man out of the common. Perhaps he resembled in piety the admirable Hardy Vaux, who boasts with a laudable pride, in his memoirs, that "he never picked pockets on the Sabbath day!" And it will be observed that this artist had the discretion, at this culminating point of his career, to die—as lovely woman who has stooped to folly should do, according to Dr. Goldsmith—or there is no knowing what his last end might have been, had it been deferred. So we cannot, conscientiously, advise any of our readers, on the strength of this exceptional example, to enter upon that line of business. Stock-jobbing is safer and not much more discreditable.

"Our misguided Southern brethren" have certainly afforded a quite as asinine example in the wicked war they have waged against themselves even more than against their country, as the far lesser criminals who, in parti-colored raiment, are laboring for their country's good in penal durance. There is no need of arguing that point. As "there is nothing so successful as success," so there is nothing so unsuccessful as defeat, and few are so blind now as to refuse to see the mad folly of that attempt. But we must admit, to give the devil his due, that it was not only at the South that he showed himself an ass. He made the North, too, exhibit itself as no miracle of wisdom in the times that went before the rebellion and prepared the way for it. A brief dozen of years ago nearly all the business world and too large a proportion of the religious world, almost every powerful newspaper and too many powerful pulpits, seemed to think that Mr. Mason, of Virginia, had succeeded in obtaining the recognition of slavery from the Court of Heaven which he has failed to get from those of France and England, and that a quantity of profligate politicians at Washington had superseded the Gospel by the fugitive slave law, and repealed the moral laws of the universe. If they did not in their secret souls fully believe this, they did believe that the deluge which must needs come at some time, was at least thus put off until after their day. In the unwisdom of blind self-interest they did not perceive that they were, on the contrary, opening the sluices that were to bring it all the sooner and all the more overwhelmingly on their heads. But we have faith to believe that these ante-diluvian sinners have seen the error of their ways, and learnt that neither Congress nor even Wall Street is sufficient to defy God effectually and for ever. We believe the business world and the religious world see that they are not withal wholly innocent of bringing this cataclysm on themselves and their country, in their very endeavors to delay it. If, now that the great waters which have flowed over the nation have subsided, they will but help in building the dikes that shall for ever prevent another outbreak, they will do the next best thing to not making a blunder at all—amending it and making it impossible in the future. And we think they have learnt enough by experience to attempt this in their own defence.

We wish we could entertain as well-grounded a hope of the common sense of the more robust malefactors in the land of Dixie. For if they had had a moderate portion of the wisdom that is profitable to direct, they never would have quarrelled with the hand that protected them even in the weakness of their wickedness, and placed itself between civilization and Christendom and their barbarism. And, to go a step further back, had they had a reasonable share of true worldly wisdom, they would have of themselves reformed that barbarism fifty years ago; and so removed the only object that hindered them, with their splendid natural advantages, from standing in the forefront instead of lagging far in the rearward of the march of the nineteenth century. Suffering so long and so much under this judicial blindness to their own interests, it is not surprising that they should now be found insanely bent on damaging themselves to the best of their abilities in the hope of disappointing and grieving us—as a naughty boy bumps his head against the floor to spite his nurse. Had they but enlightened common sense, they would discern that the abolition of slavery, which has been bestowed upon them, in their own despite, as the reward of their rebellion, if rightly improved would be an ample compensation for all the material losses they have brought upon themselves by it. The prosperity of all communities rests on the labor which extorts treasures from the soil or shapes them usefully afterwards. And its degree depends on the intelligence and willingness of the laborious class in doing its work. The fatal drawback on the prosperity of the South has ever been the state of warfare which has always existed between the employers and the laborers. For slavery is war. Now, as fire puts fire out, this servile war has been extinguished by the war of the rebellion. It depends on the old masters greatly whether the foundations of their new state shall be laid on the rock of intelligent, cheerful, prosperous free labor, or on the sands of an ignorant, discontented, hopeless proletariat. They seem but too much disposed to try and make the new freedom as much like the old slavery as they can, producing a tertium quid which will possess all the disadvantages of the latter with very few of the benefits of the former. If permitted to do this, they may punish the negroes for having been set free through their own folly; but they will punish themselves much more severely. They will diminish their crops, deter the best class of emigrants, keep away capital, lower the value of their lands, and produce a state of chronic poverty. The devil may gratify his malignity, perhaps, but it will be at the cost of demonstrating himself to be doubly an ass.

Fortunately this matter does not rest entirely in the hands of men who, drunk with the fumes of slavery, ran a muck against their best friends in its service, and awake in impotent rage to find that they have lost it. The nation has a word, and a most potential one, to say on the subject. Though the devil be an incorrigible ass, it is no reason why he should make us the butt of his malevolence or his folly, nor yet the innocent negroes, to whom we have pledged our word to save them from his claws. We have the power to protect ourselves as yet, and our black clients as well. We can refuse to receive back the revolted States until they have given us and the blacks ample security for their good behavior. We can require that equality before the law, in the courts, and at the polls, for black men and white, which is the only logical foundation of the republican form of government we are bound to guarantee to them. And we can hold the rebel territory by the military arm until its white inhabitants have learned that it is their interest as well as their doom to treat their black fellow-citizens like human beings, or be summarily chastised by martial justice. For this justice to the blacks is the highest and truest benevolence to the whites. The best friends the ex-slaveholders have are the bugbear radicals their copperhead allies try to scare them withal. As the abolitionists always were the slaveholder's best friends, so their heirs and administrators, the radicals, are his best friends now that he is a slaveholder no longer. If the nation will but follow their lead (and we rather think it will), the South will be rewarded for its rebellion by a degree of wealth, peace, security, and happiness, such as it never dreamed of in the days of its blackest prosperity. But if the nation be content to leave the blacks at the mercy of their old taskmasters, and to admit a solid phalanx of impenitents, willing to add perjury to treason, into Congress, to embarrass, and possibly to control, its action, the South, indeed, will be punished by a deeper barbarism and more sordid poverty than broods over it now; but all the disgrace and a share of the calamity will be justly the portion of the North, which might have hindered them both. The breach of faith of the nation to the freedmen will encourage its intestine enemies to attempt to compel a breach of faith to the public creditors. The most mischievous and malignant factions the country has yet known will make the honor and the prosperity of the country their sport, if the country be cajoled or bullied into the surrender demanded of it. The devil may exult in the ruin of the South and the disgrace of the North, but his utter failure to gain the ends proposed by it will write him down most irrefragably an ass.

JORDAN ON DAVIS.

General Jordan's military paper in the last number of "Harper's Monthly," bringing Mr. Jefferson Davis to book for so bearing himself in the late civil war as to make the conquest of the United States impossible, is very suggestive reading. It shows that the profuse bloodshed of the war is to be followed by as profuse inkshed in peace. No great contest ever came to an end without leaving the vanquished as full of ill blood toward one another as at starting they had been toward their common enemy; and they sit down to show how and why it was that they failed, blaming each other, and pointing out that if this thing had been done at that time, or if the other thing had been done in that way, the result would have been altogether different, and Richard have beaten Richmond on Bosworth Field, and Charles Edward have defeated Cumberland on Culloden Moor. In this way many very lively, acrimonious, and interesting books and chapters have been added to that most captivating of all the forms of history, the history of the things that might have been; which is quite as true history, we suspect, as the dullest matters-of-fact that ever were recorded by the stupidest of chroniclers. Had we the talk of Hannibal's camp, or the military literature of Carthage for the years that immediately followed the second Punic war, questionless we should learn that Maharbal and his friends laid the failure of the Carthaginians even to the account of "Rome's relentless foe" himself. Maharbal would tell that, after Cannæ, he had said to the victor, "Let me advance instantly with the horse, and do thou follow to support me; in four days from this time thou shalt sup in the Capitol,"—and then he would have added, that the statue of Victory in the Capitol trembled in every limb on that day, and dropped her wings; but that Hannibal would not give the order, and so all was lost. After Pharsalia, the very men who forced Pompeius to fight against his military and political convictions, bitterly reproached his conduct, and attributed to him that dismal business which had proceeded from his surrender to them, his fall before his own party being preliminary to his fall before Cæsar.

It is fifty years since the French began to discuss the causes of their defeat at Waterloo, and they are no nearer to a settlement of the question than they were in 1815. Grouchy, in the opinion of most Frenchmen, is as blamable for that defeat as Mr. Davis is blamable for the failure of the Confederacy, in the opinion of Gen. Jordan and his associates. Plain men are of opinion that Grouchy was not at all to blame, and that Napoleon was beaten, first, because he undertook a grand movement with too few men, and secondly, because of the slowness of his operations. So was it with Mr. Davis, so far as numbers were concerned. He undertook a great business with revenues inadequate to the end at which he aimed; and our only wonder is, not that he went down in 1865, but that he did not fall in 1863, as he would have done had the war been purely military in its character, and had it been waged with reference only to military considerations. But political matters complicated our affairs, and quite doubled the power of the enemy for the first half of the contest. Whether he did the best for the rebel cause that he could, with such means as he possessed or controlled, is a question that is fairly open for discussion, and it will be discussed, at the South at least, long after the youngest actor in the war shall have gone to join the heroes of all preceding contests, precisely as it is discussed in England at this day whether Sir Henry Clinton did all that was in his power to do for the relief of Lord Cornwallis. Gen. Jordan argues that he did not, and lays before the world many plausible statements, which, if not refuted, will show that the rebels made an extraordinary blunder in placing Mr. Davis at their head. Before judgment can be rendered, the world will demand that the other side shall be heard. Mr. Davis is thought highly of in Europe, and there it will be difficult to convince men that he is the weak, obstinate, prejudiced, selfish personage he is drawn by a respectable Southern military hand; but we Americans, who know him better, have to admit that this portrait of the ex-Confederate chief has a very strong resemblance to the man, though we reserve our judgment as to details until we shall have heard from him who is now, in his hour of misfortune, so bitterly assailed by one of his former supporters.

Gen. Jordan's attack on Mr. Davis is not half so severe as Col. Mitchell's attack on Napoleon I., whom he represents as having been a very inferior man, about equal in military capacity to the last Duke of York, and in all other respects beneath contempt. How happens it, then, that the whole world, with the exception of half-a-dozen eccentric characters, have united to call him a great man, and as greatest among the great? Because, says the colonel, he defeated, one after another, the armies of every nation of continental Europe, and the peoples and governments of all those nations have to proclaim him a prodigy, or admit that they were beaten by a pigmy. Their very self-love is enlisted in the business of elevating their conqueror, in making it appear that he is a great man. But how happened it that a pigmy was able to accomplish things so wonderful? Were the men of continental Europe in those days all cowards and imbeciles, that they could be overcome by one of the most inferior of mankind, one who had not even the merit of being born in the purple, as Frederick of Prussia had been? To most men it will seem that the English critic has only got rid of one difficulty by bringing forward a greater one. So we may say of Mr. Davis: it is easier to account for what he did by supposing him to be a man of more than ordinary talent, than it is to believe that he is a good-for-nothing person as a public character, considered intellectually. We, at least, against whom he so long contended, though the odds were ever largely in our favor, cannot think him a little man. It would not be a very flattering view of the war to us to assume that Mr. Davis is a fool; for, if he be a fool, what are we, whom he compelled to wage a four years' war before we could get rid of him?

General Jordan is of opinion that the Confederacy would have triumphed, notwithstanding our superior numbers and resources, had it been wisely headed; and he points to the history of Frederick of Prussia, who came out of the Seven Years' War victoriously, though he had to contend against Austria, Russia, France, and a number of lesser nations. The citation seems plausible at first, but examination shows that it amounts to nothing. Frederick had a powerful combination opposed to him, and his affairs were apparently desperate at times; but then he had things in his favor that went far to equalize him with that combination. If Austria had France on her side, and sometimes Russia, Prussia was supported by England, and supported with both men and money. The English purse was freely opened to Frederick by Mr. Pitt, who never thought of looking at a war bill; and the armies that Pitt employed in Germany, and which won brilliant victories, operated greatly to relieve the pressure that had been brought to bear upon the Prussian monarch. Then the Russians, on the death of the Czarina Elizabeth, were withdrawn from the war, Peter III. being a fanatical admirer of Frederick, who, had he lived, would have placed all his means at the Prussian king's command, and his successor, Catherine II., adopted the part of a neutral. The enemies of Frederick were seldom well led, while he was not only a great soldier himself, but many of his lieutenants were superior to any commander on the side of the allies. Even Marshal Daun proved unequal to the requirements of his post. Had he been equal to them, Kolin, which was fought on the 18th of June, 1757, would have proved as fatal to Frederick as the 18th of June, 1815, proved to Napoleon; but Daun failed to follow up his splendid victory, and therefore nothing came from it. The Viennese said that their general should have a night-cap, and sent him one. The great victories of Leuthen and Rosbach were won over generals so inferior that it was almost a shame to whip them. The Prince de Soubise, who commanded the French at Rosbach, had no military talent whatever, and had he changed places with his own cook his army would have been gainers. There never was a great war in which the leading talent was more pronouncedly on one side than in the Seven Years' War.

Quite the reverse of this was the state of things in our war. We do not question the military skill of some of the Southern commanders, but it never was so much superior to the skill of our commanders as to have enabled the rebels to "organize victory," had their "president" been as powerful a man as General Jordan asserts him to have been weak. In the last half of the war, the superiority was as clearly on our side in the matters of leading as it was in material matters. With the exceptions of Lee and Longstreet, what generals were there on the Confederate side who could even be compared with Grant, Sherman, and Thomas? And behind these three Union leaders were a dozen of their lieutenants whose conduct showed them to be possessed of rare military merit, such men as Sheridan, Logan, Howard, Hancock, Warren, Schofield, Hooker, Slocum, Stanley, and others. The rebels had no such list of commanders, and, therefore, if Mr. Davis had been a Frederick, victory would not have been gained for his banner. If it be true, as Moreau said, and as Bonaparte admitted, the big battalions always carry the day, it is quite as true that the greater amount of intellect always beats the lesser. Even if we were to admit that Lee is superior to any one of our commanders, which we are far from doing, we should still be able to find a very heavy preponderance of military ability on the Federal side in the late war.

General Jordan appears to make no allowance for our overwhelming naval superiority, which told on the war from the very beginning, and through which we made something more of the "exhaustion theory" than a mere theory. Could the enemy have kept one of their ports open, they might have carried on the war for years, for then they could have got everything that they needed, as they had to sell things which all the world stood ready to buy, and to pay highly for. Cotton and tobacco would have fed the war through a decade, could they have been sent abroad in large quantities; but that was exactly what could not be done, and it was the navy that prevented its being done. Blockade did as much as battle for us. When Lee and Johnston, against Mr. Davis's wishes, gave up the contest, they did so because they knew that in a few weeks they would have nothing but a starving rabble at their backs; and though it is possible to win a battle with little raiment and no food, it is not possible to enter on a single campaign, much less a long contest, under circumstances of entire destitution. It is admitted by members of the rebel government that even had their armies succeeded in holding the ground on which they stood in the last day of last winter, they must have gone to pieces by the present autumn. They would have had neither hats to their heads nor shoes to their feet, and another campaign with soldiers thus situated would have been out of the question; and that such was the condition of the Confederates was due to the skill, the bravery, and the general efficiency of our naval forces.

THE NAVAL POWER OF FRANCE AND ENGLAND.

The cordial understanding between France and England, of which we have heard so much since 1830, when the success of the revolution of July changed the foreign policy of the French Government, has received a striking illustration in the visits that have been made to French ports by British ships, which were immediately returned by the French, who sent a fleet to Portsmouth on a very different mission from that which Admiral Villeneuve wished to undertake just sixty years since. A man need not be quite worn out and yet remember Trafalgar; and the French fleet which was destroyed in that memorable action was intended to aid in covering the landing of a French army in England. The men who may be said to have succeeded to Villeneuve and Gantheaume now go to England, and are there fêted; and they receive English admirals at Cherbourg and Brest in a fashion somewhat different from that which was awarded to Nelson when he sought to destroy the flotilla at Boulogne. This change, which may not impress young people very strongly, strikes the mind of the older generation very forcibly, so great is the contrast between what is and what has been done within living memory. The causes of the change are not far to seek. Napoleon III. wishes to establish his dynasty, and to have foreign support for his son when that son shall become Emperor; and he knows that so long as England shall be on his side, there can be nothing to fear for his house from external attack. England's object is peace—to get along with as little fighting as possible—and she knows that so long as she and France can agree, she will have either peace or such support in war as would place her beyond all danger of being made a loser. That both parties are selfish in their friendship is very true, but as all alliances are founded on selfishness—more or less enlightened—no objection can be made to their conduct on that score. Peoples and their rulers do not live in Arcadia—and into Arcadia selfishness, like death, probably found its way long ago.

But the best founded and best arranged alliances will sometimes break down and fall into fragments. The world saw at the time of the Orsini affair that the Anglo-French alliance might go to pieces at any moment, under some sudden occurrence. Had the French Emperor been as hot and impulsive as the French colonels, there would have been war between France and England just a year before the Italian contest began. The colonels desired that an assassin hunt might be undertaken in England, by way of balancing that eagle hunt which took place in Belgium in 1815; but Napoleon III. had other work in view for them, and so he brought matters round with England and restored the cordial understanding, which had been sadly soured by the thunder of Orsini's bombs. The affair, however, had brought to men's attention the weak places in the alliance; and for years England has been waging a sort of war against France, in which not a drop of blood is shed, but the expenditure in which is so large that in former times it would have been thought intolerable at a period of the hottest hostilities. The British navy has been built and rebuilt, and England is compelled to be in a state of constant preparation lest circumstances should convert her "good ally" into a bitter enemy. The French Emperor is to be depended upon, it being so obviously for his interest to be on good terms with England that it is absurd to doubt his sincerity—the sincerity of selfishness, but not the less likely to be depended upon on that account. But the Emperor is, after all, only the chief of an excitable people, who may take the bits in their teeth some fine morning and run away with him, charging right into the English line. The long hate between the two countries is by no means at an end in the estimation of the French—and there are many Englishmen who are of the same opinion. Hence England must be prepared for any emergency that can possibly arise. She can cultivate the best understanding with France, but she feels that it is the part of wisdom to be prepared for the occurrence of a misunderstanding. And hence it is, too, that the naval visits mentioned attract much attention, as enabling men to estimate the relative maritime strength of the two countries.

Mr. Hawthorne, in his last work, observes: "In the next naval war, as between England and France, I would bet, methinks, upon the Frenchman's head!" This is, we believe, the common American opinion—the American unprofessional opinion, we mean, for we have heard that our naval men are of a different opinion. This opinion is founded on the belief that naval warfare has become essentially scientific in its character, and that in science the French are superior to the English. Without denying that a considerable change has been wrought in naval warfare by the introduction of steam power into all navies, we are of opinion that sea-fights will be decided hereafter pretty much as they have always been decided, that is, by the capacity of those engaged in them for maritime warfare. If this be the sound view of the subject, as we think it is, England's naval superiority as against France can admit of no doubt. England is a great maritime nation in every respect. She is naturally so, and the strength of her national marine proceeds from the greatness of her commerce, and from the habits and pursuits of large classes of her population. France is a great maritime power only in the sense that she has a fine navy, which contains some of the finest vessels that ever were built, which are manned by good seamen and officered by well-trained gentlemen. But she is not a great commercial country in the sense that England and the United States are great commercial countries. Her maritime commerce makes something very like a beggarly show when compared with that of England. She has but few real seamen, and the habits and pursuits of her people are essentially non-maritime. Leaving the people of Brittany aside, it would be difficult to find a French community that has any adaptability for sea service. Individual Frenchmen are as much at home on the ocean as English or Americans; but, as a nation, the French are averse to the sea, on which they have seldom accomplished anything brilliant, and where they have sustained defeats such as rarely have been known to any other people. While France has produced many of the greatest soldiers whose names belong to history, she has not produced one really great seaman, though some of her naval commanders have been respectable, but nothing more. "What a pity," says an English nautical writer, "that the French, who excel all other nations in the theory of seamanship and in practical naval architecture, cannot find men to fight at sea. They are like flying-fish, a prey for every fish that swims and for every bird that flies. From the oldest records we trace that all other nations, powerful enough to organize a naval force, have produced men able and worthy to command it with honor and glory. The naval annals of barbarians, then of Greece, Rome, and Carthage, down to the modern history of Spain, Portugal, Holland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and England, have severally teemed with naval heroes who shed a bright lustre on the countries which gave them birth. France exhibits a solitary exception, a dull obscurity unenlightened by a single bright page; a blotted chapter in history, a waste log-book; the eye in vain seeks for one spot to rest on, a single star, as a beacon or sea-mark to guide the lonely pilot or stimulate to emulation the aspiring sailor-boy!"

What France has been in the past, that she is to-day, and that she will be in the future. There is nothing in the last fifty years of her history to create the belief that she is likely to make a great figure on the ocean. Her present great navy is the result of a forcing process that has been pursued for half a century of peace with all naval nations, not even the Russian war forming an exception to the assertion, as the union of the French and English fleets in that contest did not render it possible for the Russian fleets to venture out to sea, which they would have done had they had only the French for antagonists. This forcing process has been steadily pursued under all kinds of French governments—by that of the Restoration, by the Orleans monarchy, by the brief Republic, and by the Empire. It would be strange if something of a high character had not followed from exertions so persistently continued, and on which so much money has been expended. Accordingly, we see that France has a brilliant navy; but what would there be left of it after two years of war with a real naval power? Not much, we incline to think. There would be no replacing its losses, as the maritime population of France is not large, and it is slow work to build such ships as are now built. On the other hand, England could build vessels much faster than France, and her maritime population is large, and her people generally, like Americans, take naturally and easily to salt water. National character would tell in such warfare—and it would tell much in favor of England in a contest for naval supremacy between the two countries.

THE NATIONAL HIGHWAYS.

During the last year, it is said, some fifteen hundred persons have been killed and as many seriously injured on railroads in our country. If this be true, it is a sad and disgraceful story. Probably two-thirds of these accidents might have been avoided by proper care. At all hours of the day and night many thousands of our people are travelling on railroads. That these should be safe, so far as skill and care can make them safe, is a matter of great and universal interest. The problem presented to us is, how to reduce to its minimum the element of danger which belongs to the nature of the railroad.

Roads, rails, cars, and engines of the best construction, kept always in perfect order and worked by competent men under wise regulations, would seem to be the conditions on which the highest degree of safety depends. How to get these conditions fulfilled is the question. It can be done only by the directors of the railroad company. Can they be relied on for the purpose? If they cannot, then the public must appeal to some power strong enough to control the directors, or the evil must continue.

Three thousand persons killed or wounded annually sufficiently proves what a priori reasoning would teach, that railroad companies cannot be trusted with the power of life and death over all who travel. No men, however respectable, are fit to wield such power, more especially if it be granted without restraint or responsibility, and with strong temptations to abuse it. The directors and officers of our railroad companies are almost universally persons of high character and usefulness, intelligent, well informed, forcible, practical men, who conduct in its various departments the great business of the country. They are the leaders of enterprise, the chiefs and guides in the manifold fields of effort which produce our rich harvests of prosperity. Their influence, social, industrial, and political, is beneficial to society. Nevertheless, as directors and officers of railroads, they ought not to be trusted with absolute power over the safety of travellers, for two reasons: first, because railroad companies are monopolies; and second, because they are corporations.

They are a monopoly, considered collectively, because they do the work of transportation over land for the whole country. The advantages they offer are so great that no one can afford to travel in any other manner. Whatever the distance or the object, whether an excursion to Newport or Saratoga for pleasure, a journey to New Orleans or Chicago on business, or the daily passage of a merchant between his villa and the city, every one who travels, with exceptions too few to affect the result, must, or actually does, first purchase permission to do so in the shape of a ticket from a railroad company. Not only is the whole business of carrying travellers over the length and breadth of the country monopolized by the railroads, but, for the most part, each particular road absorbs all the travel between its termini, because either the amount of business is not sufficient to support more than one road, or the one in possession, as soon as other enterprises are started, buys them off. It is needless to argue what all experience proves, that a monopoly leads directly to abuse of power, to extortion, to neglect, to rapacity, to reckless disregard of the rights of others. The transportation of merchandize and passengers is a business. Competition is necessary to render business fair and advantageous to both parties. When one alone possesses what the other must have, the former can demand his own terms, part of which may be the inferiority of the thing sold. The only check on this rapacity is the fear of diminishing the demand. Three thousand a year killed or wounded, and the manifold needless annoyances of travelling, together with the large profits made by railroads, prove that this check operates but feebly on the companies, who sell danger and discomfort to the public at a high price.

The railroad companies are also corporations. Lord Coke's saying, that a corporation had no soul, has become a proverb. It is an artificial being, the creature of the law. It has no heart, no conscience, no humanity, no moral responsibility, and exists only for the purpose for which it was chartered. It cannot be guilty of a crime in its corporate capacity, nor be punished, nor is it sensitive to public censure. Why are railway companies created? To benefit the public by carrying freight and passengers. That is the purpose of Government in granting them a charter. The purpose of the stockholders in seeking it and in spending capital on the work is private gain. This universal and eager desire for gain is the great fact whence the science of political economy and all the principles of business are deduced. The Government uses this desire when it grants power to banks, insurance companies, railroad companies, and other corporations. It says to them: "Go to work and make money; the more you make, the better for the community." Associated capital is thus enabled to execute enterprises to which individual wealth is inadequate.

In this arrangement each party has its own special object to attain. That of the Government is the public good, and its duty is to attach such conditions to granted powers that not injury, but good only, shall be produced by them. The object of the corporation is profit. It is permitted to seek this as its exclusive object. Wilful injury, of course, a corporation cannot commit without subjecting its property to claims for damages and its members to punishment. But there are injuries which are not wilful, the result of indifference, cupidity, or neglect. No director of a railroad ever intended to kill or maim its passengers. But to employ the best men in sufficient number to work a road and to keep it and its machinery in perfect order, is expensive. To employ an inadequate force of inferior men and to put off repairs as long as possible, saves money and increases profit. A catastrophe may, indeed, result from this economy, but the chances are that it will not.

All went safely to-day—why not to-morrow? This chance weakens the sense of duty, and discourages prompt action involving expense. Moral responsibility, by which men are governed in their private affairs, does not reach the directors personally. As Jeremy Bentham said, "Boards make fences, and fences make screens," and it is notorious that men will, as members of a board of directors, sanction acts which they would consider disgraceful if done by themselves for their own private interests. When an accident occurs, causing a horrible scene of splintered cars heaped together, and men, women, and children mangled and torn, dead and dying—who is to blame and who is responsible, morally or criminally, to the law or to public opinion? Not the corporation. It has no character, no conscience, no soul. Not the directors. They had no malice against the sufferers, did not intend to injure them, did not foresee the accident, regret it for the sake of the company, whose property has been destroyed, and personally deplore the loss of life and the suffering that has been the result.

Clearly, therefore, our railroad companies, which are both monopolies and corporations, ought not to be trusted with power over the safety of travellers, without supervision, restraint, or penalty. Yet this power, unlimited as to time and unrestricted as to the manner in which it may be exercised, has been granted to these corporations by the legislatures of the States.

As the corporations will not perform any other duty than that of making money for the stockholders, shall we appeal to the State legislatures to protect us? What can the public expect from them in the present condition of the railroad companies and of our politics? These companies are great corporations, using millions of capital, employing thousands of laborers, enlisting on their side prominent men and influential journals. They control, therefore, votes and money, things all-powerful with State legislatures, and with the politicians, demagogues, and secret powers by whom State legislatures are governed. We can expect nothing from these, therefore, unless a public opinion, so loud, so strong, and so general as to command the elections, shall require reform, of which there is little hope, or, should such be created, it is more likely to take the shape of blind, unreasoning, and passionate popular clamor than of sober and well-founded judgment. It is not a pleasant thing to say—but every one knows the fact—the railroad companies are too strong for the State governments, control them, and dictate every law that concerns their own interests. It is fair to say, also, that these interests are, for the most part, the interests of the community, and, so low have our public affairs fallen, the railroad companies are the wiser and more honest government of the two. What power commands at Trenton? Is it not the Camden and Amboy? What at Harrisburg? Is it not the Pennsylvania Central? What at Albany? Is it not the New York Central? And so we might go through the list, and find that the railroad companies, in all that concerns themselves, rule the State governments, and nowhere so entirely as in those States whose wealth and population increase travel, rendering therefore some measures to secure its safety the more important.

If the State governments cannot help us, what can? Are we delivered over, bound hand and foot, to the power of soulless corporations? The nature of our railway system suggests the answer. The highways of the nation should be regulated by the national Government.

Correspondence.

ANOTHER VIEW OF THE CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

BOSTON, Sept. 27, 1865.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

DEAR SIR: I enclose further extracts from the letters of our correspondent, who is taking the census of the cotton bales. You will notice that he finds the negro in a much better position where negro troops are absent. In all his letters he has explained this by stating that the negro troops are not well officered, and, consequently, not well disciplined.

Yours truly, E. A.

QUITMAN, GEORGIA, Aug. 25, 1865.

It is a fact not to be disputed by any candid and intelligent eye-witness of the condition of affairs in this section of the country at this present time, that the freedmen, whatever may be their capacity or willingness for labor, are not working to any considerable extent. I repeat that this is a fact which cannot be disputed by any one who is well informed upon the subject. Not but that instances abound where the freedmen have done and are doing all that could have been expected of them, and in some cases, perhaps, even more, but these are exceptions.

There is no use in denying that there is an antagonism existing between the blacks and whites which threatens grave results if it is not checked immediately. When I first landed, I heard these reports, and paid no attention to them, believing them to be but the results of an unfounded prejudice on the part of the planters. At first I laughed at the idea, but recent and new experiences have led me to believe that there is some foundation to the statement. Thus I find the impression general among the blacks upon the plantations that next Christmas the lands are to be divided among them. This idea they say they heard first from our soldiers. General Sherman's course in setting aside the Sea Islands for the freedmen may have suggested the idea, but, however it came, it is prevalent to a great extent, and amounts almost to a conviction with some. The breach between the blacks deepens and widens day by day; on no account should the military control be withdrawn from this country. Wherever our troops, white, have been taken away, the people would be glad to have them back again. Among all law-abiding citizens the desire is that the white troops shall be permitted to remain until the complete and perfect re-establishment of civil government, for which, by the way, the bulk of the people seem noways anxious, at least in Georgia. I am convinced that they would be content to remain under military rule for an indefinite period, if the black troops could but be withdrawn.

There is a class of hungry politicians and office-seekers down here who are clamorous for the restoration of civil government, merely that they may resume power and office, but the best part of the community only appear to desire the restoration of law and order, and appear to think that it is soonest possible under our military officers. For instance, in the town of Quitman, Georgia, there was stationed for a time a command of U. S. white troops, and I am informed that they were as well behaved as any could expect. Under their supervision the town was orderly and quiet, and no violations of order took place. In consequence of the peaceable behavior of the inhabitants the troops were withdrawn. Within two weeks upwards of two hundred bales of cotton were stolen, houses broken into, robberies committed—in fact, a perfect reign of terror inaugurated, while the inhabitants, though perfectly satisfied as to who were to blame, yet dared not proceed against them. The inhabitants petitioned the general commanding to send back the troops to Quitman to preserve social order. If our troops were withdrawn, I am satisfied that this would be the case over the whole country. The planter places no confidence in the negro, and offers him inadequate wages. Five to seven dollars a month, the negro to clothe and feed himself, is the general rule in the interior of the State. Ten dollars a month, and the negro to board and clothe himself, is considered extremely liberal by the planters. Frequently they offer nothing in money, but only the board, clothing, and medical attendance, the latter two being scarcely more than nominal, and then at the end of the season they offer a certain number of bushels of corn, sorghum, etc. Of course no sensible man will blame the negro for not working for such wages; but then, on the other hand, the freedman is not inclined to work, even for better and reasonable wages, except in the most desultory and indifferent manner. I will say more on this subject hereafter.

SAVANNAH, GA., September 2, 1865.

As the immediate future of the Southern country appears to hinge upon the relations that existed between the late slaves and their former masters, public opinion is fastened upon the subject, and for the present at least nothing else is talked of. Even the reconstruction question has sunk into insignificance beside it, as the planter slowly awakens to the fact that slavery is really gone, as well in fact as in name. Many profess to hope that by the enactment of a rigid system of vagrant laws the negro may be compelled to work on the planter's terms, but most of the people recognize the fact that slavery is dead beyond all hope of resurrection. The feeling of the planter towards the negro seems to vary according to position and surroundings. Thus in Florida I found a vague and indefinite fear prevalent as to the course of events. An excessive timidity appeared to take the place of the late haughty character of the planter towards his once slaves; if the latter did not live up to their contracts, as was generally the case, the planter, instead of attempting to stem the tide, of remonstrating with his hands and arguing them into a proper state of mind, usually went whining to the provost-marshals. The consequence appeared to be that the negro observed his employer's evident timidity, and learned to despise the planter and refuse obedience. In fact, in some cases the planter was obliged to call in the aid of the military authorities, in order to maintain possession of his own house. At Jacksonville it was painful to witness the fear on the part of the whites towards the blacks. This is not confined to Southern men. Thus, at Jacksonville, a Northern man related to me repeated instances of insult at the hands of negroes in the city, as, for instance, being knocked off the sidewalk when walking with ladies. He assured me that he had always been a warm and earnest friend of the negro, and had come down South with the kindest of feelings towards him, but he added that he had been much disappointed. I could scarcely credit some of the stories he told me. At Macon I found much the same state of affairs. I was there introduced to a number of gentlemen, all Northern men, by the way, who had been grossly insulted, fired upon without provocation, their lives endangered, etc., by the negro troops stationed there.

I was shown a bullet which hit a child in bed the night before; splinters from a door hit close beside a man sitting at the window reading; the morning's paper contained three instances of narrow escapes the night I passed in the city; and, finally, I was witness to the careless and wanton and unsoldierlike firing of the black soldiers, whose bullets went whistling through the streets all night long. All this is wrong, and should be corrected. As ar as my observation extends, those regiments of blacks, formerly slaves, are in a very poor state of discipline, not to say insubordination. They drill well, and may do the other duties required of them well, but they are, one and all, disposed to shoot down any white man on the least excuse, and eager to have the opportunity. I have been witness to so many instances myself, that I must say I had rather face any band of guerrillas in the country than meet a body of black troops unaccompanied by United States officers. As regards the relations existing between the planters and freedmen, there is wrong on both sides. In many cases the planter has overreached and deceived the freedmen in his contract, and he replies to their demands for satisfaction with threats of violence. But too often the freedman himself is all to blame. He will sign a fair and liberal contract to-day, and break it to-morrow, or ignore it entirely. When the planter has taken advantage or imposed upon the negro, the latter finds his redress at the office of the provost-marshal or the Freedmen's Bureau. But the planter is left with his crop in the grass at the slightest whimsy or vagary of the freedman, and has no redress. Thus it has frequently happened here that a planter, who has had a respectable crop planted this spring, has given up all attempts at cultivation, and turned his hands loose, sometimes paying them to go away. What is needed is a law to prevent the negroes from flocking to the towns, and obliging them to fulfil their contracts when just and right. But the blacks are disinclined to work cotton and rice at any price whenever they can find other work to do.

"If ole massa want to grow cotton, let him plant it himself. I 'se work for him dese twenty year, and done got nothin' but food and clothes, and dem mighty mean; now I 'se freedman, and I tell you I ain't going to work cotton *no*how."

This is, as nearly as I can remember, the exact language I had from a freedman in reply to a remark in relation to his raising cotton next year, and his audience, all blacks except myself, judging from their expressions of approval, perfectly coincided with him. I cannot resist the conviction that it will be years again before we see such large crops of cotton as before the war. I have not the least idea that affairs will settle down at once, as some believe; everything is in a transition state, and it will take years to get accustomed to the new order of things. In your letter of the 7th of August, which I found at Savannah on my return, you state that some of the gentlemen who are interested in my mission have an impression that I am prejudiced against the negroes. I can honestly say that impression is erroneous. Indeed, that man who can observe their condition to-day, and not pity them and sympathize with them, must be heartless indeed. However, I must let you judge from my letters. I shall write nothing but what I sincerely believe. I shall faithfully attempt to indicate their exact present condition, opinions, and desires. But I must request you to bear in mind that there is a wide difference between the blacks under the ministrations of the Freedmen's Bureau and those who have never come under its influence—by far the larger part. I had commenced to send you a separate sheet before the receipt of your letter, and will write you as frequently as I obtain new facts bearing upon this subject.

CHARLESTON, Sept. 4, 1865.

It is to be regretted that people can be found mean enough to impose upon the credulity of the poor blacks. Thus I have known them to come in large numbers, from distances in some cases exceeding a hundred miles, and all the way on foot, "to get the barrel of flour the Queen has sent us," "for a free ride to Washington to see the President," and on all sorts or kinds of errands which the returning Confederates or Union soldiers have made them believe to be possible. Those who have thus been deceived are, of course, suspicious of all stories. I fancy the idea they have of sharing the lands among them is deep and wide-spread; at least, those among the freedmen who will not own that they believe it are willing enough to assert that it ought to be so. I have a theory, formed since my arrival, that if the planter could be induced to go into the field himself and overlook the labor of his hands, they would work well, but this the planter will not consent to do; he still clings to that remnant of the past, the overseer, and will not be persuaded that he is better off without him. Now the negroes, not having any very pleasant recollections of the system of overseeing, utterly refuse to have one over them, and in almost every case have succeeded in driving him from the place; they are not slow to say that they will kill any man who undertakes the job. I think, however, that where an intelligent and capable negro-driver can be found, such as I had in Mississippi, for instance, the blacks might be induced to labor under his supervision. He must not be called an overseer, however—they object to that term. Northern men having no objections to oversee the freedmen themselves, will get along and have a great advantage in this respect over the Southerners. The blacks, from their numerical preponderance in the large plantation districts, amounting in some parts of the country to more than ten to one, are fast reversing the state of things existing before the war. They are very insolent and saucy where there are no white troops, and I should not be in the least surprised if the next novelty should be the Southern people demanding protection against them. Northern people must come down here and regenerate this country, or it is hopelessly ruined for this generation. Society is turned completely topsy-turvy. New men with new ideas are in great demand just now; the Southern people have lost all confidence in their own leaders. There is no more chance of an outbreak against the Federal Government now than there is in Boston. I hear as bitter denunciations of the leaders in the rebellion down here as I ever heard at the North, and I am persuaded that they are sincere. They pet their returned soldiers, and consider them heroes; they all respect and admire their military leaders who were at all successful. Thus I have heard no word spoken of Gen. Lee but in his favor. But against Jeff. Davis, Toombs, Yancey, and the like, there is an intense feeling, amounting almost to hatred. The first thing to be done is to educate the negro. At present, his ideas of freedom are based on his observation of his master's habits before the war. As the Southern gentleman did not work, and employed his time in travelling about, so the freedman does no more work than will suffice for his immediate wants, and occupies his time in travelling from one place to another. I meet them on all the roads in crowds, like packs of gipsies, some going to one place and some to another, and with no idea of how they are going to exist when they get there. This remark applies more particularly to the young men and women. The older ones have more sense, and many of them remain on the plantations. The military authorities are sending them back to their old homes now, but sometimes the planters refuse to receive them.

I arrived here yesterday, and leave again to-morrow for the West via Augusta and Atlanta. I was six days in getting from Savannah to Augusta last time, and took this route as well to save time as in order to get through a section of the country I had not before visited.

Travelling here is still very difficult and tedious. As a general rule, the cars only run every other day, and then at a very low rate of speed. Fifteen miles an hour is very quick travelling here by rail. From Quitman to Doctortown, in Georgia, on the Savannah, Albany, and Gulf Railroad, the distance is a hundred and twenty-five miles; the running-time is upwards of nine hours, making the rate of speed less than 14 miles an hour. The fare charged is $10, or eight cents a mile. At the North, the distance would be made in about half the time, and considerably less than half the price. The hacks usually run only by night, in order to make connection with the railroads, and make only about four miles an hour. Prices on either conveyance are simply exorbitant. Parties of three or four are carried distances of fifty miles for twenty-five dollars each in the hacks which run between the breaks in the railway. The work of repairs goes on but slowly on these railroads. The steamboats are about as bad: the rivers are at their lowest. I find I could easily devote my whole time to two or three States, and not half go over them at that; so I am obliged to visit only the larger towns, where there is the most cotton in store. I have ridden myself sore in the saddle, and begin to appreciate the fact that I have heard so often dwelt upon, viz., that this is a great country. I take every opportunity of getting at the opinions of persons who are generally supposed to have the best information as to cotton, and frequently am able to make some arrangements to have information forwarded to me from such points as are too far away from my route for me to spare the time to visit. Here, as in Georgia and Florida, the all-engrossing topic, overshadowing everything else, is the future relations of the blacks and whites. The negroes have always been very quick to learn and to assume the privileges and liberties pertaining to freedom, but they are, as a class, perfectly ignorant, and not at all inclined to learn of the responsibilities they assume with their privileges. Depend upon it, you will have more trouble at the North than at the South in relation to negro suffrage. I do n't believe the Southerners will object to their voting as soon as they are educated; indeed, many are perfectly willing they should vote now, believing they can control their vote. But the most of the thinking men I meet are anxious to get them out of the country. No Southern man appears to have the slightest belief in the free labor system with the blacks. Emigration societies are forming all over the country to induce free white labor to come down here.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Sept. 15, 1865.

Except for the disinclination to make contracts for the next year, or to keep those entered into for this year, in fact, to do work on plantations, the blacks are acting admirably wherever there are no negro soldiers stationed. They seem not only willing but anxious to obtain labor of any kind except that on plantations. They desire to learn mechanical employments—any number can be hired for such purposes; but they won't work on plantations. I hear a great deal said about their stealing propensities, but I feel quite certain they do n't steal half so much as the whites, and to my mind it is clear that half the villany charged on the poor blacks is perpetrated by the whites, who find it convenient to make a scape-goat of the negro. Every one who owns cotton here is agreed as to one fact, the necessity of keeping a guard over it day and night, to protect it from the white thieves, and if they will steal cotton, as it is notorious they do, I can't see why they won't steal anything else.

The latest "dodge" is for the white women to harness up their wagons and go on a cotton "raid;" then, if the cotton is found on the man's premises, he knows nothing about it. What can you expect from a race who set their wives and daughters to steal for their support? The white man is more afraid of the negro than the negro of the white man; withdraw your support, and the negro will stand firmly enough by himself. All the producing labor that is done is done by him, and this will continue to be the case. The white man down here has learned to lean on the negro for support, and they can't do without him, and the negro knows it. It is all working right enough. The large plantations must be subdivided; this will come about of itself in time. Already every one is clamoring to sell at any sacrifice. Then small crops from small freeholders will in time be more than equal to large crops on large plantations. Depend upon it, it is all working for the best. As for the re-enslavement of the negro—as well talk of recalling yesterday. The nearest approach that any one down here hopes for is the establishment of such laws regulating labor as would constitute a sort of serfdom. The Banks system would be accepted in an instant by the white man. As regards negro suffrage, many of the planters will not oppose it, thinking that they can secure the negroes' votes, but they dare not openly advocate it, as the middle and poorer classes will not hear of it. They will not consent to discuss it, saying it is simply impossible. The power and prestige and influence of the old planters have in a great measure departed for ever. I go from here to Selma, and shall then try to get up in the northern part of the State.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XII.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., Sept. 20, 1865.

JUST before leaving Salisbury I attended a political meeting, at which two of the aspirants to a seat in the State Convention addressed their fellow-citizens. One had been a lieutenant-colonel in the Confederate army; the other during the war was known as a Unionist, and the Salisbury Union Banner, which supports his antagonist, even styles him "the radical candidate." His radicalism, however, goes no further, I believe, than to declare it right and expedient to admit the evidence of negroes as witnesses in the courts of law. The meeting was held in the court-house, during the adjournment of a military commission, which on that day was trying a planter from one of the adjacent counties for the killing of a negro. While a small audience of two hundred or more persons was assembling, I talked with an officer of the court, who gave me the particulars of the case so far as the testimony had then disclosed them. The planter, it seems, being away from home, the negro, who was one of his laborers, packed up his clothes and other property, and, going to his mistress, made known his intention of leaving the plantation. Being asked to give his reasons, he said he was not so well treated as the rest of the hands, particularly that the food given his family was inferior to that received by his fellow-servants, and that he thought he could better his condition by seeking work elsewhere. These assertions the planter's wife denied; but the man persisted in them, and it is alleged that in contradicting the lady his language and manner became insolent, so that the planter, returning soon afterwards, found the women of his family indignant and in tears. He shot the man, wounding him fatally.

This is one of the four instances of negro shooting which, in a previous letter, I mentioned as having occurred in the vicinity of Salisbury. Another is that of a young lady of Davie County, who, having shot and killed a colored woman for forcibly rescuing her child from her mistress, the young lady's mother, who was beating it, has recently been tried for murder. She was found guilty of manslaughter, and, in accordance with a provision of North Carolina statute law, was fined in the sum of one thousand dollars. While I was learning these facts one of the candidates began to speak, and, having delivered an address of half an hour in length, he was followed by his opponent. Each gentleman seemed to spend most of his strength in fiercely attacking the "record" of the other; and obviously the sympathies of the assembly were with the soldier, whose supporters are in a majority in the town, though it is admitted that his opponent will carry the election in the country precincts, and return the Unionist. Both of the candidates, however, professed to be sincere Unionists; both were opposed to armed intervention in Mexican affairs, and they united in pronouncing slavery dead. They were at variance only upon the question of repudiation. All the State debt incurred during the war the colonel would have paid as soon as possible, and in good money, while the doctor advocated the repudiation of all that portion of it incurred for the purpose of prosecuting a rebellious war.

I should say that the interest felt in the result of this election is not universally pervading, nor very intense, and that the vote will not be a heavy one. To-day, at noon, stopping at a house about fourteen miles from Salisbury, I found that the farmer supposed the second day of October, at which time the convention assembles in Raleigh, to be the day appointed for choosing the delegates. He had voted to take North Carolina out of the Union, he said, merely because it was plainly impossible that she should remain neutral while South Carolina on the one side of her and Virginia on the other were carrying on hostilities. Still, aside from that, his preference had been for a Southern Confederacy; he was sorry that the Union was to be restored, and as things stood now he should never again, he thought, take any part in politics. What this man said was confirmation of the statements of a gentleman in the town, an eager canvasser for the colonel above mentioned, who expressed his belief that his favorite candidate would be defeated because a large class of voters who ought to support him, displeased at the ruin of the Confederacy, and reluctant to take the oath of allegiance to the Union, would cast no ballots in this election. The same farmer thought that a nigger was constituted pretty much like a mule, and was most serviceable and best contented when he had plenty of feed, plenty of work, and a little licking. They were getting part of the crop for their labor, he said, in his neighborhood, but some of the farmers hired transient laborers for ten cents a day and a dram. He laughed as he told me that he had heard that, a little to the eastward, it was a common thing when the seines were dropped into the ponds for dead niggers to be fished out. I have seen no one else who had heard anything of such a story, and my informant said he did not believe it was true. It is true, however, that he laughed as he told it.

